A letter dated Laredo, May 28, gives an account of the pursuit and punishment of a small party of Indian marauders, by six citizens of Laredo, Mexicans by birth; they came up with the Indians, who numbered fifteen, near Roma on the 24th. Six Indians were killed and three made prisoners; all the stolen property was recovered. The pursuers had one of their number killed.

In relation to the military posts and troops in Texas, the Galvestoo Civilian has the following:

It appears by a late note of the Adjutant General that the following military posts in the State of Texas are occupied at the present time, to-wit: Fort Brown, Ringgold Barracks, Fort McIntosh, Fort Duncan, Fort Lancaster, Fort Davis, Camp near Fort Mason, Fort McKavitt, Fort Chadburn, East Belknap, Camp on Comanche Reservation, Fort Bliss.

The following troops are now serving within the limits of the State, and, for the most part in the field, 2d Regiment of Cavalry, Regiment of Mounted Riflemen, two companies of Cavalry, four companies 4th Artillery, 1st Regiment of Infantry, 5th Regiment of Infantry, two companies 7th Infantry, nine companies 8th Infantry.

This force numbers about 4,200 officers and men, and comprise more than a fourth of the effective force of the whole army.

We learn from the Goliad Express, that the grasshoppers or locusts, which have scourged the Northern part of Texas during the present spring, have made their appearance in that vicinity. They confine their depredations, however, to grass and leaves of fruit trees.

The Columbia Democrat says:

An insect about three fourths of an inch in length, and commonly called the Spanish fly, has recently made its appearance on some of the plantations in this county and is committing great depredations upon vegetation.

In relation to the crops, the Washington American says:

Notwithstanding the dry weather, the accounts we get of the cotton crop begin ak an average yield. In this immediate section, the crop is more promising than in other parts of the surrounding country.

The corn is in a very precarious state, and unless we have rain at an early date, a large portion of it will prove almostan entire failure.

Baton Rouge, Grosse Tete and Opelousas Railroad.—The Report of the Directors of this Company to the stockholders, is now before us. It shows a gratifying advance towards the speedy and certain completion of this work of internal improvement. The soundness of its condition and the steady credit it has maintained are creditable, as they are due, to the indomitable energy and the unrelaxed economy that have so eminently characterized, and we may add, distinguished its management in the hands of the enterprising gentlemen who have been connected with it from its commencement. It will be perceived that while its liabilities are only $82,101 72, the assets, with some trifling deductions, amount to $104,520 68. In less than twelve months, we may safely anticipate, the road will be in full operation. The iron has been procured through the liberal and enterprising house of James Robb & Co., New Orleans. The whole of the labor of grading and bridging this road has been done by the slaves belonging to, and very judiciously purchased by, the stockholders. After its completion the stockholders will have on hand and at their disposal, a number of valuable slaves. We consider this means of constructing Southern Railroads as far preferable to any other upon the simple ground of economy, if there were not others of equal or greater importance.

Perfumery.—The extensive flower farms in the neighborhood of Nice, Grasse, Montpelier and Cannes in France, at Adrianople, (Turkey in Europe,) at Broussa and Uslack, (Turkey in Asia,) and at Mitcham, in England, in a measure, indicate the commercial importance of that branch of chemistry called perfumery. British India and Europe consume annually, at the very lowest estimate, 150,000 gallons of perfumed spirits, under various titles, such as eau de cologne, essence of lavender, esprit de rose, etc.

The art of perfumery does not, however, confine itself to the production of scents for the handkerchief and bath, but extends to imparting odor to inodorous bodies, such as soap, oil, starch and grease, which are consumed at the toilet of fashion.

Some idea of the importance of this art to commerce may be formed when we state that one of the large perfumers of Grasse and Paris, employs annually 80,000 pounds of orange flowers, 60,000 pounds of cassia flowers, 54,000 pounds of rose leaves, 32,000 pounds of jasmine blossoms, 32,000 pounds of violets, 20,000 pounds of inferose, 16,000 pounds of lilac, besides rosemary, mint, lemon, citron, thyme, and other odorous plants in like proportion. The quantity of odoriferous substances used in this way is far beyond the conception of those even used to abstract statistics, giving rise to an amount of industry truly gratifying.

"When I recover I will meet them again, and put it to them again."

Such are the words of Senator Sumner, as reported by Senator Wilson—as excited over by men of little brains and much imagination, and which we had hoped to see withdrawn before this, by the friends of Mr. Sumner—for such a sentence as "I will put it to them again," is not the style of language in which a Massachusetts Senator and scholar is expected to express himself before the country, and he who utters such provoking terms, is more an incendiary than a Senator. "We will subdue you," says Senator Douglass; "I will put it to them again," says Senator Sumner. No person can tell who is to come out the better in this angry and discourteous warfare.—[Boston Courier, 10th inst.

FOUR DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

ARRIVAL OF THE ERICSSON.

[BY THE SOUTHERN AND NATIONAL LINES.]

NEW YORK, June 12.—The steamship Ericsson, from Liverpool, on the afternoon of Wednesday, May 28, has arrived at this port. Her advices are four days later than received by the Niagara.

General News.

A new Russian loan is spoken of.

The Italian question still remains unsettled. It is rumored that the Pope proposes to call a congress of all the Italian sovereigns, with Plenipotentiaries from France and Austria, on the settlement of the difficulties.

Denmark is actively engaged in putting her fleet in an effective condition.

The Spanish Government is said to be taking energetic measures against Mexico.

Louis Napoleon has under consideration a scheme for founding a territorial nobility in Algiers.

Lord Elgin had moved in the House of Lords for the dispatches relative to sending troops to Canada. A discussion ensued, when Clarendon expressed good feeling towards the United States, but declined to recall Crampton.

There is no new effect respecting American affairs.

Palmer, the poisoner, had been convicted.

Acceptance of Mr. Fillmore.

WASHINGTON, June 12.—Mr. Fillmore's official acceptance of the nomination of the Philadelphia Convention has been received.

He fully subscribes to the declaration of principles of the Philadelphia National Council, and refers to his past services in the administration of the Government as exemplicatory of his course in the future, in case he should be elected.

THREE DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

ARRIVAL OF THE ARABIA.

Excitement Respecting American Affairs.

NEW YORK, June 13th.—The Royal Mail Steamship Arabia, Captain J. Stone, from Liverpool on the afternoon of the 31st, has arrived at this port. Her advices are three days later than those of the Ericsson.

General News.

The English papers are generally filled with rejoicings over the conclusion of the war.

There is much excitement respecting the American affairs.

The news of Padre Vijil's reception as Minister from Nicaragua, following so closely on Lord Clarendon's amicable advances, serves to increase the excitement.

It is rumored that Lord Elgin, late Governor General of Canada, will be sent as Plenipotentiary Extraordinary to Washington as the last chance of averting war.

Spain is fitting out a fleet, the destination of which is Mexico.

Commercial Intelligence.

COTTON.—The market had recovered its previous decline and closed firm. Orleans Fair, 7d.; Orleans Middling 6¾d.; Uplands Fair 6¾d.; Uplands Middling 6 1-16d.

The sales of the week amounted to 48,000 bales, of which 4,000 bales were taken for export and 3,500 on speculation.

The whole stock in port amounted to 701,800 bales of which 540,000 bales were American.

BREADSTUFFS.—The market for breadstuffs was dull, and exhibited a declining tendency.

PROVISIONS.—Our circulars quote provisions as generally unchanged.

MONEY MARKET.—The money market is reported easier. The Bank of England had reduced its rate of interest to 5 per cent.

Consols for money are quoted at 94¼ to 94¾.

Havre Cotton Market.

The Havre market shows a slight decline. Orleans tres ordinaire being quoted at 94.

Home Politics.

LANCASTER, Pa., June 13.—Mr. Buchanan was officially informed of his nomination by the Committee of the National Convention, at Wheatland, to-day.—He cordially greeted the Committee and said he would give his reply in writing.

NEW YORK, June 14.—Yesterday afternoon a motion was made in the North American Convention to ballot for a candidate for President. The motion was withdrawn after some debate. Fremont is evidently the favorite.

LATER FROM KANSAS.

Osawattomie and Palmyra Destroyed—Governor Shannon Smoked Out.

CHICAGO, June 13.—Advices from Kansas state that the town of Osawattomie was sacked, on Friday, by one hundred and fifty ruffians, including fifty of Buford's company.

The town of Palmyra was also destroyed.

There was a general mustering of the Pro-Slavery companies, and they threatened to exterminate Shannon and Sumner and the United States troops.

Shannon fled from the Territory, but was prevailed upon to return to Leavenworth.

LOUISVILLE, June 15.—The Indiana State prison at Jeffersonville (opposite this city) is now on fire. It is feared the buildings will be entirely consumed.

We learn from a dispatch from Philadelphia that the steamer Edwin Forrest collapsed a flue on the afternoon of the 8th at Beverly, seriously injuring the engineer and fireman—the latter it is supposed, f

"Mammy"—A Home Picture.

BY L. VIRGINIA FRENCH.

Where the broad mulberry branches hang a canopy of leaves,
Like an avalanche of verdure, drooping o'er the kitchen eaves;
And the sunshine with its shadows, dainty arabesques have made
O'er the quaint old cabin settle, standing in the pleasant shade;
Sits good "Mammy" with the "children," while the summer afternoon
Wears the dewy veil of April o'er the brilliancy of June.

Smooth and snowy is the 'kerchief, lying folded with an air
Of matron dignity, above her silver-sprinkled hair,
Hers and white the beaded necklace, used on Sundays to bedeck,
(A dearly cherished amulet,) her plump and rosy neck;
Dark her neatly ironed apron, of a broad and ample sweep,
Spreading o'er the dress of "homespun" with its many colored dyes.

True, her lips are all untutored, but how genially they smile,
And how eloquent their fervor, praying "Jesus bress de chile!"
True, her voice is hoarse and broken, but how tender its replies—
Tho' her hands are brown and withered, yet how loving are her eyes;
She has thoughts both high and holy, tho' her brow is dark and low—
And her face is dusk and wrinkled, but her soul is white as snow!

An aristocrat is "Mammy"—and tho' usually sedate,
"Naught as Lucifer" to "white trash," whom she cannot tolerate;
Patronizing top, to "Master"—for she "nussed 'im when a boy;"
Familiar, yet respectful, to "my Mistis,"—but the joy
Of her bosom is "de children," and delightfully she'll boast
Of the "born blood" of her darlings—"good as kings and queens a'most."

There she sits beneath the shadow, crooning o'er some olden hymn,
Watching earnestly and willingly, though her eyes are dim,
Laughing in her heart sincerely, but with countenance demure;
Holding out before her "babies," every tempting little lure;
Rating all their merry frolics with a quiet, loving guise,
Telling o'er at night to "Mistis" all their "cunnin' little ways."

Now and then her glance will wander o'er the pastures far away,
Where the tasseled corn-fields waving to the breezes rock and sway;
Where the crystal of the glassing silver, and the hazy distance; where
To the river's gleaming silver, and the mountain peaks are peering thro' an azure veil of air;
But the shrill of baby voices—baby laughter low and sweet,
Recall her in a moment to the treasures at her feet.

So "nascally," so rollicking, my bold and sturdy boy,
In all his tricky waywardness, is still her boast and joy,
She'll chase him thro' the shrubbery—his mischief-mood to cure;
"Hi! what dat little rascal now? de bars will get 'im shure!"
When caught, she'll stontly swing him to her shoulder, and in pride
Is marching round the pathways, "just to see how gran' he ride."

And the "Birdie" of our bosoms—oh! how soft and tenderly
Bow's good "Mammy's" tender spirit to her baby stitchery!
All to her is dear devotion, whom the very angels tend
And all thoughts of her are blended with a holy tenderness;
Coaxing now, and now caressing, saying, with a smile and kiss,
"Jes' for Mammy—dat's a lady—won't it now?" du that or this.

On the sweet white tufted clover, worn and weary with their play,
Toying with the creamy blossoms, now my little children lay,
Harnessed up with crimson ribbons, rocking horses side by side,
"Make believe" to eat their "fodder"—(blossoms to their noses tied;)
Near them stands the willow wagon—in it "Birdie's" tasmouth doll—
And our noble "brave" beside them, faithful guardian over all.

Above them float the butterflies, around them hum the bees;
And birdling warble, darting in and out among the trees;
The kitten sleeps at "Mammy's" side, and two brown rabbits pass,
Hopping close along the palling, stealing thro' the waving grass;
Gladsome tears blue eyes are filling, and a watching mother prays,
"God bless Mammy and my children in those happy, halcyon days."

Alone.—BY C. L. DOWLING.

My dear old wife! how still she glides
Within the open door.
I seem to hear her gentle step
Beside me on the floor;
I lift my eyes—'twas but the wind,
The wind, and nothing more.

I sit beside the cottage fire,
It blazes warm and high,
And as I sit, I hear her knit,—
How swift the needles fly!
I look, and lo! a vacant chair,
And seeing that, I sigh.

The wailing wind across the moor
Is floating like a knell,
The snow is resting, soft and white,
In many a feathered swell;
And O! it falleth cold and chill
Within my heart as well.

I miss the precious tones of love
I've heard for many a year,
And still alone I seem to feel
Her presence near;
But when I look, and see her not,
I brush away a tear.

I travel back the mist of time,
And with a thrill of pride
I clasp her little, trembling hand—
My graceful, girlish bride;
And ah, I love her better far,
Than all the word beside.

And one by one, the by-gone years
Come gliding to my view;
I seem to meet her loving eyes,
So beautiful and blue,
And, meeting them I softly smiled,
The picture seems so true.

The clock upon the mantel strikes—
I start—the dream has flown,
I only hear the wailing wind,
So mournful in its tone:
Perhaps it knows an aged man
Is sitting here alone.

Alone! for O, the coffin-lid
Her placid brow hath pressed,
And silent now the loving heart
That throbbed within the breast;
And O! I yearn to lay me down
By her dear side and rest.

Poor, lonely heart, the weary throb
Will soon be silent here;
For O, I hear the heavy snows
Of many a wintry year;
And it is very sweet to me
To know that death is near.

My pulse grows weaker day by day,
And I am glad to go;
I shrink not at the chilling flood,
Though cold its billows flow,
I know a father's guiding hand
Will bear me safely through.

And to I that blissful world beyond,
I seem to enter there;
I seem to hear her welcome sweet
Float on the scented air;
And lift my eyes to greet her own,
And see her vacant chair.

Land Warrants.—The market is almost without a supply, most persons having warrants being unwilling to sell at the depressed rates. No size will now command 90 per acre, as we learn from a dealer, unless upon an occasional order from some person desiring to make a location. A gentleman from Virginia, who wishes to dispose of a few warrants for some of his neighbors writes:

"If I can't try and get something above a dollar per acre, I would hold up for an improvement in the market, for since the railroad companies have taken off the duty, leaving the citizened milk for the old soldiers or their widows".—[Washington Organ, 11th.

St. Mary.—We clip the subjoined items from the Franklin Journal of the 12th:

We learn that the fine and scarlet fever is pretty bad in the neighborhood of Pattersonville, in this parish. Several negroes on the plantation of Mrs. D. D. Richardson, have recently died with these complaints. We are happy to chronicle the continued good health of our village.

The Brig Brannan was seized at New York, on Monday, the 9th inst., on suspicion of having been engaged in the slave trade.

The Triton and the Minnows.

Under this head the London Quarterly Review has a graphic description of the leviathan iron steamer Great Eastern, now building for the Eastern Steam Navigation Company, and compares this Triton of steam with the Minnows, built some thirty years ago, tracing at the same time the interminable advance of the size of steam vessels. We give a few interesting extracts:

A closer inspection of the Great Eastern shows how completely the new material (iron) has necessitated new ideas with respect to construction. She runs along, or rather will—for she is not yet quite up in frame—some seven hundred feet; those portions of her yet unfinished at stem and stern show her partitions of bulk-heads running nearly sixty feet in height, and standing just sixty feet apart. If we examine the outer walls of these huge partitions, we see at once that the ship has no ribs springing from keel or back-bone, none of the ordinary frame-work by which her bulging sides are maintained in their places; but, on closer inspection, it is found that she has a system of ribs or webs, longitudinal instead of transverse, running from stem to stern of the ship, up to eight feet above her deep water line; and riveted on each side of these thirty-two webs, which are again subdivided at convenient lengths, are plates of iron three-quarters of an inch in thickness, forming a double skin to the ship, or a dermis and epidermis. Thus her framework forms a system of cells, which, like the Mosaic tube, combines the minimum of weight with the maximum of strength. A glance at the transverse midship section will show at once this portion of her structure. Hitherto, it has been the practice to build iron ships in exactly the same manner, as regards framework, as wooden ones; that is, the strength of the sides has been made gradually to lighten towards the deck, which, being of wood, can offer but slight resisting power. Thus iron ships of the old method of construction are peculiarly liable to break their backs upon the application of force either to their two ends or to the centre of their keels, just, in short, as a tube would be easily broken one side of which was made much stronger than the other. * * * * * * *

If we clamber up the ladders which lead to her deck, some sixty feet above the ground, we perceive that her interior presents fully as strange a contrast to other vessels as the construction of her hull does. Ten perfectly water tight bulk-heads, placed sixty feet apart, having no openings lower than the second deck, divide the ship transversely; whilst two longitudinal walls of iron, 30 feet apart, traverse 350 feet of the length of the ship. Thus the interior is divided, like the sides, into a system of cells or boxes. Besides these main divisions there are a great number of sub-compartments beneath the lowest deck, devoted to the boiler-rooms, engine-rooms coal and cargo, &c.; whilst some 40 or 50 feet of her stem and stern are rendered almost as rigid as so much solid iron by being divided by iron decks from bulwark to keel. Her upper deck is double, and is also composed of a system of cells formed by plates and angle irons. By this multiplication of rectilinear compartments the ship is made almost strong as if she were of solid iron; she is rendered as light as indestructible, comparatively speaking, as a piece of bamboo. There is a separate principle of life in every distinct portion, and she could not well be destroyed even if broken in two or three pieces, since the fragments, like those of a divided worm, would be able to sustain an independent existence.

A better idea perhaps of the interior of the ship can be gained at the present moment than when she has progressed further towards completion. As you traverse her mighty deck, flush from stem to stern, the great compartments made by the transverse and longitudinal bulkheads, or part-walls of iron, appear in the shape of a series of parallelograms, 60 feet in length by 36 in width. Numerous doors in the walls of these yawning openings at once reveal that it is here that the hotels of the steamship will be located. If we were to take the row of houses belonging to Mivart's and drop them down one gulph, take "Farrance's" and drop it down the second, take Morley's, at Charing Cross, and fit it into a third, and adjust the Great Western Hotel, at Paddington, and the Great Northern, at King's Cross, into apertures four and five, we should get some faint idea of the nature of the accommodation the Great Eastern will afford. We speak of dropping hotels down these holes, because the separate compartments will be as distinct from each other as so many different houses. Each will have its splendid saloons, upper and lower, of 60 feet in length, its bed-rooms or cabins, its kitchen and its bar, and the passengers will no more be able to walk from one to the other than the inhabitants of one house in Westbourne Terrace could communicate through the party-walls with their next door neighbors. The only process by which visiting can be carried on will be by means of the upper deck or main thoroughfare of the ship.

Nor are we using figures of speech when we compare the space which is contained in the new ship to the united accommodation afforded by several of the largest hotels in London. She is destined to carry 800 first-class, 2,000 second class, and 1,200 third-class passengers, independently of the ship's complement, making a total of 4,000 guests. A reference to the longitudinal and transverse sections will explain her internal economy more readily than words. The series of saloons, together with the sleeping apartments, extending over 350 feet, are located in the middle instead of "aft," according to the usual arrangement. The advantage of this disposition of the hotel department must be evident to all those who have been to sea and know the advantage of a snug berth as near as possible to the centre of the ship, where its transverse and longitudinal axes meet, and where of course there is no motion at all. It will be observed that the passengers are placed immediately above the boilers and engines; but the latter are completely shut off from the living freight by a strongly arched roof of iron, above which and below the lowest iron deck the coals will be stowed, and will prevent all sound and vibration from penetrating to the inhabitants in the upper stories. As the engines and boiler rooms are separated from each other by bulkheads in exactly the same manner as the saloons, a peculiar arrangement has been made to connect their machinery without interfering with their water-tight character. Two tunnels, of a sufficient size to give free passage to the engineers, are constructed fore and aft in the centre of the coal bunkers through all the great iron part-walls. By this arrangement the steam and water pipes, which give life and motion to the ship, will be enabled to traverse her great divisions, just as the aorta traverses in its sheath the human diaphragm.

Let us return, however, for a few moments to the deck, in order to give the reader a clear idea of the magnitude of the structure under our feet. The exact dimensions "over all" are 692 feet. There are few persons who will thoroughly comprehend the capacity of these figures. Neither Grosvenor nor Belgrave square could take the Great Eastern in; Berkely square could barely admit her in its long dimensions, and when rigged, not at all, for her mizzen boom would project some little way up Davies street, whilst her bowsprit, if she had one, would hang a long way over the Marquis of Lansdowne's garden. In short, she is the eighth of a mile in length, and her passengers will never be able to complain of being "cooped up," as four turns up and down her deck will afford them a mile's walk. Her width is equally astonishing. From side to side of her hull she measures 83 feet, the width of Pall Mall; but across the paddle-boxes her breadth is 114 feet; that is, she could just steam up Portland Place, scraping with her paddles the houses on either side. With the exception of the sky-lights and openings for ventilating the lower saloons, her deck is flush fore and aft. Mr. Bronuell has, we think wisely, decided not to trust so precious a human freight and so vast an amount of valuable cargo to any single propelling power, but has supplied her with three, the screw, the paddle and the sail. Her paddle wheels, 56 feet in diameter, or considerably larger than the circus at Astley's, will be propelled by four engines, the cylinders of which are 6 feet 2 inches in diameter and the stroke 14 feet. The motive power of these will be generated by four boilers. Enormous as are these engines, having a nominal power of 1,000 horses and standing nearly 50 feet high, they will be far inferior to those devoted to the screw. These, the largest ever constructed for marine purposes, will be supplied with steam by six boilers, working a force of 1,600 horses, the relative strength of the combined engines being equal to 3,000 horses. The speed of the ship under steam is expected to average 20 miles an hour.

It is interesting to note the progressive advance of size in steam vessels that has taken place within the last thirty years, which the diagram, together with the following table, will render clear to the reader:

Date.		Length. feet.	Breadth. ft.	in.
1838.	Enterprise, built expressly to go to India,	122	27	0
1843.	Tagus, for the Mediterranean,	182	28	0
1838.	Great Western, first ship for Atlantic passage,	236	35	6
1844.	Great Britain, the largest iron ship then projected,	322	51	0
1853.	Himalaya, iron ship for the Mediterranean,	370	43	6
1854.	Persian, iron ship,	340	45	0
1856.	Eastern, iron steamship,	680	83	0

Thus the ocean-going steamer of 1856 is nearly six times the length of that of 1825, whilst the difference between their tonnage is still more in favor of the last-built vessel. The augmentation has gone on in an increasing ratio, and, if it is still to continue, we wonder over what space of water our Leviathan of the deep will extend.

Navigation.—The Frank Keeling did not arrive from New Orleans this week, having been obstructed by a raft in the Atchafalaya at the mouth of the Courtableau. This raft has been formed since the late rise in the Mississippi, and is likely to prove a serious drawback upon our regular steamboat communication with the city—an evil that might be averted by a little attention on the part of those officials whose duty it is to take cognizance of such matters.

A petition, numerously signed, has been forwarded to the State Engineer, for a dredge boat to remove the raft; and we shall be right glad soon to announce our communication with the city again open.

Thrilling Sketch—The Arkansas Coward.

BY CHARLES SUMMERFIELD.

The beautiful little town of Van Buren, on the Arkansas river, near the Cherokee line, during its early history, was famous for the number and ferocity of its desperadoes, being the principal meridian and focus of rendezvous for gamblers, Indian traders and all sorts of adventurers who had found it necessary to change their domicile from lands governed by a rigid criminal code. The half-bred "braves" from the Cherokee nation all flocked to the same city, to drink, carouse and take a hand at cards, and exhibit their powers in sanguinary "set to's" with pistols and long knives. Such a state of society may be imagined—it cannot be described. Not a gun that performed its circuit that did not witness some dreadful single combat with or without murderous weapons, while now and then dozens at a time and by mutual agreement, from the rum shop nut in the public square, engaged in mortal strife.

At this period Thomas A. Myers emigrated to Arkansas, and opened a large grocery store at Van Buren, acting himself as keeper and retailer. Such an occupation at that time required a man of the most determined courage, as the store had always a back-room or shed attached, specially appropriated to gambling, both by day and night, and where the players were supplied with the choicest liquors at the bar, and would be sure to bully the proper cent of his reasonable charges, unless restrained by fear.

For a while, however, Myers succeeded admirably. The half-breeds, loafers, and "chartered fighters," as they called themselves, held a caucus, and unanimously voted that the new arrival was a dangerous subject and had better be left alone. This verdict was altogether owing to the stranger's personal appearance, as military as might well be conceived. Tall, manly, and symetrical in shape, with great endowments both of strength and agility, he would have had few equals in the arms of naked nature. But by the cunning inventions of art, iron, steel, and lead, and the thunder and lightning of gun-powder, are made to fight for the feeblest bosom, and thus dwarfs and giants, provided both are alike the heirs of true courage, now stand on the same dead level. It was believed also that Myers possessed the resolute will to handle those awful engines of destruction where life and death hang on the touched of a trigger. His countenance betokened the perfection of bravery. His face wore generally a stern expression, and when that melted into a smile, the smile seemed sterner still. His eyes were exceedingly black, wild, penetrating, and restless, and had that cold, gleaming, metalic look which may be regarded as the surest sign of desperation. Besides he carried an appalling supply of pistols and a bowie-knife fourteen inches in the blade. Hence everybody was respectful and obliging to the ostensible hero for a period of several weeks, during which an unusual calm reigned throughout the village.

At length a terrible affray occurred at Myer's grocery. Half a dozen fire-arms exploded in quick succession, and the deafening roar so frightened the keeper that he took to his heels and fled from his own establishment. The fact settled public opinion as to his character.

"What a chicken-hearted coward to run from his own castle," exclaimed General Cole, the Napoleon of frontier duellists and gamblers.

"Why, he hasn't the spunk of a dead possum!" lisped Bill Green, the dandy loafer, combing his "soup locks" with his long rusy nails.

"Let's drink his liquor and smoke his cigars and not pay him for them, because, as how he's a coward," said Jack Warhawk, a huge half-breed, and having enunciated this anathema of genuine Cherokee logic, Jack leaped over the counter and began to fill glasses and hand out cigars, crying—"Toast to the brave, my boys! We'll never want while the world has chickens of the white feather."

The drinking in the grocery having ceased for more than an hour, being re-placed by a din of most boisterous mirth, Myers, by a great effort, mustered the spirit to return. He found the customers helping themselves with a vengeance, and thought to overcome them by the assumption of heroic airs. He snatched a revolver from his pocket and pointing it at Warhawk's breast, sternly ordered him to leave the house.

"If that's what you're arter," shouted Jack, unsheathing his big bowie, and springing back over the counter, "there's what'll give you a bully full."

Myers still kept the revolver presented, but his hand shook like a leaf in the tempest, and his very lips grew white with terror, and his very feet involuntarily retreated backwards by short, quivering steps. The two feelings, physical fear and moral courage, were struggling for the mastery. He was endeavoring to act bravely, but his nerves refused their concurrence, and he remained, so to speak, in equipoise—totally incapable of acting at all. He was impatient to fight, and as powerless to fly.

There was an hesitation in the conduct of Jack Warhawk. Brandishing his big knife with his right hands, he seized the locks of Myers in his left, roaring at the top of his lungs:

"Down, coward; down on your marrow-bones, or by the blue blazes I'll cut your throat!"

Incredible as it may seem, still holding his deadly revolver, loaded with six rounds, cowered to the floor like a beaten hound, and begged most piteously for his life—a prayer which the mocking half-breed granted on condition that he would treat the crowd for a whole week.

From that time the unfortunate Myers was subject to every species of insult and outrage. The loafers would pull his nose for mere amusement, the half-breeds would spit in his face to make him treat, and Gen. Cole, when intoxicated, would strike him with his cane, to cure him of his cowardice, as he said. The poor grocery keeper brooked all these gross indignities with the patience of a martyr; and would sometimes meekly remonstrate with them thus:

"Gentlemen, it is ungenerous to abuse me thus, for I confess I have no courage—I cannot fight."

This continued for a whole year, when a change occurred that caused the insulters to rue their ignoble persecution. He had a beautiful wife, whom he loved with the tenderest passion. One day, when the husband was absent, the hideous half-breed, Jack Warhawk, instigated to the damning deed by the persuasion of Gen. Cole, went to the grocery keeper's private residence and maltreated his lady in the most shameful manner.

Myers returned home to find his beloved one in tears. He heard the harrowing tale without external manifestation of anger or emotion. His face, it is true, became somewhat pale—his lip quivered an instant, and then settled into an expression rigid as a mouth of iron, and his wild black eye it may be, shot a few more beams of penetrating fire; but he did not mutter curses. He muttered not a whisper of penance, he did not condole or even sympathise with his afflicted wife. He only armed himself with a bowie knife, fourteen inches in the blade, from hilt to point, and started for the village.

He came within sight of his enemy, then promenading the public square and boasting of his villainous achievement. At this vision, Myers lip curled into a horrid smile, and his dark eye melted in a stream of tears. He approached till he stood nearly touching the half-breed, and then said in a horrid whisper:

"Wretch, be quick, draw, for by St. Paul, one of us must die!"

And he waited till the other should be ready for the strife on equal terms. He did not have to wait long, for Jack, understanding that cold, glittering, snaky smile, and those hot, gushing tears, as the certain tokens of murderous madness, immediately unsheathed at the same moment with his adversary, and they began the dreadful combat, which was soon decided. Myers parried three furious blows of the hateful half-breed, and then, grasping his foe's clothing with his left hand, with his other plunged the knife up to the hilt in his heart. The Cherokee fell and expired without a groan.

And now the inward and terrible passions of Myers found vent in appalling explosions. His curses were frightful to hear—he spurned his fallen enemy with his foot, and wished aloud he had a hundred lives so that he might enjoy the pleasure himself of killing him a hundred times over. His wrath then changed for his other insulters. He flew at the loafer Bill Green and tore out his "soap locks" by handfuls. He sprung upon Gen. Cole and pulled his nose till it was flattened between his fingers—all the while that gory knife dripping with blood in his right hand. His enemies were so taken by surprise, terror-stricken stupified, that for a short space they seemed utterly incapable of voluntary motion.

The coward had suddenly become the bravest of the brave. The equipoise of opposite feeling was destroyed forever; the sheer power of pure will had conquered physical fear. Does any one doubt our strange story? Let him address a letter of inquiry to Hon. G. W. Peachel, of Von Buren, late Judge of the Supreme Court of Arkansas, and the fullest confirmation can be obtained.

On the same evening, Gen. Cole called a special council of his friends to consult on the course he should pursue. There was but one opinion—that as he had been insulted by a direct and gross public indignity, he must call his foe to the field of honor. Accordingly on the following day a challenge was dispatched, which Myers promptly accepted, and fixe the time at noon of the same day—the weapons be double barrelled shot guns—distance ten paces, to

The parties met on the sand beach under the bank of the river, above the village, and hundreds collected to witness the issue. The mortal belligerents were placed in a position by their seconds, and the death dealing guns—enormous, double barrels—rested with dark, yawning muzzles on the sand, in their hands. The spectators were much astonished at the strong contrast exhibited by their appearance. Gen. Cole was an old experienced duellist, who had shed human blood before he was eighteen, and had often been engaged in affairs of the kind.

On the contrary, Myers was unacquainted with fire-arms, and had always hitherto been deemed an unmitigated poltroon. And yet, singular to record, the duellist was nervous and agitated, almost trembling, while the reputed coward was calm, firm, steady as a rock, with that appalling smile on his curled lip, and a few scattered tear-drops gleaming in the sun, on his cheek!

Gen. Cole's second gave the word, Fire—one—two—three! He need not, however, have counted so many, for with the second sound "Fire," Myers elevated his piece as quick as thought, and touched the trigger. There was a tremendous roar, and General Cole, the duellist, reeled. His head was pierced with twenty buck-shot.

No one ever again called Myers a coward in Arkansas—no one even thought of the term, as his shadow glanced by the sun-light. He had taken his degrees in the college of desperation, and his diploma was written in blood!

He became a politician of great notoriety—a leader in that section of the State; was repeatedly elected to the Legislature, where he acquired distinction by his talents, but still more by his fearless daring, having recently obtained the commission of Major General of the militia. We may expect before long to see his name in the roll of Members of Congress. Nature made him a coward; love for his insulted wife rendered him brave; and bravery has conferred honor.

Destruction of the Rosalie by Fire.—Our citizens were alarmed by the cry of fire, about 1 o'clock yesterday morning. Upon repairing to the scene of conflagration it proved to proceed from the large, new and beautiful ferry boat Rosalie, built, and but a short time used, for the conveyance of passengers and freight, to and from Vidalia, La. The fire occurred at the Natches landing—burning most of the upper works, leaving the hull and machinery as the only remnants of that splendid ferry boat. In escaping from the flames, we learn that one of the pilots was severely blistered in his feet.

Shocking Tragedies in the Fourth District.—A Lady murdered and the Murderer killed, and a Wife murdered by her Husband.—On Saturday night there were two bloody tragedies, in different parts of the Fourth District, at nearly the same hour.

The beginning and the ending of the first tragedy was shown before the Coroner, to be as follows:

About two months ago, an Irishman, named Edward Wisely, a blacksmith in the employ of Patrick Irwin, went to the house of Captain Joseph Gibson, at the corner of Fourth and Apollo streets, and began abusing, in a very outrageous manner, an Irish servant girl employed there, with whom he was on terms of intimacy; Captain Gibson being absent at the time, in the pursuit of his calling as pilot on the river. Mrs. Gibson interfered in behalf of the girl, requesting Wisely not to come insulting a distinguished about the house while her husband was absent. Wisely thereupon abused her as family as he did the girl, and left. When Captain G. came home, his wife informed him of the matter, and he went after Wisely. The latter, so far from apologizing for his offence, swore that he would go wherever he pleased and talk as he pleased to any body, upon which the Captain knocked him down. Wisely never openly resented the punishment; but soon showed that he sought revenge in assassination. The Captain several times, at night, found him lurking near his premises in a suspicious manner, and on one occasion detected him crawling after him, through the grass, on his hands and knees; each time, however, Wisely would vanish into the darkness, and the Captain was content to let him go.

On Saturday night, the Captain was on a visit to a neighbor, residing on Apollo street, about a square below his residence, when he encountered Wisely there. He thought it best to make friends with him, if possible, and so spoke to him in a friendly manner, and suggested that it would be better to let bye gones be bye-gones, etc. Wisely, however, rejected these suppositions in a surly and skulking manner. Soon afterwards Mrs. Gibson went to the house for her husband, and they started home, in company with a gentleman who was going the same way; it being about 11 o'clock. When near the corner of Fourth street the gentleman bid Gibson farewell and beheld Wisely hurrying up behind them with a big table knife in his hand. He stopped and asked him what he wanted. Wisely told him with an oath it was none of his business. Mrs. Gibson turned also, and exclaimed, "Wisely, what are you following us for? Go away!" Wisely immediately sprang at the Captain, and gave him a desperate cut in the right arm below the shoulder; the Captain jumped around, and the assassin aimed a second blow, which cut him in the left elbow; Mrs. Gibson then jumped in front of her husband to protect him, when the assassin gave her a stab in the abdomen. By this time, the Captain had drawn a little dagger, which, with the desperation inspired by the circumstances, he drove to the hilt in the assassin's heart. The assassin fell and died instantly without a groan, his own knife splitting his arm as he fell. The Captain then bore his wife fully the house, the fall happened on the banquette in front of his residence, and coming out, declared that he had killed the Irishman, and surrendered himself to a friend whom he met, requesting him to take him to jail. This the friend refused to do, seeing that the Captain had acted purely in self defence. The Captain staid up, waiting on his wife, for some hours afterwards, but had finally to go to bed. It is thought he will lose the use of his right arm, the flesh being cut through to the bone. Mrs. Gibson's wound was pronounced mortal; and at noon yesterday, her physicians expressed the opinion that she could not survive till this morning.

Wisely fell on his face when stabbed. When he was turned over, he was perfectly still, and held the bowie knife firmly grasped in his hand; so stiffly that both his thumbs were broken in detaching it from his hand. His weapon was a huge hunting-bladed affair, with a blade eight or ten inches long and two inches wide. The Captain's weapon was a small black-handled dagger, the blade bearing these words: "Never draw me without reason; nor sheath me without honor."

Deputy Coroner Mitchell held an inquest on Wisely's body, and, after a post-mortem examination, which showed that the dagger had nearly severed the third rib, and pierced the right lung, pericardium and aorta of the heart, gave a verdict in accordance with the facts, to-wit: that death was caused by the said wound, and that the wound was inflicted by Capt. Gibson in defence of his life and that of his wife. Wisely was twenty nine years of age, and married. His wife stated before the Coroner that he had gone to bed, but that after lying there awhile, got up, dressed, and went off, as if acting under a sudden impulse.

The following are the particulars of the other tragedy. Michael Higgins, a young Irishman, following the occupation of a cotton-sampler, went home to his residence on Eighth street, between Annedes and Prytania, at about 11 o'clock, drunk, and shot his wife Sarah in the abdomen with a double-barrel shot gun, from the effects of which she died about five hours afterwards.

From the testimony before the Coroner, it appeared that the deceased told these persons who came to her assistance, that her husband had come home drunk, and ordered her out of bed, to get him a drink of water. She told him the pitcher was on the table, and that he might wait upon himself. At that he seized a double-barrel shot gun that he always kept in the house; she sprang from the bed, ran out of the room, closed the door after her, and stooped behind it. Her husband fired; and the load passed through the door and into her, the shot and splinters of the door tearing a great hole in her abdomen, above the navel, mangling her stomach and intestines, and causing her to bleed dreadfully. The report of the gun and her shrieks brought the neighbors in; a cry was raised for the watch, but no watchman came.

Higgins staid, seemingly being sober enough to stand and talk, but seemingly too drunk or crazy to realize what he had done. One of the gentlemen who came and endeavored to assist the poor wife, asked Higgins to go for a physician he started, but changed his motion and told the gentleman to go himself. After that he started out in quest of groceries, and returned in about an hour. In ingenious mood, he went to the bed and offered to kiss his wife; but the injured man indignantly telling him that he had murdered her, and that he would yet meet his just reward. "He then went and kissed the baby, and for a time seemed to be very much affected. A brother of his, on arriving exclaimed, "I wish you and that gun were in hell." To which he replied, "Take care, it may send you to the same place."

A gentleman who was present, informs us that while the doctors were sewing up Mrs. Higgins' wound, the nurse of a tenement looked calmly on, and finally remarked, "It must be a good thing for you doctors that such accidents happen once in a while—it gives you practice!" Some one remarked, "You're a d—d brute!" to which he replied meekly, "No, I don't think I am a brute." Finally, an adventurous watchman, who had got wind of the affair arrived, and concluded to arrest Higgins.

At the jail, he confessed the deed, but claimed to have done it accidentally. Half an hour after his arrest, his poor wife died. Before dying, she stated that it had been a habit of her husband, when drunk, to scare her with the gun, and that he had often threatened to shoot her. One witness testified to the fact, that Higgins once chased his wife out into the yard with the gun cocked. A gentleman of our acquaintance, who was one of the first to go to Mrs. Higgins' assistance, states that she told him that she did not think her husband intended to kill her—that it was a foolish habit he had of scaring her when drunk, etc.

After the investigation, and, a post mortem examination, a verdict in accordance with the facts was rendered—that the deceased met her death at the hands of her husband, etc. Whether the killing was a murder or not, will be for a jury to determine. The deceased was a native of England, 21 years of age; had been married but a few years; and leaves a child sick with the measles.

AMONG THE MANY PERILOUS DISEASES

OF CHILDHOOD, Worms may be ranked as the most common and the most dangerous. Perhaps we ought rather to speak in the past tense than the present, for since the introduction of WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE, the diseases has had no terrors for those acquainted with the virtues of the medicine. Its operation is direct and rapid unless it pertains no spiritual substance, it may be given without hesitation to the youngest inmate of the nursery.

☞ Be particular and send for the name "Winer's Canadian Vermifuge." This is the only article that can be depended on. For sale in New Orleans, wholesale and retail, by

☞ When Machaon, the Greek Physician was slain, Homer said of him, "a good Physician is worth as much as a whole army." Thus a good medicine like AYER'S CATHARTIC PILLS is worth a great deal more, because in cases as well as whole armies, lives only are sought to be taken. The circle of the Physician's labor must be narrow, while such a remedy is available to all—as he has by every-body, and is every-where.

MEDICAL CARD.

W. ROSENHEIMER, M. D., would respectfully inform his friends of the South and Southwest, that he has permanently located himself in the city of New York where he will continue to devote his whole attention to the medical and surgical treatment of Chronic Diseases, especially those of the Lower Bowel—such as Fistula, Constipation, Fistula, Prolapsus Ani, Falling of the Bowel, etc. He has devoted a number of years to the treatment of these diseases, in Louisville, Ky. and New Orleans, La.; and for the success attending his peculiar practice as well as other information on the subject, he refers to his work on those diseases, lately published by J. S. Redfield, of New York, especially addressed to commercial travelers, and for sale at the bookstores of H. M. NORMAN and J. C. MORGAN, New Orleans.

Startling and Interesting Facts

CONCERNING

CHOLERA, DIARRHŒA, DYSENTERY, COLIC,

AND

Summer Complaints, etc.

A fact that should excite in the consciousness of sickness in the bowels, a slight diarrhœa coming on, which is little thought of in a short time, in a few hours, perhaps seldom days. It is attended with sickness of the stomach, a most sinking, weakness, rapid discharges, coldness, cramps, agonies, darkness, collapse, DEATH—and yet all this fatal result from a disregard of the warning, premonitory Diarrhœa and neglect of a sure provision of a safe and sure remedy that kind Providence has made easy to all.

This remedy is made public from the strongest desire to rescue the exposed, under the best substantial conviction that it is certain in its good effects, and with it on hand, no one dreading the warning and using the remedy, need be a victim to the Cholera.

DR. BILLINGS'

CARMINATIVE and ASTRINGENT SYRUP

IS THIS SURE REMEDY.

By the advice and urgent request of hundreds, whose lives have been saved—I dare even when apparently in the very last agonies of death—he has been induced to make still more efforts to give a valid publicity to a remedy so greatly successful.

The perfection which he add others ascribe to this remedy may appear beyond the power of medicine to possess; yet the truthfulness of the claim is most thoroughly established, and will be fully confirmed by calling on the individuals who have witnessed its effects, and used it with complete success, some of whose names we are authorized to give.

For Cholera, Colic, Cholera Morbus, Dysentery, Diarrhœa, Bloody Flux, Summer Complaint and Weakness of the Bowels, this medicine is offered as a certain remedy. This is the medicine that arrested that horrible disease so prevalent among the Mexican soldiers. The effects first commenced its use, after which they rapidly threw off disease, and gained in every case without an exception. I would refer to the officers and others who served in the war with Mexico. Sold by SPLENDID ARCHITECTURAL WORK.

CHAPEL AND CHURCH ARCHITECTURE, with designs for PARSONAGES. By GEORGE BOWLER, Roxbury, Mass.

This work is designed to meet a want which has been long felt. Among all denominations of Christians, plans for chapels and churches of moderate cost have been needed, from which committees may select one appropriate to their wants, and not too expensive for their means. This want the author has endeavored to meet, by presenting a series of designs, ranging in estimated cost from $1,500 to $20,000. He has attempted to adapt the plans for country and village churches, and commend themselves to the good taste of all. The working plans for the drawings are not furnished, for the reason that the work would be too costly, but all such plans and specifications can be had on application to the author. The principal design of the work, however, is to enable committees to decide on some one design, in making application to an architect, so that they may convey their ideas and wishes clearly. With this end in view, the work is commended to the public.

At a meeting of the Boston Conference of Methodist Ministers, the following resolution in regard to the above elegant and timely work, was passed unanimously:

BOSTON, Feb. 25, 1856.—The Committee appointed to examine Plans of Churches, Architecture, by Rev. George Bowler, have attended to their duty as far as they have been able, and would report the following:

Resolved, That the Plans and Sketches of Church Architecture, drawn and drawn by our brother, Rev. George Bowler, evince a rare high degree, combining, as they do, taste and skill in execution, combining in themselves, to an extent seldom equalled, beauty, economy and convenience; and we feel confident that the publication of the work would be of essential service to the churches in this country.

This superb work is now ready, in one elegant folio volume, containing over forty elegantly executed Lithographic Designs, with accompanying plans, and specifications, in the richest style of art, bound in cloth, price $10 per copy, with a liberal discount by the hundred. DIGESTED THEOLOGY.

NUMBER TWO.

Mr. Editor:—The Advocate which brought out our first number contained another article also, infinitely more worthy of the title than our own. There was more Theology in it and it was better Digested. It was a brave and clear note from the trumpet of one who is posted on the outer portions of the work, but whose voice is worthy of being heard in the highest citadel. To my mind not one utterance of the press has been so full of the deep, spiritual life of christianity, rendered intelligent (but alas I fear unintelligible also) by the most profound study, as the communication made upon the "Theologia Germanica." If the church does not hear that voice it will be because she is guilty of all that deadness which it charges upon her.

There can be no question that a vast deal yet remains for the church to do in her various outward functions, such as education, literature, missions, etc., but is not the spiritual function after all, the one which is the most important, and may I not add, the most deficient? Upon this depends the life and power of all the others. Through the former the church connects herself with the world, but through the later she stands connected with God. Nor can she effect anything in the former relation without standing fast by the latter. Too much cannot be done to develope the church outwardly, unless it be done to the neglect of her inward life and piety. But while we are generating steam and endeavoring to increase the pressure upon every square inch of our surface, we should not forget to keep water in the boilers.

We have a book Mr. Editor, in which these things are presented somewhat in their relative proportions. I refer to the work of Professor Sasnett on Progress. It is a work worthy of extensive circulation and deep reflection in the church. It is philosophically and practically true. We call attention to it, however, not so much as the theme of the following remarks, as being an excellent advocate for them. It will prove a sort of practical commentary to enforce and apply the suggestions we would make to the church.

The religious condition of the world previous to the introduction of christianity may be regarded as negative.—That is, God on account of sin had withdrawn or withheld the influences of His Spirit in a great degree from the hearts of men. Now, the religion of Jesus Christ being introduced as a positive and attracting power, finds its antagonism in the dead and fruitless state of the world. But that very antagonism becomes its exciting cause—and the theory of christianity is, that when its attraction shall have had a perfect operation upon the world, then all that has yielded to its gracious influence is to be gathered around the throne of God, while all that insulated itself or repelled this influence is to be cast into outer darkness.

The world then constitutes, so to speak, one vast machine for the operation of this moral power, and each individual a lesser machine—a wheel within a wheel.

Now the power of this spiritual electricity is infinite, and its supply endless—only on proper conditions. These conditions are to be supplied by the church, as the willing and intelligent agent for their operations.

Now we do not believe that God will work through this machinery by any sort of moral necessity, but that he requires his creatures to become co-workers with him, so that these moral arrangements may require continual adjustment and adaptation. New discoveries and new applications are to be made. New points of contact are to be formed with the world, new lines of moral lightning to be set up, etc.—But after all the first thing is to stand right with the generating, or in this case regenerating power. How is the church with God? What is the present condition of her inward life, of which all outward acts are the mere expression? If God's prophets should speak again to Israel, how would they address her? Would it be, "Ye have robbed me, even this whole nation, in tithes and offerings!" Truly we are liable to this accusation, but we do not suppose it would begin here, for where a criminal has committed two capital offenses he is only charged with one. Would not the indictment rather read then, "Hear O my people and I will speak, O Israel and I will testify against thee; I am God, even thy God. I will not reprove thee for thy sacrifices or thy burnt offerings to have been continually before me. I will take no bullock out of thy house, no he goat out of thy folds; for every beast of the forest is mine, and the cattle upon a thousand hills. If I were hungry I would not tell thee, for the world is mine and the fullness thereof. Offer unto God thanksgiving, and pay thy vows to the most High, and call upon me in the day of trouble and I will deliver thee and thou shalt glorify me."

But unto the wicked God saith, "what hast thou to do to declare my statutes, or that thou shouldst take my covenant in thy mouth, seeing thou hatest instruction and cast my words behind thee?" Whoso offereth praise glorifieth me, and to him that ordereth his conversation aright will I show the salvation of God."

A pious church, a consecrated ministry, and a divine influence, constitute a power alike superior to internal friction and outward opposition. Is it not for want of this power that we see so many failures in the use of means which were formerly successful. As for instance the irrepressible dullness and formality of a class meeting held under the rule, and not in obedience to a spiritual impulse—the frequent instances of unsuccessful protracted meetings which are never put in the Advocate—the dry defunctness of sermons that were once eloquent, but resemble now the noiseless thunder of a vacuum—the frequent attempts made to convert the old ship of Zion into life again by slipping wheels under her sides to help her to roll when she cannot sail. Whence is all this but from a want of spiritual power?

And again, how fearful the reactionary influence upon the church when she makes a failuere—as if there was no residue of the spirit—as if all her strength had been put forth in a single effort, and that being unsuccessful all must be lost. Such reactions indicate a reliance upon human means, an acting from human motives. It is charity, and that alone which moves faith—that works as hard in defeat as in the certain prospect of victory, because she looks not at the things which are seen—her expectation is from God. We do not mean, Mr. Editor, to describe the church as being absolutely in a worse condition than hitherto—our statements will stand upon a different theory. The issue of light as it widens, increases the outline of the surrounding darkness—and thus christianity as it advances, may reveal, and will reveal, more and more to be done till the last day. But let it be remembered that while the church is continually increasing her responsibility with the world, she may not always keep the adequate power to meet it. And this is precisely our condition at this time. Our past progress and experience as a church has given us a wide field, a high position and ample means to do good—but we cannot use them as we once used feebler means with mighty success, because God is not with us in the same perfection that he was then.

This is no question then of old fogy and Young America—of the rejection of old means or the use of new ones—it is a question of our relation to God. Is he in the camp and in the tent? Is it under his banner that we fight, or under some ecclesiastical standard? Do we prevail in spite of our weakness; or do we fail in spite of our strength?

These suggestions, Mr. Editor, may be pursued in future, more particularly as to our doctrines, discipline and usages.

ALIQUIS.

THE VICKSBURG SABBATH-SCHOOL.

The heart of the fathers seems to be turning to the children of the church, and this is one of the good signs of the times.

The Trio Witness gives an account of a "celebration," by the "scholars and teachers of the Methodist Sunday-School in Vicksburg" that came off last Thursday fortnight, in which the publisher by invitation joined. Captain Holmes, of the magnificent steamer Princess, gave them an excursion.—Good things were seen, said, sung and eaten. The Princess proceeded a few miles above Miliken's Bend. The Superintendent, R. D. Howe, Gov. McRae, Ex-Mayor Byrne and Mayor Folkes made addresses. The Witness says:

Gov. McRae, in his response, was peculiarly happy and appropriate, adapting his remarks to the understanding of the juvenile portion of his audience. He commenced by saying that he would not detain them by a long speech—that during his life he had devoted himself rather to the temporal than the spiritual welfare of his fellow citizens; but was always ready and willing on every fit occasion, to add his testimony to the influence exerted by Sabbath-Schools on the side of truth, morality and virtue. As the Executive of the State, and the representative of the people of the State of Mississippi, he was proud to sanction by his presence, a festival commemorative of an institution that had done so much to elevate the character of the people of the State—that the Common Schools, so called, and the Sabbath-Schools of our country, were, in his opinion, the methods by which right principles are instilled in the tender minds of our children, and which will hereafter render them capable of self-government. He concluded by paying a compliment to the teachers of the school, and the parents and friends of the children—inviting them (the children) to come forward and shake hands with Mrs. McRae and himself—that he considered them all his children, the children of Mississippi.

For the N. O. Christian Advocate.

What we Want.

1st. That the people shall understand the work our Book and Tract Society is anxious to do, is trying to do. To circulate all over our conference a good, moral and religious literature. This is laudable, philanthropic, christianlike. There is great destitution in many portions of our conference. To do our duty we must make the effort to supply the people with books and tracts.

2d. That our members and friends would regard this as an annual claimant on their liberality. The work cannot be done in one, five, nor ten years. Nor will one, five, ten or twenty thousand dollars be sufficient for the work. One-half the last sum could be profitably used annually for the next five years—might be found to be only a tithe of what is absolutely necessary.—For, as we work, the field enlarges—as we supply, the demand increases. It is so with the American Tract Society and the American Bible Society. With all the pecuniary aid they get, and thousands to work in the cause, the demands are greater than they can meet at all times. But for the continued stream of contributions they are receiving they would be bankrupt in less than three months. How much then must our Society be pressed? seeing our receipts up to this time have been so small—much smaller than the demands made on us.

3d. That all the preachers of the conference should present the claims of our Society to their several congregations and invite them to contribute for our relief. That they also procure a blank book, in which the names of all who give any thing shall be written, and this book handed with the plan to the next preacher, who, we hope, will do good service for the cause. Will the preachers consider this request, (it is made by the Board of Managers,) and act on it? Do, brethren, and remit to me at Vicksburg as frequently as circumstances will allow. All giving ten dollars or above that, are entitled to receive one half the amount back in books and tracts.

4th. That we want money for the following purposes, viz: First—To enable us to publish books and tracts. All know this cannot be done without money. And as Dr. Winans has put some miscellaneous sermons in my hands to be published for the benefit of our Book and Tract Society, in tract form, provided I can get the means to pay first for their publication, I desire to receive some contributions for that specific object. Are there not several of his old, warm friends who will respond to this call? I trust there are, and that I shall soon receive the amount necessary for this object. Second—To enable us to reduce the price of works already published, so that our books may be put in the pecuniary reach of the poor. Some regard this as a better work than to give the books.—Third—To enable us to give books and tracts to the poor. There are many of these in our bounds. They will not be supplied unless we give to them, because they are not able to buy. They are the Lord's poor, and if we give to them it is lending to the Lord, who will repay us for all we do. Read 41st Psalm, first and third verse.

5th. That every preacher, local, itinerant or supernumate, should feel that he has a special work to do in distributing our books and tracts, and in collecting funds for our cause. Is there a preacher in the bounds of this conference, local, itinerant or supernumate, who could not dispose of from twenty-five to fifty dollars worth of books if he would devote only as much as three or four days to the work? Is there one who might not raise from ten to fifty dollars if he were to try, and others hundreds? Will each try? Brother will you? The amount you may raise, however small, will help. Will you send for the books too? I wait to see and hear. The work grows in importance.

A GEM FROM AN OLD BOOK.—It has been frequently and truly said, that if Christianity were compelled to flee from the mansions of the great, the academies of philosophers, the halls of legislators, or the throngs of busy men, we should find her last retreat with women at the fireside. Her last audience would be the children gathering round the knee of a mother; the last sacrifice, the secret prayer, escaping in silence from her lip, and heard, perhaps, only at the throne of God.

The Canadian papers contradict the statement that the British government has issued an order prohibiting military companies from this side from crossing into Canada with their arms.

For the N. O. Christian Advocate.

To the Talladega District.

THE BANNER CIRCUIT.

Mr. Editor:—Through the columns of the Advocate I desire to speak to the preachers and the people of the Talladega District in regard to our collections. And first, the conference collection is one of paramount importance, and one that each preacher should present earnestly and faithfully. For many of our brethren are labouring faithfully and effectively on works where the people are either not able or willing to support them; for these, we, that are more fortunate ought to feel a deep and abiding interest. And then the widows, orphans, and superannuated men, must not be forgotten. At the last Alabama conference, the board of finance assessed to this district only three hundred dollars. As one of the preachers of the district I am ashamed of the assessment. Surely the members of the financial board knew but little of the resources of this rich and beautiful country, of broad and waving harvest fields. But I should feel much more ashamed, if with this low apportionment we should fail to get it. And if we do fail, I am disposed to free the people from any blame. If the preachers present this claim the people will respond. But, too frequently, this, and other collections, are not forthcoming, because of the selfishness of the preachers. A fear, that to press these claims, will forstall the quarterage claim; and the good steward, the money Ajax of the circuit is whispering in his ear, "Brother stay thy hand, you are taking from thyself." From eight years' experience and observation in the itinerant work, I am clearly of opinion, that a liberal conference and missionary collection, never did, never will, curtail the preacher's receipts one dime, but always tends to increase his chance in getting his claim. If the people are able to pay and do not, it is self evident it is because of pemiriousness. Make a crevice into this pent up stinginess, and the here will flow out into every channel.

Liberality, in a great many instances, is habit. If the people are taught that it is their duty to give, and to give liberally, "as the Lord has prospered them," they will very soon get into the habit of giving liberally, and it then becomes a matter of course and they do not feel that it hurts them.

The amount of conference collection assessed to this district, has been apportioned to the several circuits (for we have no stations) according to ability to pay. Each preacher knows the amount he is expected to raise. And if he does his duty he is certain to get it.

I have no begging qualities more than ordinarily falls to the lot of any preacher. And I have in hand now, the whole of the amount apportioned to my circuit, all received at one collection and at one place, leaving me nine other places to operate at, if I needed more. Now Brethren, let us act in concert in this matter so as to be sure to report the amount that the figures call for. I make this proposition: If any of you towards the end of the year find that you are going to fail for good cause, write to me the amount that you will lack, and I will collect it on my circuit. I do not this, boastingly, but to stir up a laudable emulation in your minds, that we may be able to represent this district pecuniarily as it ought to be, carrying up its proportion of all the collections.

I wish also, to speak of the missionary collection. The thirty thousand dollars must come. We are expected to raise twelve hundred and fifty. We can do this almost without an effort, I mean special effort. Now Brethren, if there is a failure, let us say by the grace of God it shall not be here. We can raise twenty-five hundred dollars easy. I intend to raise twice the amount that my circuit is called upon for. And one, and all, I give you fair warning, I intend to have the banner circuit in this district.

The Praying Preacher.

The godly Welsh preacher, Mr. Williams, of Wern, said, "The old ministers were not much better preachers than we are, and in many respects they were inferior; but there was an unction about their ministry, and success attendant upon it, now but seldom seen. And what is the cause of the difference? They prayed more than we do. If we would prevail and have power with men, we must first prevail and have power with God. It was on his knees that Jacob became a prince; and if we would become princes, we must be oftener and more importunate upon our knees."

He loved to tell an anecdote of Rev. Griffith, of Caernarvon, who was to preach one night in a farm house, and some time before the service began, wished to retire to a private room. He remained there some time after the congregation assembled. As there was no sign of the preacher making his appearance, the good man of the house sent the servant to request him to come, as the people had been some time waiting. On approaching the door, she heard what she supposed to be a conversation carried on between two persons in rather a subdued tone of voice. She stood listening at the door, and heard one say to the other, "I will not go, unless thou come with me." The girl returned to her master, and said, "There is some one with Mr. Griffith, and he tells him that he will not come unless the other accompany him. I did not hear the other make a reply, so I conclude he will not come from there to-night." "Yes, yes, he will," said the good man; and the Other will come with him, if matters are as you represent them. We shall begin the service by singing and reading till the two come. At length Mr. Griffith came, and the "Other," with him, and they had an extraordinary meeting that night. It proved the commencement of a powerful revival in the neighborhood, and many were converted to God. "Nothing brethren, Mr. Williams would say, "is necessary to render our ministry as efficient and successful as that of our fathers, but that we should be brought to the same spirit and mind."

A Father, and his Sons.

Rev. Dr. Hewit, of Connecticut, a venerable member of the late General Assembly, when that body was about to engage in devotional exercises, arose and stated that both his sons and all his grand children had apostatized to the Roman Catholic faith, and were now in the dungeons of Antichrist, and requested the Assembly to pray for their restoration, which was done.—On the succeeding day one of them addressed the following pert note to the Moderator:

REV. AND DEAR SIR.—I take this opportunity to express my acknowledgments to the Old School General Assembly, for the honor done to myself and family, by making us the subjects of the prayers of that distinguished body.

I beg leave to say that I shall ever regard the manifestation of kindness thus exhibited, with sentiments of the deepest gratitude.

As a slight return for the unusual and most numerited favor, of public prayers by the Old School Presbyterian General Assembly I invoke with humility and profound sincerity in behalf of the General Assembly, for each individual member, and most especially for my venerable and beloved father the powerful intercession of the Mother of God, Blessed Mary ever Virgin, Conceived without original sin, of blessed Michael and Gabriel and all the holy angels, of blessed Peter and Paul and all the Holy Apostles and Martyrs; of St. Ann, St. Agnes and all holy Virgins and Widows, of St. Ignatius de Loyola and St. Alphonsus, of St. Gregory VII, and all the Saints in Heaven and the faithful on earth, with the Lord our God, that it and they may be converted from their present attitude of hostility and rebellion, readmitted to the one fold, and reconciled to the one Shepherd.

With the highest personal respect I am, Rev. Sir, your humble and obliged servant in Christ.

BAPTISM OF THE IMPERIAL BABY.—Speaking of the enormous outlay of money on that occasion, the Paris correspondent of the N. Y. Daily Times, says: Apropos of this subject, it appears that the baptism of the first Napoleon's son, the King of Rome, in 1811, cost 600,000 francs; the baptism of the Duke of Bordeaux, Count de Chambord, in 1821, 81,000 francs. The coronation of Napoleon I., cost 1,745,840 francs; his marriage with Maria Louise cost 2,670,932 francs; the funeral of Louis XVIII., comprising indemnities paid to theatres, cost 1,500,000 francs; the coronation of Charles X., cost the enormous and unexampled sum of 7,532,400 francs 23 centimes; the marriage of the Duke of Orleans cost 600,000 francs. Compared with similar events of more ancient periods, these sums are enormous. Saint-Simon complains of the exhorbitant expenses which attended the funeral of the Grand Dauphin in 1711, which amounted to 48,000 francs 3 sous 11 centimes!

We are informed, says the Albany Knickerbocker, that pretty substantial clues have been obtained to the person who perpetrated the forgeries on the Bank of the Capitol. It is said that he is the same person who sometime since perpetrated a forgery on the Mechanics' Bank of the City of New York for $3000, for which he was arrested and held to bail in the sum of $6000. His trial was to have come off in New York city on the 13th inst., but he left for Europe in the steamer, and the amount of bail for which he was held for trial, was paid in default of his appearance, the full amount ($6000) in part by bills on the Bank of the Capitol of this city, of the denomination of $50 each. If this be the fact, as we are informed from a respectable source, there is a fair chance of his escaping the demands of justice, and the punishment he so much deserves.

The Senate have confirmed the nomination of J. C. Murray, Esq., to be the United States District Attorney for the Eastern District of Arkansas, vice T. B. Luckie, Esq., resigned.

FOUR DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMSHIP ARAGO.

The U. S. mail steamship Arago, Capt. Lines, from Havre and Southampton, June 4th, arrived at New York on the 18th inst. with four days later news.

By this steamer we have the French and English mails.

The French steam propeller Alma, which left Havre dock June 3, for New York, was at anchor off Havre when the Arago left, something being the matter with her screw; 40 of her passengers left and came by the Arago.

Ex-President Fillmore was passenger on board the Arago from Havre to Cowes, and will return to America by the Atlantic, leaving Liverpool June 11th.

The Central American question was assuming a feature of considerable interest and importance in England—the news received by the Hermann and America having added considerably to the excitement previously existing. It was the means of calling forth the literary powers of the various English Journals.

The Times, in an article on the 2d inst., says that the administration of Gen. Pierce had taken another step on that downward course to which it had resolutely addicted itself ever since its entrance upon special duties. The President, it states, had used every endeavor to complicate relations already grievously entangled and had used his utmost to embitter feelings on both sides the Atlantic already needlessly and wantonly irritated.

After explaining the causes of the difficulties, and stating that they had been produced by the wishes of a large class of voters at the forthcoming Presidential election, who would be delighted if seeing the government of the United States indentified with an enterprise such as that of Walker and his associates, alludes to that portion of the President's message to the Senate which recognizes the government of Walker as a government de facto.

The effect of such a step, the Times continues, will be to send to Walker and his associates hundreds of unquiet spirits from every part of the Union, and to involve the United States virtually, though not ostensibly, in a war with Costa Rica and Guatemala. The preference on which this step has been taken, are extremely flimsy and transparent. Walker's government is for the moment in possession of power, and may therefore be called, by straining of language, a government de facto, but it is in imminent danger of being overthrown from day to day, by a combination of neighboring States who are waging against it a war of extermination, and it occupies such a position that no impartial government, willing to hold the scales evenly between it and the government it has supplanted, could have dreamt of recognizing its existence as an independent State.

After questioning the right of the United States to recognize the position of Walker, upon the ground that his government was founded upon laws totally adverse to those of the country, the article thus concludes:

"It is an alarming manifestation of the ideas which actuate the American Government and leads to most disagreeable anticipations as to the probability of an amicable solution of any dispute with men who seem to recognize no other law than their wishes and their passions. But it is no cause of war; it is not even necessarily ground of diplomatic complaint. The Clayton-Bulwer treaty has not been in terms violated, and it may probably be expedient in the present critical state of the relations between the two countries rather to pass this matter by in silence than to incur the risk of introducing fresh difficulty into a discussion already sufficiently perilous, or give an excuse to those who are even now only ready to seek an occasion of quarrel. If war do come we must meet it as we may. Let us at any rate have the satisfaction of reflecting that this greatest of human calamities has not been precipitated by an undue sensitiveness or any avoidable interference on our part."

The above remarks are followed by another article on the 3d, as a continuation of the subject. The writer says that the dismissal of Mr. Crampton, and that of Mr. Dallas which must immediately follow, by no means imply a state of war, or are even necessary preludes to that dire calamity. Peace may be maintained with America, though without any diplomatic representative. It presumes that with the Presidential election will close the warlike feeling which pervades the Washington cabinet, and closes by enjoining a temperate policy so as if possible to prevent a quarrel rather than to seek establishing one.

In the money article of the same journal, similar feelings are expressed. After alluding to the arguments used to justify the recognition of Walker, it says that so far as the Government of Walker being accepted by the people, he could only maintain himself by shooting Gen. Corral, the head of the Nicaraguan army, and by threatening with a similar fate every citizen who should be found, by word or writing, to have encouraged the slightest resistance to his hand. It was also notorious that the only means of supplying himself with funds, was by levying contributions on all the inhabitants, foreign as well as native. In relation to the readiness of the United States to recognize all established Governments without reference to their origin, it is pointed out that the Republic of Liberia, which has been recognized for years, and all the leading Governments of Europe had vainly sought the same advantages from the Cabinet at Washington, the reason for the refusal being that its people belong to a colored race. The article concludes by remarking that the enthusiasm on the subject, at New Orleans, was to be attributed to a desire for the extension of slavery.

The English journals of the 4th continue their remarks respecting the American affairs. The Times, from further information it had received, considered that war was becoming daily more imminent, whilst the Daily News adheres to the improbability of such an event, and advises great caution and forbearance on the part of the admiral and captains of the ships stationed round about the shores of North America.

The Times, in a leader of some length, scoffs at the idea of a war on the part of Spain with Mexico, and considers it more like a dream to amuse the imagination than a serious incident in the sober domain of reality. It says that not a month would pass from the day that the first of the half-dozen ships which constitute the Spanish navy had driven into Vera Cruz the brig which constitutes the navy of Mexico, when swiftly and sharply the Government at Washington would intervene in the discussion and remove its solution to the bay of Havana.

The question of the Danish Sound Dues is at last brought under the consideration of Parliament. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had given notice that, on the 6th inst., he should move for a Select Committee to inquire into their operation, and to consider to what degree they were detrimental to the commerce of the country.

On the 6th inst., Her Majesty laid the foundation stone of the new military college to be erected to the memory of the late F. M. Duke of Wellington.

Although the poisoner, Palmer, has been tried, convicted and sentenced to be hung, yet many doubts existed in some of the English minds as to the actual proof of the prisoner's guilt. The medical profession are in part annoyed at the preference which was given to the testimony of some of the witnesses, and requests have been made to have the body of Cook exhumed soon to make another analysis, it being guarantied that if poison was administered it is possible of detection.

France.

From the Lyons papers we learn that the whole country in the vicinity of that city had been overflowed by a rapid rise in the rivers Rhone and Spane. A great deal of distress had been the result, large numbers of the poor classes of villagers having been thus deprived of all they possessed. On the news being received at Paris, the Emperor hastened to visit the scene of the inundation in person, and distributed 100,000 francs among the sufferers. At last accounts the water was subsiding.

ACCIDENTS ON THE RAILROAD.—We are poined to learn, that at Osyka, in this county, on the 10th inst., a child of four years of age, son of Joseph Clovier, an employee on the New Orleans and Jackson Railroad, was accidentally run over and killed by a train of freight cars. The child, we understand, was playing upon the cow-catcher while the locomotive was at a stand still, and a train backing up threw the little fellow off and passed over him, crushing him to death.

We also learn that as the gravel train was going into the city from Osyka, on the 11th inst., with nineteen heavily loaded cars, the engine ran off the track, when within a mile of the city, carrying with it the tender and several of the cars, and throwing off the engineer, conductor and firemen, and killing the conductor, Mr. Clark. The others escaped without injury. The locomotive, the new James Robb, was considerably damaged. It was thought the late rains there had washed up the embankment and undermined the track, causing the rails to spread, and throwing the locomotive off, as being the cause of the accident. The passenger train up failed to reach Osyka at the time due on that day in consequence.

MYSTERIOUS.—We are informed that a woman was found floating in the Bayou a few days since. Her head was severed from her body, and she appeared to be dressed in her night clothes. A coroner's inquest was held over her, we suppose, but we have not heard the verdict.—[Plaquemine Sentinel, 21st.

Later from Panama and Aspinwall.

We have received files of the Aspinwall Courier as late as the 3d inst., containing some items of interest.

The approaching elections were the principal topics which agitated the people of the Isthmus. The elections are to come off as follows:

For President of the Republic, on July 20th.

For Governor of the State of Panama, June 29th.

For members of the State Legislature, June 30th.

For States' Attorney and Judges of the Superior Court, July 13th.

The following gentlemen were candidates for President of the Republic: Manuel Murillo Toro, of the Red Republican party, and Gen. T. C. Mosquera, Liberal.

Speaking of the health of Aspinwall, the Courier says that mosquitos and sandflies are the only trouble they have. The town is perfectly quiet and healthy. Several merchants have received new stocks of goods, and business was improving in consequence, and quite a number of new places of business had been opened. There was an United States vessel of war in the port of Aspinwall up to the 2d inst.

The Congress of the Republic of New Granada is holding an extraordinary session, which commenced about the 1st of last month. The principal business is the consideration of the Federal Constitution, and the Columbian Confederation scheme.

The Carthagena Canal Dredging Machine is finished, and about to be put to work.

The same paper has the following article relating to the state of things in Panama:

Panama is in a state of fermentation—the elements there evidently working, unless a powerful neutralizer be brought to bear upon them, must produce an explosion, to which the petty disturbances of almost nightly occurrence there for sometime past, will but slightly compare. A few days since, a commotion having arisen in the city, a premature signal brought five boats with one hundred and twenty-five men well armed, from the St. Mary's to the beach. Happily the excitement having been subdued, they were remanded to the vessel without landing; but the promptitude and capacity of their oppressors taught a good lesson. Many of the residents of Panama, both foreigners and natives, have left, and more are preparing to leave.

Mr. Amos B. Corwine, U. S. Commissioner, arrived at Aspinwall on the 31st ult. in the steamship George Law, and proceeded directly to Panama for the purpose of inquiring into the late riots in that city, as directed by Secretary Marcy.

Later from Texas.

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMSHIP MEXICO.

The steamship Mexico, Capt. Lawless, arrived at this port from Galveston and Indianola, Tuesday morning, bringing Galveston dates to the 22d, and Indianola to the 21st inst.

From the tone of the press throughout the State, we would infer that large crops will be made this season of both cotton and corn.

From the Galveston Civilian of the 20th inst., we learn that the troubles on the Texas and Louisiana border still continue. That paper says:

The free negroes, mulattoes and white men, to the number of forty, with the Sheriff at their head, who had been ordered to leave the country, have refused to do so, and have fortified themselves, some four miles above Madison. They are reported to have a hundred guns, besides pistols and bowie knives, and to bid defiance to their opponents. Parties in the country are about equally divided. Almost every man is armed, and all are in continual apprehension from enemies. The high grass in the prairie affords hiding places every where, and no man can leave his home with safety.

Last Saturday, Dr. Meers and Burwell Alexander, two men who had been warned by the Regulators to leave the county, and refused, were shot by a party of twenty of thirty men, at Green's Bluff. The execution is reported to us to have been deliberate.

The proscribed class is said to nearly equal the remainder of the citizens of the county, in number. A bloody battle is expected; and the result is doubtful, unless the whites are reinforced from other counties. They have had promises of assistance from Liberty and elsewhere.

It is impossible for us to give a detailed or correct history of the events which have ended in the present state of affairs. There may have been faults on both sides. But there seems no doubt that the insolence and crimes of the free persons of mixed blood have been such as to be unendurable by the whites. It is evident that both parties cannot longer live in the same community. We shall expect to hear of bloody work by every mail, until the Governor can order such a force to the spot, from other counties, as will restore order, and sustain the laws.

We copy the following from the Nueces Valley of the 14th instant:

Major Hill, Paymaster U. S. A., arrived here on Wednesday last, and reports that while passing from Fort Davis to Fort Clark, and at a place called Devil's River, he was attacked by about fifty Indians; the Indians were armed with rifles and bows and arrows, and after delivering their fire, attempted to charge the wagon where the Major had $10,000—but two men in the wagon drawing their revolvers, the Indians retreated. A corporal was wounded in the arm by a rifle ball, and the arm had to be amputated. Major Hill was wounded in the right fore-arm with an arrow, but we are glad to learn not seriously.

The Major and his son were most miraculously saved by swimming the river. It is most astonishing that the Indians did not kill them all, and capture the wagon and money.

Indian War in Florida.

The following interesting letter from prominent and influential citizens of Bayport, Hernando county, Fla., we copy from the Tallahassee Sentinel of the 17th inst.:

Dear Sir—I received your favor this morning. I am glad to learn that something is to be done for protection along this coast. We have in this place and vicinity appealed to the Governor, to Gen. Carter, to Col. Monroe and to our delegates at Washington, and reported the signs and trails of Indians, until we concluded that it was of no further use. We have an organization along the coast here for protection mostly, although severe scouting has been done under it. Indian signs have been so frequent, however, that most of the people fear to leave their homes and families. Capt. G.'s command extends down the coast to Clear Water and Old Tampa. It guards this place (two men being on post at night) but scattered as it is in small detachments, the force cannot be spared sufficient to scout the extensive swamps and hammocks, and I am expecting daily some attack upon persons traveling the road through the swamps to and from this place. Should the Indians make such a demonstration, this place would be completely hemmed in—none daring to leave or come to it by land. The track of an Indian to within sight of this place has been seen on the road. Indian trails and signs have been seen near the river, and lately some signal fires have been seen where no white man had been for weeks.

Immediately back of us the people of the Annutilga and Chocochattee section, are in constant alarm. Indians come into their yards at night—the tracks seen next morning and in one instance passed through a house. Their tracks are seen in the fields. (It is now mutton-corn season here.) Last Sunday Judge Enbank's son and some of his negroes saw 5 Indians in his field. They gave the alarm and the tracks were followed some distance, but you know the hammocks there, and that it is almost impossible to find a party of that number. The policy of the Indians would appear to be, so far as shown in this county, to go in very small parties, making as little sign as possible, and striking a blow after full knowledge of the situation of the people and settlements. Under these circumstances it will require a large force, operating in different sections, to hunt them out. Last week a trail of six or eight was seen across the bridge (Camp Izzard). The Tampa [illegible] is discontinued, and the Bayport mail has [illegible] an express being now sent from here [illegible] a week. This will be discontinued, and this [illegible] section will be entirely cut off from communication from the balance of the world.

Some of the people are moving away, some leaving crops already laid by, and I expect a sort of general stampede of all those who can get away, and the balance must crowd together and suffer the miseries of farting the hot, wet and sickly season. What we want are troops stationed all through this country. The coral organization does some good, but for reasons stated before, it cannot do active service. This coast, that of Hernando, Levy and Mad[illegible] afford as fine a country for the Indians to hide and live in—secure a retreat in a few hours, [illegible] an attack or massacre, as the everglades themselves. One hundred and fifty men may positively be enough to operate between the Suwannee and Waccasassa, but the large hammocks South-east of the latter require nearly as large a force, and then come the hammocks and swamps of Hernando. I have written my views about this situation some time since, to the Governor. I suggested to Capt. H. to report his command to you, and I have endorsed his report, etc.

SHALL THE CHURCH LOSE THE NEXT SIX MONTHS?

A pastor in Conference writes:—"We are troubled at the prospect, for the next six months. The political canvass has opened with signs of unusual activity. People will talk and think of little else but politics till the Presidential election is over, and church matters and revivals will be at a stand still."

Doubtless many who have not given their thoughts expression, are thinking the same thing. The bible, the ministry, the weapons of spiritual warfare, are to be laid up in ordinary, for awhile. Satan is to have it his own way for six months. The contest in which heaven sympathises is to stand aside until an earthly one is attended to. No more conversions of sinners or sanctification of believers. As for revivals, they are not to be expected.

Death will not stop—thousands will die between this and November. The grave will not cease to call for victims. Sin will not check its swelling tide till the Presidential election is over. But the church is to lose the next six months! Reader, pastor, is this the thought of your heart?

In this country of freedom and franchise, an occasion will seldom be wanting; and if an exciting election is to be an interruption of the church's operations, then she had as well quit altogether.

Political history is not like a tale that is told; a romance that has its beginning, its middle and its end, and closes when the principal actors disappear. It is of different composition and continuous. In this real life, both private and public, events link into a perpetual chain. One excitement succeeds another. A lull does not creep over the busy scene before another set of causes comes into operation; scarcely perceptible at first, but not less stirring. Now it is the compromise, now Kansas, now the presidential canvass. It was always so and always will be.

Is it not a mistake that excitements, when legitimate and wholesome, are unfavorable to religion? Is it not an unjust reflection upon those free institutions which we thank God for and which can only be maintained by a vigilant interest on our part? We think it is.

The greatest preachers, as well as politicians have dated with excitements. Times that tried men's souls have been prolific of divines and diplomatists. A look into a library, along the shelves on which lie books that are books, standard authors of sermons and theology, will confirm this statement. When fear of change perplexes monarchs, and the very foundations of society are moved, minds great in every direction, and hearts too, have come forth thickest.

Amid the din and distress, the fears and hopes of the American Revolution, the Methodist Church increased as rapidly and soundly as at any time since.

Religion challenges reason. Its ministers dread nothing so much as stolid indifference. If men will not hear or think, nothing can be done. A general interest among the masses has this good effect, which may be taken advantage of for the gospel: They are stirred; their minds are awake; their ears are open; they are susceptible of impression. And though the stream bears naturally in a very worldly direction, it may be turned into a better channel.

Because influences are generated, active and tending to excess unless restrained, no less than on account of the unusual possibilities of doing good, the church owes it to the country, to herself and to her Lord, to be up and doing at such times. Every agency at work; every member at his post.

Christianity is designed to make its way through just such a world as this is and to save it; not excepting democratic institutions.

The world cannot spare the church for a day. There is no provision nor authority for a half year's halt in its march. The ends of the earth wait for its coming.

Let individual christians look well to their tempers and conduct. Be sober; be vigilant; and let not general questions degenerate into personal unkindness, nor difference of opinion breed heartburnings. Bibles and prayers and regular meetings are still of use. The Holy Spirit is ever promised to them that ask. The souls of dying men call for deliverance and salvation. Work, not a day is to be blank. Sanctify the Lord God in your hearts. Look for good meetings, precious seasons, times of refreshing. And who can tell what joys and triumphs and progress await a faithful church, the next six months!

Even with wind and tide against us, it is not in character to despair of the ship and let her drive; nor even to cast out anchor; but to make headway. Christ is Head over all things to the church. He can make even the unmitigated wrath of man to praise him.—There is no prospect of a six months repose to the militant church between this and millenium.

Lose the next six months! And like the individual or the christian ...hold—neglect of duty provides plenty of excuses for more neglect.—Something else will soon be up—the country more in danger than ever and the politicians more vehement.

Have we made a covenant with death and with hell are we at agreement?—for the next six months. The covenant shall be disannulled, and the agreement shall not stand.

Let the bible be an open book; the pulpit faithful in warning and teaching. Marshal the classes, proclaim the fast, pitch the camp meetings, push the battle to the gates; and high over the din and strife of parties, let the banner of peace on earth, good will to men be borne, and the triumphs of Emanuel's kingdom go on.

LETTER FROM CHINA.

We have been furnished with the following, from Rev. Wm. Lambuth, at Shanghai, to his father, a member of the Mississippi Conference. And yet another deprivation is to befal the feeble mission there:

SHANGHAI, China, March 6, 1856.

My Dear Father:—Once more by the goodness of our Heavenly Father, I am permitted to write. I am truly thankful that I again have the privilege of saying Mary, Walter and myself are in good health.—Brother Belton and family were soon taken from this field of labor, and we have not heard from them since their departure.

Brother Kelly is to set sail on Monday next, on his way home, on account of sister K's bad health. This is quite afflicting to us as a mission, while we have so much need of laborers in China. However, Bro. K. will return to us immediately if it be the will of God. Of the number last sent out, I am the only and remaining one. May our lives and the lives of our brethren be precious in the sight of God! I have much cause to rejoice that God has mercifully watched over us and given us good health.

And, more than all, we have great reason to rejoice that God is still with us, blessing us spiritually as well as temporally.

I must tell you how good the Lord was to me some few days since, the 28th of last month:

Some two weeks since, I became acquainted with Rev. Mr. Burns, a missionary from Scotland, who spends his time in a boat, going from place to place, preaching the word of God. He has no family. He is an excellent man—a holy man—a man of God, deeply in the Spirit. I proposed to him before leaving Shanghai, we should have prayer meeting at my house, and pray for God's blessing upon us, and upon our work. He readily consented, and I invited a number of the missionaries to meet with us.

The day being unpleasant there were but few, but God met with us, and my soul was blessed. Oh how good is the Lord who hath said "My grace is sufficient for thee!" My prayers were answered, in that we received a blessing from Him. How good and pleasant it is to be a christian, when we know of a surety that God is our Father, and that he ever watches over us!

My dear father, some five years since I professed religion, and after that time frequently felt the power of God in my heart, but I never knew until within the last year, what it was to "rejoice ever more, and pray without ceasing." But my communion with God is sweet, "casting out all fear," and enabling me to "rejoice in hope of the glory of God." And that night, after receiving such a blessing from God, how much better was I able, when collecting my servants and those receiving instruction from me, to tell them of Jesus Christ, the Saviour of the world.

You desire to know if I have kept a journal since coming to China. I have, with the exception of a few days, which were employed almost entirely in gaining a knowledge of this difficult language. I shall send it to you soon. I trust it will be more interesting as I progress in the work, and speak of the goodness of God in turning many of the people from "darkness to light," and enabling his servants to endure hardship as good soldiers of the cross of Christ. I am assured that God is with me. I cannot doubt. He will not forsake us though we be surrounded by a heathen people. He will sustain us in our work. I believe God is turning the heart of this people unto Him. I have very good evidence of this. There is an increasing desire to hear, and on the part of some there is a manifest willingness to reject, and believe in Jesus. These I speak of, not as coming under the observation of others, but under my own eye. If God is still gracious in looking upon their hearts, and by His infinite goodness I am spared to labor among them, you shall hear more of them.

Oh that God would raise up native preachers to spread abroad His blessed gospel among their own dying fellow men, is my continual prayer!

The box I spoke of some time since, was sent to Middleton & Co., N. Y. Tell me what you think of the various articles, and of the idols. When you have seen them and also my friends, burn them in the fire, for we know not when God will remove the light of his gospel from our blessed nation, and I, with good intentions, might be the means of doing much harm.

I think the best plan, and that which will cost less, will be to write upon the envelope of each letter "overland mail."

I am truly thankful for what our brethren have done for me in Mobile. If they are not permitted by the goodness of God to see the fruits of my labor in China, for many years, I trust they may be assured that I am, by the help of God, making use of every power of soul, body, and spirit, to turn the heathens from the error of their ways.

Oh that we may all meet in heaven never to part, "Come Lord, come quickly," is my daily prayer.

It was not my intention, when I wrote you, to drop my school entirely, but only for a few months, until I should be supplied with more means, and also to remove it from the country to the city, where I could have greater access to the people. Mary has a school of girls, to whom we have to pay something every day in order to get them to come, and also a man for teaching them.

I trust our brethren will not become discouraged, but give us your prayers daily, and God will bless.

I remain your affectionate son,

WILLIAM LAMBUTH.

HUMBLE HEARER.—A torch may be lighted by a candle, and a knife be sharpened by an unpolished stone; so Mr. Hildersham used to say, "that he never heard any faithful minister in his life, so mean but he could discover some gift in him that was wanting in himself and could receive some profit by him."

PRACTICAL HEARER.—A poor woman in the country went to hear a sermon, wherein, among other evil practices, the use of dishonest weights and measures was exposed. With this discourse she was much affected. The next day when the minister, according to his custom, went among his hearers, and called upon the woman, he took occasion to ask her what she remembered of his sermon. The poor woman complained much of her bad memory; and said she had forgotten almost all that he had delivered. "But one thing," said she, "I remembered; I remembered to burn my bushel." A doer of the word cannot be a forgetful hearer.

CHURCH ITEMS.

The Southern Baptist Publication Society, located in Charleston, S. C., has just secured for endowment $20,00. A sum soon to be raised to $25,000. A liberal member begun the subscription, Mr. Edmund King, of Marion, Alabama, which has thus resulted in giving bottom and sinews to a useful denominational institution. The following is a summary of the contributions from the several States, in their geographical order:

Virginia, $4,344; North Carolina, $242; South Carolina, $7,092; Georgia, $4,845; Alabama, $4,577; Mississippi, $150. Total, $21,250.

The thirteenth annual convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Mississippi, met at Vicksburg last April, and remained in session until evening. Besides Bishop Green, there were present about twenty of the clergy of the Diocese and in union with the convention.

The publication of the Church Herald, suspended some months since, will not, at least for the present, be resumed.

Neither will St. Andrew's College at Jackson, be re-opened as an institution of the same grade. It was suggested by the Convention as probably an act of prudence to surrender the present charter of the college with the view to the eventual establishment in its place of a Diocesan High School.

The salary of the Bishop of the Diocese was increased by a vote of the convention to $3,000, that sum to include traveling expenses.

The Presbyterian papers are quoting freely Hugh Miller's replies to Macaulay. Miller does not like many things in the last two volumes of the history, in which Scotland is touched upon.

Every reader of the fourth volume of Macaulay's History, pp. 405—407, must have been struck with horror at the account there given of the conduct of the Edinburg clergy, with respect to Thomas Aikhead, condemned to death for blasphemy. He represents them as not only refusing to intercede that a respite might be granted, but as demanding his speedy death, execrating him from their pulpits and insulting him in his last moments.

It is another Servetus case. Hugh Miller professes to have discovered a full refutation in a pamphlet published by Mr. Lorimer in 1713, showing that the Calvinist clergy did endeavor to obtain first a pardon, then a reprieve, and failing in these, attended him, at his own request, to the last, and he was enabled to die in peace.

Austin College, under the presidency of Rev. Daniel Baker, D. D., gives fair promise of usefulness. The present classes are as follows: Seniors 5, Juniors 3, Sophomore 8, Freshmen 11, Law Department 9, Preparatory 43.—Total 81.

Cancer Cure Extraordinary.

There lives in the city of Jackson, Miss., a Mrs. Simpson, who has been afflicted with cancer in her breast for six years. It had been seen and examined by fifteen eminent physicians, treated by several, by all pronounced cancer, by most of them incurable.—Mrs. Simpson had been confined closely for four years, most of that period in great suffering, often in agony beyond description. For years her friends had expected her death almost continually. Four times during last year I visited her at my quarterly visits to Jackson, and in no instance did I expect to find her alive at my next visit to the place. I saw the cancer myself, and have never seen one which looked so horrible. In the month of November Dr. Cade, late of Italy, commenced to treat the disease. In March Mrs. Simpson was well to all appearance, able to attend all the services in the church, every tumor healed, so she continues to this date. I should think Mrs. S. fully fifty years old; her health is not vigorous, that could not be expected, but the cancer appears entirely well.

I write this for the benefit of afflicted humanity. It is without suggestion from any quarter. I have not even been introduced to Dr. Cade, and he needs not my help, he is a regular practicing physician in this place.—Should any of my friends who may be afflicted with this dreadful disease see this notice it may be beneficial to them.

AT JESUS' FEET.—The Rev. W. Jay one day attended the dying bed of a young female, who thus addressed him: "I have little," said she, "to relate, as to my experience. I have been much tried and tempted, but this is my sheet anchor—he has said, 'he that cometh to me I will no wise cast out!' I know I come to him, and I expect that he will be as good as his word. Poor and unworthy as I am, he will not trifle with me; it would be beneath his greatness, I am at his feet. As you have often said:

"'Tis joy enough, my all in all,
At thy dear feet to lie;
Then will not let me lower fall,
And none can higher fly."

THE LIFE AND TRAVELS OF HERODOTUS—by J. Talboys Wheeler, F. R. G. S., 2 vols., 1856. Harper & Bros.

Here is an animated fossil. Heroditus, the Greek historian, was the Baron Himboldt of his day. He "flonrished" in the fifth century before Christ. Mr. Wheeler puts flesh and skin on his skeleton. Travels with him. Enlarges his notes by describing cotemporaneous events and manners and religions as Herodotus might have seen them. Discusses and develops themes that might have engaged the Grecian's attention, perhaps did. Gossips pleasantly and probably. It is a very lively and instructive way of doing up the ancients; the product of vast and judicious research in ancient history, geography and mythology. Nehemiah was cotemporaneous with Herodotus; and there are some rather awkward attempts at introducing them, and thus connecting the sacred history of the times with the profane.

HUGUENOT EXILES, OR TIMES OF LOUIS XIV. A historical novel: Harper & Bros, 1856: pp. 455.

The oppressions and disasters that preceded, accompanied and followed this period of religious despotism—are given with something more than the detail of dry history—in a realizing manner. It creates a horror of Romanism.

MECHANIC'S TABLES; containing areas and circumferences of circles, weights of various metals, etc. by Chas. Haswell, Marine Engineer: Harper & Bros, 1856.

A little volume that must be invaluable to the practical mechanic. Calculations, of all sorts, ready to hand.

LEARNING TO THINK: Another of that beautiful series for the young, by Abbott; from the Harper press.

THE WESTMINSTER REVIEW, April, 1856. New York: Leonard Scott & Co.

The subjects of the essays in this number are: "The Rise of the Dutch Republic." This is a hearty and laudatory commendation of Motley's great work; a work which has placed him in the very front rank of modern writers. "Types of Mankind," of Messrs. Nott & Gliddon. Its conclusions are endorsed but its reasoning, its inductive processes and some of its alleged facts are laughed at.

All these we have through H. D. McGinnis, 35 Camp street—where they are on sale.

Dangerous Criticism.

Whoever accompanies a congregation which has just been dismissed from church, may hear a great variety of criticisms on the sermon. These ordinarily refer more to the manner of delivery, and the style of composition, than to the scriptural handling of the subject or the practical character of the discourse. There is another way which is not only injudicious, but dangerous to the spiritual welfare, especially of the unconverted.

The recital of an actual occurrence will be the best illustration of our meaning. A pious lady once left a church in this city, in company with her husband, who was not a professor of religion. She was a woman of unusual vivacity with a keen perception of the ludicrous, and often playfully sarcastic. As they walked along toward home, she began to make some amusing and spicy comments on the sermon, which a stranger, a man of very ordinary talents and awkward manner, had preached that morning, in the absence of the pastor. After running on in this vein of sportive criticism for some time surprised at the profound silence of her husband—she turned, and looked up in his face. He was in tears! That sermon had sent an arrow of conviction to his heart! Let the reader imagine the anguish of the conscience stricken wife thus arrested in the act of ridiculing a discourse which had been the means of awakening the anxiety of her unconverted husband.

Incalculable harm is done by these inconsiderate criticisms. Many a child has gone home from church full of trembling solicitude about eternal things—longing perhaps to throw itself into the arms of the parent and, "What must I do to be saved?"—only to have all concern chilled, and all convictions chased away by the captious, or mirth-moving criticism of the father or mother. Many an unconverted wife or husband, many an impenitent friend, has thus had all interest dissipated by those who were perhaps at that very time praying for their salvation.

Let this admonition be a word in season to those church members who have unconverted children, relatives and friends.—Cent. Presb.

Have you not been surprised to find how independent of money peace of conscience is, and how much happiness can be condensed in the humblest home? A cottage will not hold the bulky furniture and sumptious accommodations of a mansion; but if God be there, a cottage will hold as much happiness as might stock a palace.

DOMESTIC MISSIONS.

LEAF RIVER MISSION, MISS. ANNUAL CONFERENCE

Rev. H. N. McTYEIRE, Assistant Treasurer of the Missionary Society of the M. E. Church, South:

Our second quarterly meeting has just closed. Our P. E., brother Jas. Y. Griffing, was with us and preached to us the great truths of the gospel, and we trust with good effect. Our work is truly a mission. It is a sparsely settled country including nearly all of Jones and Perry counties. The people are generally poor and much divided in religious opinions. Some are much given to drunkenness and other vices which always follow this sin. And there are other evils not called sins, but are the certain results of the above—such as too little united effort for any good purpose, viz: The schooling of children in both week and Sunday-Schools, which still keeps the community in too much ignorance and in great want of means. There are but few of our acquaintance that may not be truly called poor and live in very plain style.

We commenced our work by the plan given at the last Conference on the first Sunday of January last, and have been continually at it. We have found a few faithful brethren here who are worthy of praise, and whom God will surely honor. A considerable number of persons have died within the bounds of our mission since we have been here, and nearly all of them out of the church.

Although the winter has been very hard, and much rain has fallen and prevented our small congregations frequently from getting together, and we have not yet had anything of a revival, we trust our labors will not be all in vain. We have received into our church twelve white persons, and on trial five whites and one colored. We have not yet had to turn out any. One local preacher withdrew from us at our last quarterly conference, on the 24th inst. We are praying and hoping that the Lord will revive his work among us speedily; and surely if he does not many sinners will be finally lost. O Lord, it is time for thee to work, for the people do constantly make void thy law.

Truly the prophet said for God, "My people are destroyed for lack of knowledge." There are but very few reading people here, and we have not found one Methodist periodical coming to a post office within our work. [Whose fault is it?—Ed.] On this account we suffer much loss, having enjoyed a religious paper for thirty successive years, even from the beginning of the Wesleyan Journal in Charleston, S. C. But when we were coming to this work we left the Southern Christian Advocate with our brother, hoping to meet her beautiful and lovely sister the N. O. Christian Advocate, but she has not yet shown her face. [Why did you not send us your name and office?—Ed.]

We beg the friends of missions to pray for us. We have nineteen appointments which we fill monthly. At some of them we preach Saturday and Sunday every round. The average attendance at church in the round, we think as-yet, is not much over five hundred, but we visit many who cannot get to church and instruct and pray for them. And all whom we visit receive us kindly, and treat us as bountifully as they are able.

Yours in Christ, hoping to give you better news soon.

JOHN H. MASSEY.

OAKMULGEE MISSION, Ala. Conference.

Dear Brother:—I now send you a report of the state of this mission for the first and second quarters. I entered upon my work about the middle of January, and notwithstanding the unpleasant weather in the beginning of the year, I have been able to fill all my round of appointments except on two Sabbaths, which failure was caused by inclement weather. This mission lies in the vicinity of the town of Cahaba, which is located immediately at the junction of the Cahaba with the Alabama River. We have on this work four churches, expressly for the use of slaves in their religious exercises, and at all of the appointments with but a single exception, we have comfortable rooms to worship in. The owners generally attend and worship with their slaves where they live on the plantations.

We have received on probation this year 81, and baptised 92 children and 16 adults. Some have been converted to God and made happy in his love; 230 children are catechised regularly and are making fine progress, greatly to the gratification of the owners as well as the missionary.

Yours in christian love,

P. R. M'CRARY.

HOLMES MISSION, Alabama Conference.

I have neglected to report this mission in due time, as we have no Post Office in the bounds of the work, this must answer for my excuse. Our first and second quarterly meetings are over—up to this time we have received on trial eight members, into full fellowship five, baptized one, and four have died.

No sabbath-schools yet—so far nothing collected, for the support of missions.

The order of exercises in addition to the examination will be as follows:

On Saturday evening Sophomore prize declamation; on Sunday, commencement sermon, by Rev. D. R. Hillie, of Alabama Conference; on Monday and Tuesday evenings Junior exhibition. On Tuesday it is expected that addresses will be delivered before the Alumni and Literary societies, by gentlemen chosen for the occasion. On Monday, commencement day, addresses by the graduating class, degrees conferred, etc.

It is hoped that the committees appointed by the conferences will be present. The friends of education, and the public generally are respectfully invited to attend. The Trustees will hold their annual meeting on Saturday.

Gun Boats and Troops for Canada.—We extract the following from the Montreal Commercial Advertiser of the 10th instant:

The gun boat fleet is to be immediately fitted with masts and spars, and made ready for a voyage across the Atlantic under sail. Their destination is the Canadian lakes.

A large addition to the six regiments ordered to Canada was contemplated at the sailing of the last steamer, and the news of the dismissal of the British Minister to the United States, and the acknowledgment of Walker's government by the latter after a solemn assurance of its disavowal of the expedition, and desire to co-operate with England to put it down, will cause the British forces in Canada to be put on the war footing.

The plenipotentiaries who will most speedily and permanently settle all existing and probable causes of dispute with the United States are fleets, gunboats, and soldiers; and Lord Palmerston is just the man who understands the right way of bringing the American Government to reason.

A large number of heavy guns and mortars of the Crimean siege train, and the reserve ammunition from Balaklava, are ordered for shipment to Canada.

The regiments on the way, and those under order, bring with them all their wagons and camp equipage.

Another battery of artillery, Mr. Gilmour's of Gilmour & Co., Captain, and Mr. Kyte, Lieutenant, is now forming. Four others are also spoken of.

The Clipper ship Mauldarin, of New York, is reported as having made the trip from that city to Melbourne, in Australia, in the unprecedented time of 72 days. This is the shortest trip on record by several days.

MARRIAGES.

In this city, on the 23d inst., by Rev. Reynolds Trippett, Capt. M. W. LEAVEY, of the ship International, to Miss EUPHEMIA BROWN.

A pleasant voyage to you Captain with your Euphemia. Printers fee received.

DEATHS.

Died—On the 25th ult., of typhoid fever, near Alleuton, Wilcox county, Alabama, Rev. JAMES P. ROBBINS, Local Deacon of the M. E. Church, South.

Of the life and character of Brother Robbins we need say but little. Those who knew him will doubtless concur in their testimony that he was an honest, upright, pious and good man; an acceptable and useful preacher; a kind hearted neighbor, husband, master and father.

In the fall of 1839 he embraced religion at a camp meeting at this place, (then called Ebenezer camp ground,) and joined the Methodist Church, and some few years afterwards was licensed to preach. To the doctrines and usages of his church he was strongly attached, and for the defense of which he was a zealous advocate. He was what is termed a great class-meeting man, and almost invariably held class-meeting after preaching at his appointments.

He suffered much in his last illness, and was confined to his bed over four weeks. But amidst it all he was calm and resigned and ready to go. His companion and friends who attended him, will long remember his prayers and exhortations. Sometimes he would try to preach and exhort, then sing, pray and praise God. His mind, although confused, and his recollection of men and things generally impaired and weakened as he approached near his end, yet upon the subject of death, heaven and the future, he was more rational than on any other subject. The writer visited him frequently and attended him to the last. When asked, which was done repeatedly, "if his trust was in God and his faith strong," he replied, "Oh yes, strong, it was a rock—fixed upon the rock of ages, no fears, all is well," and many such expressions were invariably his reply.

His remains lie buried in Ebenezer grave yard, not far from the spot where he was converted. His friends, his brethren and the community in which he lived, the Masonic fraternity, but more especially his wife and dear children, can but lament his loss, yet "they sorrow not as those who have no hope."

A. C. RAMSEY.

Oak Hill, Ala., June 10, 1856.

Died—On the 4th inst., LOUISA R. H. BAGBY, daughter of Joseph and Elizabeth S. Goodman, aged 29 years.

When yet a child she was brought under religious impressions, and in her eleventh year joined the M. E. Church, Franklin street, Mobile. In this church, in whose communion she died, she had been a Sabbath-School scholar, member of class, and Sunday School teacher, and in all these relations a model worthy of all imitation for her conscientious punctuality and faithfulness.

Her religious experience was generally despondent in its tone. With few views of self and exalted conceptions of the "Truth as it is in Jesus," doubts perplexed her faith and darkened the light of the inward life.

Some four weeks since there was an evident maturing of the christian graces. The clouds began to break, the fears to be lightened. The promises of the gospel became living realities. More cheerful hopes grew and were strengthened in her heart—glimpses of the "glory to be revealed" appeared. There was a reaching forth to those things that were before—a buoyancy of hope and a trustfulness of faith amid the langnors of a last sickness as life slowly ebbed away, all in striking contrast with the trembling despondency of the past.

Four days before the end, supposing the last hour had come, she enquired if this were death—if it was "How glorious to die—Jesus is with me." She praised God aloud in an extacy of triumph—and thus she continued rejoicing to the last. During this time for a few moments, she was more engaged in a great struggle with the enemy. On the last day, after passing through one of the paroxysms, she said she had gotten the victory, adding after a pause with characteristic humility, "yet not I, Jesus helped me."

She spoke often of death, with a light in her eye and a sweet smile on her lips, repeating to her friends as she exhorted them to faithfulness a favorite phrase, "I am almost home." Thus joyfully departing, the scene was added to that multitude which no man can number, who sing the praises of God and the Lamb forever and ever.

"Wash poverty of spirit blessed,
Rest happy saint, in Jesus rest,
A sinner saved, through grace forgiven,
Redeemed from earth to reign in heaven.
Crowned through the mercy of thy lord,
With a free, full, immense reward."

Died.—On the 8th inst., at the residence of Mr. J. B. Banks, near Enon, Ala., WILLIAM HARVEY, infant son of William T. and Harriet C. Davis, aged two years and eight months.

At a called meeting of Sharon Division, No. 100, Sons of Temperance, the following resolutions were adopted:

Whereas, our much loved brother Samuel C. Dirbo, has been removed by death, and we have been deprived of one of our most useful, active and devoted members, therefore—

Resolved, That in his death this Division has sustained an irreparable loss, the community has lost a generous and noble citizen, the church one of its brightest ornaments, and temperance one of its firmest friends.

Resolved, That whilst we mourn the loss of our brother, and feel that his place among us cannot be filled by another, yet we rejoice to know that he has left behind him the assurance of a thorough preparation for a life of love beyond this world of care.

Resolved, That we tender to his bereaved widow and children, and other relatives, our heartfelt sympathies.

Resolved, That in respect to his memory our hall be draped in mourning, and that we wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days.

Resolved, That the Recording Scribe be instructed to furnish a copy of these resolutions to the family of our deceased brother, and also to furnish copies for publication to the Canton Citizen, Commonwealth, and New Orleans Christian Advocate, with request that they oblige us by publishing the same.

Tanning Cotton and Linen.—English and French fishermen have long been in the habit of tanning their sails, etc., in bark liquors, in order to render them more durable. Millet states that pieces of linen treated for seventy-two hours with an oak bark liquor, at 150 degrees, and stretched on frames, remained unaltered in a damp cellar for ten years; while untanned linnen in the same place and for the same time had entirely rotted. The one framed, also tanned, was perfectly preserved, and the other untanned had rotted. Linen, also, already begun to moulder, may be preserved from further change by being tanned. It seems to be only necessary that the articles be kept two or three days in a warm solution of tannin.

Coating Iron with Copper.—Comtoy's London patent proposes to make sheet copper similar to sheet tin, by which a stiffness is imparted to the copper, which is desirable in many processes of the arts. After cleaning the surface by acid water and heat, the sheet iron is dipped into water containing clay, suspended in it, and then dried, when it is plunged for a moment of time into melted copper. The sheet metal may then be rolled.

Shocking Accident.—As the little son of Samuel Swan, Esq., was playing at home, a wire struck his eye and the loss of its sight immediately resulted. What renders the sad accident still more distressing is the absence and unconsciousness of the father. He left for New Orleans on Thursday, and was to quit that city for Memphis last night; but when the sad message came down last night, the wires between that city and New Orleans were down. Thus a still greater delay must add to the pain of the separated family. [Mobile Register, 21st.

FOUR DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

ARRIVAL OF THE ATLANTIC.

New York, June 22.—The United States Mail steamship Atlantic, from Liverpool on the afternoon of the 11th, has arrived at this port.

Arrival of Mr. Fillmore.

Hon. Millard Fillmore came passenger on the Atlantic. Salutes in honor of his arrival were fired from the Collins' steamship dock and from the Battery.

The Crampton Case.

The Asia arrived out on the 9th. The English public was without official notice of Crampton's dismissal, but regarded it as a fixed fact. The positive, but unofficial statements per Asia caused little excitement in London.

The English papers agree, that as the case is a personal one, there is no necessity for the dismissal of Dallas. The London Times is, however, very bitter against the United States.

Spain—Attempt to Assassinate the Queen.

An unsuccessful attempt to assassinate the Queen of Spain had been made. A young man presented a pistol at her, but was disarmed before he could discharge it.

Inundations in France.

France has suffered terribly in some districts from inundations. It is estimated that forty thousand people have been rendered houseless, and one hundred thousand thrown out of employment.

It is hoped in France that the corn crop will be about an average.

ADDITIONAL BY THE ATLANTIC.

Kansas affairs excite considerable notice in England, without being generally understood. It is argued that the troubles in that Territory will divert the attention of the United States from a foreign war.

The House of Commons has passed a bill altering the oaths so as to admit Jews.

It is reported in Berlin that Prussia and Sardinia had demanded to be admitted to the commission for reorganizing the Danubian Principalities, and that the demand had been acceded to.

Austria has resolved to erect Lombardy and the Venitian provinces into a kingdom, with the title of Upper Italy.

Advices from Arabia state that the insurrection is progressing, the people refusing to recognize the rule of the Sultan.

More Turkish outrages against Christians are reported.

Kansas Affairs.

St. Louis, June 23.—A letter to the Republican, under date Westport, 17th, states that Col. Sumner has put the California, Santa Fe roads, and all the principal thoroughfares leading into Kansas, under blockade.

An attempt had been made to murder the new Deputy Sheriff of Douglas county.

Advices from Fort Kearney states that the Indians are becoming troublesome again, and that one white man had been killed.

Col. Sumner had dispatched a company to Fort Kearney.

Mr. Clayton's Bill for the Pacification of Kansas.

We extract from the National Intelligencer, of the 17th inst., the following summary of a "Bill supplementary to an act to organize the Territories of Nebraska and Kansas," which was introduced in the Senate on the 16th inst., by Mr. Clayton, of Del. ware, and which he prefaced by an able exposition of the condition of affairs in Kansas, and urged the necessity of prompt interposition on the part of Congress to arrest the evils which now encompass the people of that Territory, and threaten disastrous consequences to the peace and safety of the Union:

The bill commences with a preamble reciting the thirty-second section of the act to organize the Territories, with the proviso against the repeal of any law or regulation on the subject of slavery.

The first, second and third sections of the bill are, briefly, for taking a census of the people of the Territory of Kansas, by commissioners appointed by the Secretary of State of the United States; for the apportionment of representation to the Legislative Assembly; and for the enrollment of members of the said Legislative Assembly; the House of Representatives to consist of not less than twenty members in the Council, nor more than seventy-four members in the House.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That no law shall be in force in said Territory violating or tending to the violation of the great principle asserted in the preamble to this act, or whereby the people of said Territory shall be prohibited from free and full discussion of their own domestic institutions and interests; or whereby said people shall be prevented from throwing any possible difficulties in the way of the Government, by entering into premature dissolution of such questions. The questions now pending may be of a very grave character, and I hope and confidently believe that they will be settled in a manner most honorable to its judgment, by abstaining from the use of inflammatory appeals to the passions of the race, to the relations between the two countries. (Hear, hear.) Whatever cause there may be for excitement, I trust it is not hoped that the good sense of both sides of the water may prevent any unnecessary and inflammatory discussion in this House, which must be instructive of a conflict of opinion—some touch on one side, and some too much upon the other—and could not fail to be attended with injurious results. Now I may be permitted, when upon my legs to refer, though I am not quite sure whether the Honorable Baronet alluded to it, to a question put yesterday—whether Mr. Crampton had retired from Washington. I stated that we had indirectly received information that such was the case. I learn from my noble friend at the head of the Foreign Department, that the information came by the Cunard steamer, which left Halifax on the 22d of May. Yesterday evening there was another packet in from New York, which left there on the 24th. This packet did not bring any confirmation to the report of the 22d. We are, therefore, not in possession of any official information on the subject.—(Hear, hear.)

The East.

The dates from the Crimea and Constantinople are to the 23d ult., but nothing of importance had lately transpired at either place.

France.

The French papers are filled with accounts of destructive inundations. The Emperor's visit to Lyons and other scenes of the calamity has gained him immense popularity. The extent of the disaster is very great. Five hundred houses were destroyed at Lyons and one hundred and fifty at Avignon. At the latest accounts the waters were subsiding. Ten millions of francs had been voted by the government for the relief of the sufferers, and the Empress had opened a subscription list also for their benefit. The agricultural show at Paris continued to be a great source of attraction. The liabilities of M. Place, bankrupt director of the Credit Mobilier, was estimated at eighteen million francs.

Portugal.

The vine and potato crops were likely to fall from too much rain.

Spain.

The fleet to be sent to Mexico was reported to number eleven ships of the line, three frigates, two corvettes and four steamers.

Italy.

A Paris dispatch states that the notes are exchanged by France and Austria to the Neapolitan Government are nearly identical. No new ones are positively promised by France, but the general tone is to urge and suggest. Austria objects to exciting Naples interference, and hints that the present crisis has been planned by Sardinia, stating, in waiver, that Austria has no desire to interfere with the internal institutions of Sardinia. In the British Parliament, Lord Clarendon has consented to produce the papers addressed by Sardinia to the Conference, and it is his opinion that before the close of the session there must be a discussion upon the affairs of Italy. He adds that he had reason to believe that both France and Austria were desirous of removing their troops as soon as possible from the Italian territory.

The Piedmontese Chamber of Deputies has presented to Gen'l Marmora with an acre of valuable building land within the city of Turin. Mazzini announces his intention of withdrawing altogether from politics, and emigrating, as a private citizen, to the United States.

Greece.

The King of Greece has asked the infanta of Spain in marriage for the heir to the Greek throne, and a favorable answer had been given by Spain. King Otho was about to set out for Germany.

Prussia.

The Emperor Alexander has been enjoying the hospitalities of the King of Prussia at Berlin.

Russia.

The Czar has made the following diplomatic appointments: M. Budberg, Ambassador at Berlin, to Vienna, replaced at Berlin by Baron Brunow; Prince Dolgorouski, formerly Minister of War, Ambassador to Paris, and Count Chreptowitch Ambassador to London.

The Central Committee of the Polish Democracy have published a protest against the terms in which the Czar granted the amnesty to Polish refugees. They assert that in taking up arms for their national independence in 1830 they fulfilled a duty—but nothing to be pardoned—and they could not now, without renouncing their country's claims, accept the title of pardoned rebels.

THREE DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

ARRIVAL OF THE AMERICA AT HALIFAX.

The Royal mail steamship America, Capt. Wickmann, left Liverpool about noon on Saturday the 7th inst., and arrived at Halifax at nine o'clock on the morning of the 15th inst.

The Collins steamship Atlantic arrived at Liverpool at twenty minutes past eight on the evening of the 4th inst.

The steamer North America, from Quebec, arrived at Liverpool at 11 P. M., on Thursday, the 5th inst.

The steamship Propontes, with the new submarine electric telegraph cable, which is to cross the gulf of St. Lawrence and connect Newfoundland with Cape Breton, Nova Scotia, sailed from London on the 2d June. The cable will be laid down during the present month, and will form the first link in the London and New York Submarine Electric Telegraph line, which it is confidently anticipated here will be in successful operation between London and New York within 12 or 18 months.

The important insurance suit—the New York, Newfoundland and London Telegraph Company vs. Lloyd's Insurance Company, London, has been settled, upon very advantageous terms to the telegraph company.

The American Difficulty.

Latest.—The correspondent of the Morning Post, at Paris, writes: "I believe I am correct in stating that the French government has used every effort to remove these unhappy complications which have led to the suspension of diplomatic relations between England and America. The government of the Emperor will, I understand, continue to exercise its good offices in the same spirit of reconciliation, and should the two nations be found engaged in actual war, no doubt England may reckon on the active alliance of France."

The arrival of the Atlantic was anxiously awaited, as Mr. Crampton was expected to be on board, and when it was ascertained that he was not, considerable relief was manifest.

The London Morning Post, which has published several false reports recently, respecting American affairs, caused a great excitement by making the following editorial announcement:

"The government of the United States has intimated to Mr. Crampton its desire that he will forthwith quit the American territory, and his Excellency, in consequence, has retired from his post and arrived at Toronto, Canada." The Globe, and other journals, immediately contradicted the statement, and said it was merely a random statement by passengers per Atlantic.

On the succeeding evening, Mr. D'Israeli put the question direct to Lord Palmerston, who made a shuffling reply, to the effect that he understood so from an indirect source, but Mr. Crampton not having himself said so, he (Palmerston) had no statement to make.

In the House of Lords, the Earl of Hardwicke put a similar question, to which the Earl of Granville replied that the government had no information on the subject.

Sir E. Bulwer Lytton said, in the House of Commons, that he would put a question to the Minister, on a subject of importance—namely, with regard to relations with the United States. The House would remember that some time ago he had withdrawn a motion of which he had given notice, on the Central American question, because the Government then stated that they had made an offer of arbitration to the United States, and that they were in daily expectation of a reply. Since that period, however, grave events had occurred. The proceedings of General Walker in Nicaragua had been recognized by the Government of the United States, which had sent a Special to war there, he would fain hope for the purpose of observation, and there was, by the last accounts from America, every prospect of an invasion of the Mosquito Territory on the part of that power, or would it be. Walker was the head and Director, with the view of annexing it to Nicaragua, and the House would remember that this country was pledged to protect that Territory from external invasion. A grave responsibility devolved upon the Government, and he would ask, in this state of affairs, whether in the interval which had since elapsed, any steps had been taken to press the Government of the United States to a reply.

Lord Palmerston said, I am unable to give any definite answer to the question with which the honorable Baronet concluded his statement, namely: "What particular steps had been taken during the last few weeks to obtain an answer from the American Government with regard to the subject of arbitration on the Central American question."

I can only say this, that the American Government have been made fully aware of that offer having been made on the part of Her Majesty's Government, and we have not thought it necessary as yet, to press, in any special manner, for a reply. With regard to the general tenor of the Honorable Baronet's observations, I quite agree with him that in the present state of things between the two Governments, it would be inexpedient, if the opinion of the Government was to be expressed. I have no hesitation in saying that I feel the interests of the country and the prospects of the permanent maintenance of amicable relations between this country and the United States, would be best promoted by the continuation of that forbearance, that fastidious forbearance, which the House has hitherto shown.

Upon other occasions of somewhat similar character, when questions of importance were pending in reference to the last war, or to the negotiations by which it was concluded, this House has led in a manner most honorable to its judgment, by abstaining from throwing any possible difficulties in the way of the Government, by entering into premature discussion of such questions. The questions now pending may be of a very grave character, and I hope and confidently believe that they will be settled in a manner most honorable to its judgment, by abstaining from the use of inflammatory appeals to the passions of the race, to the relations between the two countries. (Hear, hear.) Whatever cause there may be for excitement, I trust it is not hoped that the good sense of both sides of the water may prevent any unnecessary and inflammatory discussion in this House, which must be instructive of a conflict of opinion—some touch on one side, and some too much upon the other—and could not fail to be attended with injurious results. The Times city article of Friday evening says:

Although the statement of Lord Palmerston last evening, that he had received information of the fact of Mr. Crampton's having been required to leave Washington, disappointed the expectations excited by private commercial letters received yesterday from New York, the English Funds have been very steady to-day, and have closed at a slight advance. In the Stock Exchange there is a good demand for money, and in the discount market there is a fair supply at, in some instances, 4 to 4 per cent. below the bank terms. A payment of 20 per cent. on the new loan falls due on Thursday, and as this will absorb one million, the applications at the bank are likely to increase during the next few days.

The Times has a leading article on the American question, but its object is chiefly to complain of those politicians in the United States, who, though condemning the policy of President Pierce's Cabinet, do not oppose it with sufficient energy.

The Daily News remarks upon the change which is taking place in public opinion in reference to the difficulties with America. There is still, it says, a universal dislike to the idea of a war with America, but doubts are beginning to arise in the minds of many, whether our conciliatory department has not already been carried quite as far as prudence dictates, and whether President Pierce and his Cabinet are not presuming too far on their knowledge of our desire for peace.

Thirty-Fourth Congress—First Session.

Washington, June 18.—Senate—Mr. Clayton made a personal explanation, stating that he had been misrepresented by Lord Clarendon in his remarks made in the British House of Lords respecting Central America affairs.

Mr. Butler replied to Mr. Wilson's defence of Mr. Sumner relative to certain provisions in the Constitution of South Carolina. He stated that Mr. Wilson had misrepresented the Constitution of that State altogether.

Mr. Chase made some remarks supplementary to those of Mr. Clayton on the same subject.

Mr. Pearce sustained the American interpretation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

House.—Mr. Lindley defended his political position from the strictures of the Union newspaper, saying that the latter was opposed to the nomination of Mr. Buchanan, and rather than Mr. Benton should have any influence with Mr. Buchanan, in the event of his election, it would crush the Democratic party in Missouri. Mr. Lindley vindicated the Hunker Democrats so far as their connection with his election was concerned, and himself from the charge of being threatened with Free-soilism.

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMSHIP TEXAS!

The steamship Texas, Capt. J. Forbes, from Vera Cruz 22d inst., arrived at this port Tuesday afternoon, bringing dates from the city of Mexico to the 18th inst., and Vera Cruz to the 22d.

The Texas brought $13,131 88 in specie, consigned to merchants in this city.

From the Mexican Extraordinary, of the 18th, a very neat sheet, printed in English, and published in the city of Mexico, we extract the following summary of the news circulating at the capital:

Since our last issue the political horizon has been exceedingly tranquil in the city. Vague rumors have prevailed here of discontentment in the interior, but all such reports are soon traced to their originators, the real hostile. The new Constitution, which has consumed so much time in its compilation, is now in the hands of the printers, and will likely be published to-morrow. In our next issue we will be able to give our readers some idea of its provisions. Considerable anxiety exists to see this important document. The people have waited patiently for a long time to find evidence in the new Constitution of the liberality professed by the present Government. From all we can learn of the Constitution there will be no disappointment, even to the most liberal of the liberal party.

The Spanish Conventional debt question is becoming more interesting every day. The Spanish minister seems to look upon the debt as the least important part of his mission. He claims redress for wrongs done Spanish citizens in the last revolution. It appears that during the late war against Santa Anna, many Spaniards arrayed themselves under the standard of the dictator and while nominally engaged in an honorable war, interfered with the property of inoffensive citizens, and in one or two cases committed the most barbarous outrages, by killing parties of men whom they found in a defenceless condition. When taken by the arms of the revolutionists they were severely chastised for their crimes. And now the Spanish minister comes forward to ask of this Government to degrade the officers under whose orders these chastisements were inflicted. It is not difficult to see in what light such assumption is regarded by this Government and what will be the result of such fabulous demands.

The land holders have had several meetings to consider ways and means of how they could not contrive some plan to secure the impending difficulty. At the last meeting on Friday, they agreed to disagree, and thus end the influence which they might bring to bear. By such a course they have lost the confidence of their Ministry and the respect of this Government.

Senor Alvarez has told the bond holders that he did not come here as a broker but as an Ambassador. As he has not been received as Ambassador, we can see no cause of his longer delay. He is said to be on the eve of departure for Havana at the present time.

A large body of troops left this city a few days ago for Queretaro. We are not acquainted with their destination.

American Decrees on Court Costume.—Mr. Marcy, the American Secretary, who has manifested such an obstinate and impracticable spirit in his correspondence with our Government, is determined to be consistent in all things, and has actually, after the consultation with the government tailors of the United States, designed and prescribed the dress in which all American gentlemen must appear at foreign courts, and our own especially. The order which has been conveyed to the American legation is not limited to its application to the members of the diplomatic corps, but to all free and independent citizens, who may deem it proper to enjoy the same liberty of action which the subjects of the monarchies of Europe to a certain extent do. The costume which the united taste and wisdom of Mr. Marcy and his cronies have decided on consists of an ordinary black dress coat, a white waist coat, white cravat, Dark pantaloons of broadcloth, silk stockings, a black sword, and a cocked hat. Several American gentlemen have expressed their feelings of annoyance at the new order of Mr. Marcy. They would willingly submit to the ridicule of their own pleasure, or even their respect to the sovereign of United Britain, and as a matter of their politeness and good taste, conform to the usages and customs of her court; but this order of Mr. Marcy is of so impudent a nature as to leave the intelligent members of the great Republic no option.

Sad Affair at Tuskegee.—A correspondent of the Talbotton Times, of the 17th inst., writing from Tuskegee, Ala., says:

A sad affair took place at Mr. Pinckard's school, two miles below this town, on Friday evening. A fatality occurred between young Ashley, son of Mr. Felix Ashley, who has recently removed to this place from Montgomery, and a son of Mr. Edward Williams, in which the former was killed by a wound inflicted with a small pocket knife. Young Ashley, it is said, was some 13 or 14 years of age, and rather stout. Williams is not exceeding 11 years of age, and has been considered rather a good boy. The affair will undergo judicial investigation. The general impression is that Williams was acting in self-defense.

Later from Bermuda.—The N. Y. Evening Mirror, of the 19th, says:

By the arrival of the Tennessee from St. Thomas, we have late Bermuda papers, which state that H. M. steamer Malacca, from Jamaica, arrived there on the 5th, with thirty-five cases of yellow fever on board; she had already lost eleven men during the passage, and no new cases had broken out for 48 hours previous to her arrival at Bermuda. H. M. steamer Furnew had also arrived at Bermuda on the same day, from St. Thomas, but brings no news of interest; she was to leave in a few days for England. There were no vessels in port loading for New York.

Turkish Religious Toleration.—The Turkish Government has just given a distinguished proof of its toleration of other forms of worship besides the Ottoman. Three Catholic monks of Bosnia lately murdered a Turk, and the more effectually to conceal their crime burned the body in the kitchen of the convent. They were all three tried, found guilty, and sentenced to death; but the Government has ordered the executions to be suspended until the Pope, informed of the circumstances, shall have time to deprive the criminals of their office, so that the punishment may be inflicted on the man, and not on the priest. The Armenians and Greeks, it appears, have protested against the late toleration and reform decree of the Sultan. The Greek petition is directed especially against the articles relating to the clergy.

Dr. Shaw, of Texas, has found sweet oil, drank freely, a successful antidote to strychnine in two cases. The oil is to be poured down without any reference to the patient's vomiting. Professor Rochester has reported two cases of poisoning by the same terrible drug, successfully treated by a free use of camphor internally, and mustard poultices outside.

Heavy Storm.—Our city was visited on Wednesday night and Thursday morning with one of the heavist storms we have ever known. The rain fell in torrents. We doubt if as much rain in the same time, has ever before fallen here, and the damage is considerable.—[Vicksburg Times, 20th inst.

Buried Treasures.—"Eusebius" writes to the New York Observer from Roma, as follows:

The Tiber is not only rich in historic associations, it is rich in treasure. An English company has actually offered to turn the current of the stream far above the city and around it, provided the government would give them what they might discover in its present bed. This would be attended with vast expense, but it would pay. Treasures of art, from age to age, have found their way into the stream, which would bring in the market a perfect remuneration. In the museum of St. John Lateran, a magnificent column of stone is lying, which was taken not long since from the Tiber, a portion of which has been polished to display its beauty, and no one can see it without wishing to have more of the secret of this river revealed. Statuary more perfect and perhaps more beautiful than any of the ancient works of art now seen in Rome lies embedded in groups beneath the stream. Agostino Chigi, the famous banker at the time of Leo X, once gave a splendid entertainment to the Pope and his Cardinals, at which the dishes were all precious metals. The price paid for three fish was 250 crowns. It is said that the dishes were all thrown into the Tiber, by order of the rich banker, in order that no less illustrious guest might ever use them. The sacred vessels brought from Jerusalem by Titus, among them the golden candle-stick, are reported to have been lost from the Milvian bridge, and if so, are still lying there. The present government of Rome will suffer nothing belonging to ancient art to pass from her territory, nor is it liable to carry on such an investigation upon its own account.

We find the following on the back of a three dollar bill now in our possession:

Hickman, Ky., 7th Oct., 1854.—Last night I sat down to play a gentlemanly game of cards with three citizens of this place. I had $450. Thus morning this $3 00 is all that is left me. I will not say they cheated and swindled me, but I will say, I regard them as a d——l scaly trio. For the benefit of those who visit Hickman, I have made this confession of my folly. If you value your pocket-book, do not gamble with any "old respectable citizens" of Hickman.

H***.

To which, on the same bill, is appended the following lines:

Thou cam'st to me, poor little note,
Prolaged by folly's curse;
With many a blessing breathed beneath
I send thee from my purse.

I pray that in whatever hands
Hereafter thou may'st fall,
Thou'lt carry peace, and hope,

Beautiful Lines.

I Dislike to give its readers the following lines, as they were suggested by [illegible] letter from Capt. Chase, announcing the sickness and death of his [illegible] Brown Owen, who died on his [illegible] to Chagres:

Farewell, brother, nearer, nearer,
Shades of death are growing cold,
And the presence seemeth dearer,
When thy arms around me fold;
I am dying, brother, dying,
Soon you'll miss me in your berth,
For my form will soon be lying
Where the ocean's billows surf.

Nearer to me, brother, hearken,
I have something I would say,
But will my vision darken,
And I go from hence away;
I am going, surely going,
But we hope in God is strong,
Am willing, brother, knowing
That he doeth nothing wrong.

Tell my father, when you greet him,
That in death I prayed for him,
Prayed that I may one day meet him
In a world that's free from sin;
Tell my mother, (God assist her,
Now that she is growing old,)
Tell her child would glad have kissed her,
When his lips grew pale and cold.

Listen, brother, catch each whisper,
'Tis my wife I'd speak of now,
Tell, oh tell her, how I missed her,
When the fever burned my brow;
Tell her, brother, closely listen,
Don't forget a single word,
That in death my eyes did glisten
With the tears her memory stirred.

Tell her she must kiss my children,
Like the kiss I last impressed,
Hold them, as when last I held them,
Folded closely to my breast;
Give them early to their Maker,
Putting all her trust in God,
And He never will forsake her,
For He's said so in His Word.

O my children! Heaven bless them!
They were all my life to me;
Would I could once more caress them,
Ere I sink beneath the sea;
But for them I crossed the ocean,
But my hopes were I'll not tell,
Here I've gained an orphan's portion,
There died all things well.

Sisters I remember
Every kindly parting word,
And my heart has been kept tender
By the thoughts their memory stirred;
Tell them I ne'er reached the haven
Where I sought the precious dust,
But I have gained a port called Heaven,
Where the gold will never rust.

Dig for me, to secure an entrance,
For there I'll find their brother there;
Faith in Jesus and repentance,
Will secure for each a share—
Hark! I hear my Saviour speaking,
'Tis, I know his voice so well,
When I am gone, oh don't be weeping,
Brother, here's my last farewell.

A Lucky Mason.

There was once upon a time a poor mason or brick-layer in Granada, who kept all the Saint's days and holidays, and St. Monday in the bargain, and yet, with all his devotion, he grew poorer and poorer, and could scarcely earn bread for the numerous family. One night he was aroused from his first sleep by a knocking at the door. He opened it, and beheld before him a tall, meagre, cadaverous-looking priest.

"Mark ye, honest friend," said the stranger; "I have observed that you are a good Christian, and one to be trusted; will you undertake a job this very night?"

"Why, as my beats, Senor Padre, on condition that I am paid accordingly."

"That you shall; but you must suffer yourself to be blindfolded."

To this the mason made no objection; so, being handkerchiefed, he was led by the priest through various and winding passages, until they stopped before the portal of a house. The priest then applied a key, turned a creaking lock and opened what appeared to be a wonderous door. They entered, the door was locked and bolted, and the mason was conducted through an echoing corridor, and a spacious hall, to the interior of the building. Here the bandage was removed from his eyes, and he found himself in a great court, dimly lighted by a single lamp. In the centre was a marble fountain, which the priest requested him to form a small brick and mortar being at hand for the purpose. He accordingly worked all night but without finishing the job. Just before day-break the priest gave a piece of gold into his hand, and having again blindfolded him, conducted him back to his dwelling.

"Are you willing," said he, "to return and complete your work?"

"Gladly, Senor Padre, provided I am so well paid."

"Well, then, to-morrow, at midnight, I will call again."

He did so—and the vault was completed.

"Now," said the priest, "you must help me to bring forth these bodies that are to be buried in this vault."

The mason's hair rose on his head at these words; he followed the priest with trembling steps into a retired chamber of the mansion, expecting to behold some ghastly spectacle of death, but was relieved on seeing three or four portly men standing in one corner. They were evidently full of money, and it was with great labor that he and the priest carried them up and consigned them to their tomb. The vault was then closed, the pavement replaced, and all traces of the work obliterated. The mason was again blindfolded and led forth by a route different from that by which he had come. After they had wandered for a long time through a perplexed maze of lanes and alleys, they halted. The priest then put two pieces of gold into his hand.

"Wait here," said he, "until yonr hear the cathedral bell toll for matins. If you presume to uncover your eyes before that time, evil will befall you;" so saying, he departed.

The mason waited faithfully, amusing himself by weighing the gold pieces in his hand, and chinking them against each other. The moment the cathedral bell rung its matin peal, he uncovered his eyes and found himself on the banks of Xenil, from where he took the best of his way home, and revelled with his family for a whole fortnight on the profits of his two hours' work; after which he was as poor as ever.

He continued to work a little and pray a good deal, to keep Saints' day and holidays, from year to year, while his family grew up as gaunt and rabid as a pack of cygnies. As he was seated one evening at his door in his hovel, he was accosted by a rich old gentleman, who was noted for owning many houses, and being a griping landlord. The man of money eyed him for a moment from beneath a pair of anxious knit brows.

"I am told, friend, that you are very poor."

"There is no denying the fact, Senor—it speaks for itself."

"I presume that you will be glad of a job and work cheap, my master, as any mason in Granada."

"That's what I want. I have an old house fallen to ruin, that cost me more money than it is worth to put to repair, for no one will live in it; so I would like to patch it up at as small an expense as possible."

The mason was accordingly conducted to a large deserted house that seemed going to ruin. Passing through its great vacant halls and chambers, he entered an inner court, where his eye was caught by an old Moorish fountain. He paused for a moment, for the sight recollections to the place very distinctly [illegible] him.

"Pray," said he, "who occupied this house formerly?"

"A man upon him!" cried the landlord, "it was an old miserly priest, who cared for nobody but himself. He came to be immensely rich, and, having no relations, it was thought he would leave his treasures to the church. He died suddenly and the priests and friars came to take possession of his effects, but could not say find just a few ducats in a leathern purse. The good luck has fallen to me, for, since his death, the old fellow continues to occupy my house rent free, paying not, and there's no taking the law of a dead man. The people pretend to hear the chinking of gold as if he was counting over his money, and sometimes a groaning and moaning about the house. If he was counting over his money, groaning and moaning about the house. If he was counting over his money, groaning and moaning about the house. If he was counting over his money, groaning and moaning about the house. If these stories brought a good tenant for me, I should not mind, but a tenant will remain [illegible]."

"Enough," said the mason sturdily, "let me live in your house rent-free until some better tenant presents, and I will put it in repair, and quiet the troubled spirit that disturbs it. I am a good Christian and a poor man, and am not to be daunted by the devil or a bag of money."

The offer of the honest mason was gladly accepted; he moved with his family into the house and fulfilled all his engagements. By little and little he restored it to better repair; the clinking of gold was no more heard at night in the chamber of the defunct priest, but began to be heard by day in the pocket of the brick-layer. His family grew up a jovial, he increased rapidly in wealth, and in the course of all his neighbors, and became one of the richest men in Granada; he gave a large dinner to the alcalde by way, no doubt, of satisfying the ears of justice, and never revealed the secret of the vault until on his death-bed to his son and heir.

CHEAPNESS A FREE PORT.—Official information has been received at the Department of State, that the Governor of the Republic of New Granada has declared Cartagena a free port, to take effect on the first of September next.

The Wild Woman.—Her Strange Appearance.—The Story of Her Capture.—Romance Realized.

Yesterday we called at the United States Hotel to see the "Wild woman of Wachita Mountains," Mr. J. W. C. Northcott, her captor, introduced us into the room where she is a prisoner. We saw a tall gracefully formed, young white girl, scantily but neatly clothed, standing with a stout rope about her waist and attached to a bed post. The first impression was similar to that of being in the presence of a fierce maniac. She stood at the foot of the bed, partially hiding behind it, and rocking slowly but with nervous uneasiness, from one foot to the other, and staring fixedly upon us with great, bright, unwinking eyes, so widely opened that a ring of white surrounded the pupils, which with the wild and intense glare of the orb, gave it a strange and frightful expression. Beneath the eyes were deep circles, showing long continued and excessive excitement or exertion, mental or physical. Her hair was long and thick, hanging in heavy matted masses and wiry tangle about her face, neck and shoulders, and in color dark brown. Her complexion was fair, even delicate, and her features decidedly handsome. Her mouth is small and finely formed, the lips thin and red, but tightly compressed, and her teeth even and white. But there was not, that we could discover, any trace of humor in her face, and we were informed by her captor that he had never seen her smile. There is not a line in her face to indicate any human passion, the only organ of expression being her eye, and that does not seem to seek, or ever to have known human sympathy.

The woman employed by Mr. Northcott to be attendant of his "pet," as he calls her, says that she has seen the girl look pleased, even seem to be amused, but her lips never curled in a smile, and nothing like a laugh ever found utterance. We need hardly say that she does not talk. The only sound she makes with her mouth is a kind of mumbling, moaning, grumbling, with which, when hungry or thirsty, she expresses a desire to eat or drink. But sometimes, her attendant says, she looks with the most animated curiosity at her (the attendant) and Mr. Northcott when they are talking in her presence, and seems to wonder how they make such noises with their mouths, but they have not succeeded in inducing her to imitate them. Her nose is handsome, and her profile well cut and striking, but the only indication of character in it is a kind of untamed audacity. There is nothing like timidity in her looks, only the discomposure mingled with defiance which gleams in the eye of a panther. The appearance of a maniac, which, to our glance, she wore when we entered her apartment, gradually passed away, and there was a softer expression and something like a gentle glow of intelligence in her still vivid eyes. Becoming more composed, she sat down, and her nurse, at our request, brushed back the tangles of her hair, showing her cheeks and forehead. These were fair. The cheek was thin, but its outlines quite womanly, and her brow and temples show intellectuality of no mean or common order. Whatever she is or may have been, she is by nature gifted with capacities of high intelligence.

STORY OF HER CAPTURE.

The story of her capture, related by Mr. Northcott, is quite remarkable. In the Spring of 1855, Mr. N., with a party of eight gold hunters, was sojourning in the Wachita Mountains, on a branch of the False Wachita river, camped near an extensive and almost impenetrable thicket. They were gold seekers, having been attracted thither by a false alarm that there was gold in that region, which our readers will remember had much newspaper circulation, and, as nearly as could be calculated, their camp was three hundred miles distant from the frontier settlements of Texas, and in what is familiarly called the Camanche country. One night in March, it was his turn to watch, and there was bright, unclouded moonlight. In the middle of the night he saw a figure approaching that seemed to be a Camanche, and he lay close and at full length on the ground. The figure approached, walking briskly, and passing within twenty yards of him, entered the thicket, and lie saw, by the moonlight, that it was no Indian, but a young woman dressed in a robe of skins. He was amazed beyond conception and told his companions of his discovery; but they hooted at the idea and contended that he had seen a Camanche, and that they would no longer be safe in that locality, and so next day they packed their mules and hurried off for Texas, in spite of entreaties. They were all green in the lore of backwoodsmen, but he had spent twenty years on the frontiers, and knew what he was about.

So strong an impression did this incident make on, his mind, that late this winter he enlisted half-a-dozen hardy fellows to accompany him, and set forth on a trip to the Wachita Mountains, on a hunt after the wild woman. So many difficulties were encountered, and the weather was so severe, that all of his companions but one backed out. He pressed forward, however, and early in March reached the encampment where he had seen the woman enter the thicket. The first thing in order was to search the thicket, and they were not long in finding a kind of den, a little cave, or rather a long and narrow aperture among the rocks, which he was convinced must be her hiding-place. With this conviction, he waited and watched for her two days and nights, when she came forth. He says that he had been afraid to enter the den, and that now his first care was to stop up the mouth of it, and wait for her to come back. After a few hours she returned, and took alarm on observing that her door in the rocks was closed against her. He had two dogs, which he set upon her, and after running about one hundred and fifty yards, she turned about, as if confused in her fright, and fled towards the cave. He ran to meet her, with a lasso in his hand, and as she approached, worried by the dogs, he threw it over her neck and called off the dogs, and she, giving a spring, jerked him to the ground, and at the second leap threw herself, the noose having by that time fastened about her throat and choked her. He then tied her, during which operation she uttered such horrid screams that the hair stood up on his head, and he had the most singular and awful feelings he ever experienced.

After securing the girl, he entered her den and found there large quantities of nuts, berries and roots, such as could be gathered and dugged in the vicinity. The principal fruit was a kind of large red haws, which were thereabout very abundant, and she had a kind of nest to sleep in, while everything indicated her utter solitude. The garment she wore was of skins, queerly tied together with bits of leather, and also with a kind of grass. The skins were those of a large animal, neither bear nor buffalo, Mr. Northcott says, and the hunters could not tell exactly from what kind of beast they were taken. It was his opinion that she had found an animal dead, or that she might have been attacked by and have mastered some beast. But there is an air of improbability about this that the strange and almost terrible reality of the woman herself does not quite dispel; and we have not room here and now to argue the point. The garments were so strong, says Mr. N., that they protected the female from the teeth of his dogs. For five days after her capture his pet refused to taste food, but then partook of red haws. She was then taken three hundred miles intervening between her den and the nearest civilized settlements in Grayson county, Texas, with a rope around her waist, the ends of which were in the hands of himself and his comrade, while the dogs followed after. As soon as he could procure it, he had a back so fixed as to make of the body a kind of cage, in which he confined her, and conveyed her safely until he finally got her on a steamboat.

She arrived here on the steamer Hickman. For a time she rejected all prepared food; but now she will eat almost any thing that is offered, that is not very salt or very sweet. Mr. Northcott says his great object now is to civilize her, to learn her to talk, and to bear her story, for he thinks he is sure that she has talked at some day, and that she has a dim notion of having long ago been with folks similar to those she now finds herself with. He is impressed, from observing her that this is the fact, and thinks that the presence of civilized faces, and being in houses, etc., has caused dormant memories to faintly revive. He disavows any intention to make a speculation out of her, and says that he will only take money from visitors that he may use it for her benefit. He shrinks from no examination on the subject, and has called several physicians to look at his strange pet. If this is a hoax, and it is so wonderful that we are not able to give it full credit, the girl, (whose age is, perhaps, twenty-two or twenty-three years,) looks the character she is made to personate so consummately, that the like was never before heard of, or dreamed. We would have it thoroughly understood that this is no exaggerated puff of a showman, but a plain and sober narrative of that which we saw, and which was in the utmost apparent good faith related to us, and which seems to be a veritable realization of romance.

The number of deaths in the city of New York, during the week ending Saturday the 14th inst., was 309, showing a decrease in the mortality of the week previous of 28.

The following appointments were confirmed by the U. S. Senate, on the 13th instant:

Augustin Capdeville, to be Appraiser of Merchandise for the port of New Orleans, Louisiana, vice Thomas Warren, resigned.

Stephen D. Dillaye, of New York, to be Appraiser of Merchandise at large, vice George W. Pomeroy, deceased.

The Ship Thornton, which arrived at New York on the 14th inst., from Liverpool, brought 860 Mormon emigrants, under the care of elder Jas. T. Willie, of Utah.

We learn from the Washington Evening Star, that the President has made the following appointments:

Chas. S. Benton, of Wisconsin, to be Register of the Land office at La Crosse, Wisconsin, in the place of Cyrus K. Lord, removed.

Chas. C. Birch, of Missouri, to be Register of the Land Office at Plattsburg, Missouri, to take effect from the 30th June, instant, vice James H. Birch, resigned.

Chas. F. M. Garnett, of Richmond, Va., now chief engineer of the Virginia and Tennessee Railroad, has received the appointment of chief engineer of the Don Pedro Railroad, Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, with a salary of $15,000.

St. Peter's at Home.

BY THEODORE S. FAY.

And so this is the mighty St. Peter's—we are certainly disappointed.

But I had been warned against a first disappointment as an illusion, and my curiosity inflamed by conflicting accounts and metaphysical paradoxes. The more strangers read about it, the more they are involved in contradictory expectations. They are told that, upon its portico, from the perfection of architecture, their sight ceases to report correctly to their minds, and that the building is so large, that it appears small.

Well, we shall see.

Several minutes were passed in measuring its ample facade; enjoying that agreeable state of mind produced by suspense on the eve of gratification.

You have held in your hand a long expected letter, and paused, playing, with pleasing anxieties; your thumb and fingers pressing the seal.

After all the marvelous is delightful.

In the vestibule we stopped again. It looks better, more rich, more gigantic.

We stood at the door of the colossal structure. Two or three times I raised my hand and desisted to prolong the slight flutter of breathless expectations.

An old beggar-woman suddenly lifted the curtains, and the interior temple broke upon us.

I have spent hours and days in St. Peter's since I wrote the above. My first impression of its interior I could not define; and, for a time, I doubted whether I was not in secret a little disappointed. It had seemed to me previously, that from the multitude of descriptions, I must have formed a tolerable idea of its size, and I trod, at first, across its vast floor, as if this were not my first visit—so fortified was I against being thrown off of my guard. I knew also how gradually its intensity would open upon me, I measured its vast chapels and broad aisles, crossed backward and forward among its columns and arches, and retraced my steps from the great altar to the door, with a survey of its gigantic dimensions, that increased long before it awakened into enthusiasm. I was not, however, so well prepared for the grandeur of its interior, nor can I hope to convey any adequate idea of its splendor. It does not consist in the tinsel show which decorates many of the cathedrals, but of the most excellent works of art—matchless paintings in mosaic—immense slabs of rare marbles, of precious value and extreme beauty; numerous statutes which people every column and embrasure—colossal tombs and monuments of the poets and other illustrious dead, wrought by the most renowned artists—angels hover around from the walls in every attitude.

The eyes and the mind ache with the glare and dazzle. The first visit is not enough for the soul to receive the streams of light which flow in upon it from all points. I wandered among those stately monuments the huge marble forms, the superb vases, and the brazen spiral pillars—arches columns and domes lead the eyes, lost and enraptured from one majestic number to another; the immense cupola, irradiated with soft paintings and descending light more and more impressed me with a sense of rotund vastness that enchanted and amazed me. It is certainly the throne and centre of earthly magnificence where everything is gorgeous, but chaste.

As I lingered in this wonderful temple, fascinated and amazed, I found that I was beginning slowly, but completely to appreciate its stupendous proportions, that in wandering about, I sometimes, for a moment mistook the small cupola for the large one, or stood wondering at the extent of the side cave, still after a few steps, the superior vastness of the real length broke upon my sight.

At last, I fairly yielded to the overpowering and effulgent splendors of a region surpassing conception, and its dimensions as well as its splendors, began to grow upon my imagination. Convinced at length, of my inability to measure distances accurately, I delighted to feel myself in a region of illusions, where the reason is ever employed in correcting the errors of the eye, and where by an unaccountable enchantment, the superb shapes, which appear of your own size, dilate as you approach, above your reach and beyond your comprehension. Where lovely women expand into giants, and chubby infants into monsters. The latter illustrates this most surprisingly, especially those which support the vases of holy water. Even at the distance of a few yards you see only such tender cherubs and smile in the mother's face, and sleep in her bosom; yet, advancing to encompass with a carressing hand the little fat foot, or dimpled leg, you find instead a massive weight of broad marble, by the side of which you seem a pigmy.

The mosaics in the cupola, which, from below, resemble smooth oil paintings, upon examination turn out little colored bits of glass, like pieces of brick, stuck, apparently, with rude hands into soft plaster, and there left to harden. We have lingered there for hours and hours, always entering with new emotions of pleasure, and quitting it with regret. I will not tire you with trite reflections by the tombs of the great, which enrich this mighty temple as well with food for the mind as the eye. You pause before the monuments where lie popes and nobles, and leaning over the gorgeous balustrade of the holy confessional, look down into the consecrated vault, where amid rare statutes and precious marbles, shrined in silent splendor, lighted by a hundred ever burning lamps, rest the remains of the great apostle.

One never tires of St. Peter's. I tread its marble floor over and over again, wrapt in ever-increasing admiration. It is a region of perpetual stateliness silence and splendor; where even the choir of bleeded voices, or the rich peal of the organ from the distant chapel, rather charms than breaks the impressive stillness, and, when the weather is ever so cloudy and dark, the streams of light descending from above, and falling among bright pictures, pillars of bronze, colored marbles, and a mass of golden decorations, reflect a mellow radiance, not unlike sunshine.

No one can comprehend this wonderful structure at a single visit, unless he mounts into the cupola and hall; but whoever reaches the giddy height of the first balustrade in the interior of the cupola, or the yet more dreadful summit of the second, whoever observes the breadth and island like proportions of its roof, and beholds the scene from its hall, must leave it overwhelmed with a sense of grandeur and immensity, satisfied that he has seen one of the wonders of the world.—[New York Mirror.

The Colporteur and Man with a Jug.

About six years ago a Colporteur of the American Tract Society was travelling on horseback through one of the most mountainous portions of Cherokee, Georgia, laden with books for distribution and sale.—When passing through a narrow gorge between two hills, where was scarcely room for more than one person to pass, he met a man with a jug. The jug had no handle, but was held by an old, greasy leathern string, tied around the neck. The Colporteur accosted him:

"Good morning, sir, can I sell you a book?"

"No, sir; I have no money," was the reply.

"Where are you going, my friend, with your jug?"

"To the still-house, sir."

"Suppose you take the money with which you propose to buy the whisky, and buy a good book, and go home without the whisky, and read the book, and I promise it will be better for you."

"But, sir, I have no money—I am to get the whisky on credit."

"Well, my friend, I will make another proposition—I will buy your jug and give you a book for it. You can then go home and read your book, and do without the liquor. What do you say to that?"

The man with the jug hesitated awhile, and then replied, "I will let you have the jug."

The Colporteur took the jug and gave him a copy of the Temperance Manual, and, hanging his new purchase on his arm, journeyed on till night, when he gave the jug to the lady of the house at which he spent the night. He visited several families before night, however, carrying the jug, which was a great matter of astonishment and wonder to all who saw him, and the question was frequently asked, "What are you doing with that jug?"

The Colporteur heard nothing more of the man from whom he bought the jug until this year, during the sitting of the Supreme Court in the county of C——, six years having elapsed. Being at court, still engaged in colporteurage for the Tract Society, he was accosted by a gentleman with the inquiry:

"Do you remember trading for a jug, several years ago, in the hills about here?"

"I do, sir," replied the Colporteur.

"Yonder," said the gentleman, pointing to a sober looking man, "is the man from whom you bought it. He was at the time you met him a drunkard—a pest to society. Now he is a sober man, and has been ever since the day you took the jug away from him. He is now an orderly and consistent member of the church, and enjoys religion. He is industrious and supports his family well; whereas, while he owned the jug, he did little else than make his visits to the still-house, and fill and empty his jug."

The Colporteur, feeling some interest, inquired of the man how the change was so suddenly wrought on him. "Was it the tract?" "No," said he, "it was your determination, and the interest you seemed to manifest in my welfare; and, besides this, you took my jug, and that set me thinking; then I went home and read the tract, and determined, by the help of God, I would never drink another drop, and I have been enabled to keep that promise."

This is a plain, unvarnished tale, and shows how much may be done by strong personal efforts. Cast thy bread upon the waters, for thou shalt find it after many days.

The ship E. Owens sailed from Hampton Roads, on Friday, the 13th inst., for Liberia, with a large number of colored emigrants; among whom were the forty emancipated slaves of Cols. Hall and Meredith, of Rappahannock, Virginia, whose outfit cost seven thousand dollars, besides eight thousand in cash which had been divided among them.

THE OBJECT ATTAINED.

A FEW years ago, Dr. John M. Good, than whom there is no higher medical authority, declared that there was "great room for improvement in the mode of treating worms." His remark no longer applies. WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE leaves nothing to be desired in this respect. Its uniform effect is to discharge the worms from the bowels, and to allay the irritation they cause. This preparation is as harmless as it is quick and thorough in its operation.

Blue Beard.

The bugbear of every nursery in Christendom was no fabulous monster veiled in human form. He actually lived, moved, and had a being in the fifteenth century; not, however, as a long-robed, turbaned Oriental, as the pictures which used to make our blood curdle, would lead us to think.

On an eminence which overlooks the little village of Champtoce, near the Loire, stands the imposing ruin of an old feudal castle. Its grey walls, here and broken, rear themselves against the glorious sky; and amid the tumbling turrets, the bat and the owl beat their wings and shriek in their midnight revels. The superstitious peasantry avoid the neighborhood from fear, and when the sturni whistles and the wind moans, they imagine the sounds to be wails from the injured dead of the old ruin. The dread of the place is not a new feeling, but has existed among successive generations of peasantry since the reign of Charles the Seventh. It was at that time the dwelling of Gilles de Retz, a feudal baron, who, as he was then, and still is called, the "Barbe Bleu," was, no doubt, the original of our time-honored, or rather feared, Blue Beard. His deeds of blood, which were but the every day incidents of his life, made him the terror of the surrounding region. The bare mention of his name was enough to subdue the most rebellious urchin into submission.

Well does the history of this man reveal the dark superstition of the fifteenth century, and also the impunity with which one in high rank might commit the most revolting crimes against humanity. De Retz had once been in possession of immense estates and untold wealth. But by the most debasing excesses he not only squandered his fortune, but also ruined his constitution, so that, while yet a young man, he bore the appearance of decrepitude and old age. He could not, however, consent to pay the penalty of his sin by becoming old before his time. In the blindness of his superstition he conceived the hope of reclaiming both health and wealth by the power of magic. Having heard of a famous Italian alchymist who had performed some great miracles by this art, he sent for him to the castle.

The cunning magician at once read his man, and encouraged his hopes; he was, therefore, employed at a high price to undertake the work, and invited to make the lofty castle his home. The first act was the winning back of health and vigor, without which all other treasures are of little avail. Numberless were the arts he tried, and mysterious the preparations he made. The dark dungeons and secret subterranean passages beneath the castle were the scene of his work. Here the terrified peasantry imagined that the Italian made a compact with the Prince of Darkness, and sold the duped De Retz to him in compensation for his aid in restoring his health. Among many nonsensical and harmless experiments, were also some of a cruel and abominable character. He induced his infatuated employer to believe there existed in the blood of infants a charm for restoring youth and vigor. He assured him that, by bathing daily in the blood of these innocents, the pure young life which had so lately coursed through their tiny veins would be transferred to his own.

The bloody baron did not shrink for one moment from the commission of the horrid crime which this prescription rendered necessary. Tender infants were secretly stolen or forcibly torn from their parents, and kept in the dungeons of the castle till their blood was required. It is believed that not less than one hundred humble mothers were thus deprived of their youngest born. This fiend in human shape hired a magician but not a murderer. That office he reserved for himself, nor did his savage nature shrink from the horrid work it imposed. With his own hand did he pierce the hearts of his affrighted little victims until there was blood sufficient to cover his emaciated body. This is one instance of the cruelty of De Retz. We think very likely his wives shared the fate of the poor infants, and that the story of Blue Beard in wide trousers, loose robe and turban, was not exaggerated.

But crime cannot always go unpunished. Even then, when the rich relied over the poor, justice and mercy triumphed at last. The cries and entreaties of the heart-broken people around his domains reached the ears of his superior, Jean V. He was arrested and brought before a tribunal of justice. His palace was thrown open to the public gaze, and its horrid dens and vaults were swift witnesses against him. He was found guilty of murders by scores, and after confessing many crimes, before unknown, he was burnt at the stake in Nantes, 1440. This was the original of "Blue Beard," and there, although more than four hundred years have passed away since he paid the penalty of his crimes, the broken walls and jagged turrets still stand as a memorial that the wicked shall not go unpunished. Executive Mansion, Washington, January 31st, 1853.

To the Proprietors Eagle Cotton Gin Co.

GENTLEMEN: I have the pleasure to inform you that a Jury of the Royal Commissioners connected with the Exhibition of the Works of all Nations, at London, in the year 1851, in consideration of your having exhibited a specimen of a Cotton Gin, has awarded you an Exhibitor's Medal, Certificate, and an Copy of the Reports of the Juries.

These articles are in the possession of Col. Peter Force, of this city, Chairman of the American Executive Committee, and will be forwarded to you by such mode of conveyance as you shall suggest.

Very respectfully, your obedient Servant,
MILLARD FILLMORE,
Chairman of the United States Committee.
PETER FORCE,
Chairman of the Executive Committee.

A Prize of $1250, and a Gold Medal

Was awarded to the Eagle Cotton-Gin Co., by the Agricultural and Horticultural Society of India, for an Gin suited for making fine Cotton, as will be noticed by the following copy of a letter dated—

Agricultural and Horticultural Society of India,
Calcutta, September 3d, 1853.

GENTLEMEN: Beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 14th July, 1851, advising the despatch of a Cotton Gin to compete for the prize of Rupees, 5000, offered by the Government of India in 1849, through the Agricultural and Horticultural Society of India.

In reply, thereto, I have now the honor to enclose two Bank of England Post Bills, being the equivalent of the sum of Rupees, 2500, which has been granted you as your premium.

I have further the pleasure to inform you that the Society has been pleased to award you its GOLD MEDAL on the same account, and which will be forwarded you by another opportunity as soon as the Inscription has been placed upon it.

I am, Gentlemen, yours faithfully,
A. H. BLECHYNDEN,
Secretary A. and H. Society of India.

A medal was also awarded them at the Crystal Palace, New York.

Some of the peculiarities of the Eagle Cotton-Gin are the following:

The "Detached Brushes," EXCLUSIVELY used by us and PATENTED, are so formed that when not in the fibres or brush, the top is entirely detached from the brush, as well as from the other grates; and when the Gin is in operation, the fibres of the cotton, which are partly separated from the roll by the saw-teeth, are penalized to pass through without obstruction, and to clear themselves from the tops of the grates. The tendency to choke and clog, and the consequent increase of friction and injury to the staple, which attends the use of all other various forms of grates, is entirely avoided, and the ease with which the cotton is detached from the saw and carried through by the saw-teeth, is peculiar to this form of grate. They are chilled or hardened at the point where the saw-teeth pass, and the utmost attention is paid to their finish and setting.

The "Improved Brush" is also peculiar in its construction and mode of operation, the object of the invention having been to combine the advantages of the Cylinder, or close, and the Serpent or open Brushes, and to secure the objectionable features of each of these forms. The supply of air for the Gin-Stand the regulation and control of, which is one of the most important functions of the Brush) is admitted through openings in the Brush heads, and it is forced out, when the Brush is in motion, through long narrow slits or openings in the circumference of the Brush and between the rows of bristles. The several thin sheets or currents of air act alternately with the rows of bristles, to detach the fibres of cotton from the saw-teeth in minute portions, and, with the aid of the "Detached Grates," give to the cotton, when delivered into the flat-room, that peculiar combed or carded appearance so well known and so much desired by purchasers.

This Brush may be made to blow through a line of twenty or thirty feet in length, as may be used with a short line, as may be preferred. The varying eddies and counter currents of air which attend the use of the common open or whipped Brushes are entirely avoided, and a uniform and steady draft, of any desired strength, may at all times be secured by varying the speed, the depths of the wings, or the area of the space through which the air is supplied.

The "Sliding Butts or Hinges," by which the Breast or Grate Fall is attached to the frame of the Stand, were invented and applied to the Eagle Gin Stand, in order to adapt it more fully to the different views and wishes of planters, to the varieties of cotton, and to the various sizes of the rotation of different pickings. A peculiar curve is given to the front surface of the grate, at the point where the saw-teeth pass, and the front of the saw-tooth may be made to assume any desired angle. With this curved surface of the grate, at the entrance of the cotton, the sliding hinge to adapt the machine to the different varieties of cotton, or in the different states of it, and to gin fast or slow at pleasure. This invention, although very simple, is believed by us to be one of the most useful ever attached to the Cotton Gin; and, when properly understood and adjusted, it gives to the ginner almost perfect control over the product of the gin, determining, in a great measure both the quantity and quality of the product.

In making the saw-teeth, to insure the greatest accuracy possible, an instrument invented especially for the purpose is made use of, called the "Demounter," or tooth-measurer. By this instrument, the exact angle of every saw is measured when the teeth is cut; so that the various angles described above can always be determined with great precision, and the range of grinding angles may be varied to any desired extent.

Startling and Interesting Facts

CONCERNING

CHOLERA, DIARRHŒA, DYSENTERY, COLIC,

Summer Complaints, etc.

A fact that should shudder this: One feels a slight uneasiness in the bowels, a slight diarrhœa comes on, which is little thought of; in a short time, in a few hours, perhaps seldom days, it is attended with sickness of the stomach, a most sinking weakness, rapid discharges, coldness, cramps, agonies, blackness, collapse, DEATH—and yet all this fatal result from a disregard of the warning! Incipient Diarrhœa, and neglect of it were no provision of a safe and sure remedy that Kind Providence has made easy to all.

This remedy is made public from the strongest desire to expose the exposed, under the best substantial conviction that it is certain in its good effects, and with it on hand, no one heeding the warning and using the remedy, need be a victim to the Cholera.

DR. RILAND'S

CARMINATIVE and ASTRINGENT SYRUP

IS THIS SURE REMEDY.

By the advice and urgent request of hundreds, whose lives have been saved—of many even when apparently in the very last struggles of death—he has been induced, to make still more efforts to give a wider publicity, to a remedy so greatly successful.

The perfection which he and others ascribe to this remedy may appear beyond the power of medicine to possess; yet the truthfulness of the claim is most thoroughly established, and will be fully confirmed by calling on the individuals who have witnessed its effects, and need it with complete success, some of whose names we are authorized to give.

For Cholera, Colic, Cholera Morbus, Dysentery, Diarrhœa, Bloody Flux, Summer Complaint and Weakness of the Bowels, this medicine is offered as a certain remedy. This is the medicine that has restored the horrible absense so prevalent among the Mexican soldiers. The officers first commenced its use, after which they gave it their soldiers, and cured in every case without an exception. I would refer to the officers and others who served in the war with Mexico. Sold by Methodist Preachers' Wives that I have Known.

ADDRESSED TO STEWARDS OF THE M. E. C., S.

It has often occurred to me that ministers' wives are greater martyrs than their husbands. A man who believes he is called by God to the high commission of preaching the everlasting gospel to sinners, is in every trial enabled as it were to fall back on that high and holy calling, to keep his feet on a rock, and his head above the storm-clouds and vapors. While his wife, as a general thing, married the minister because she thought he was a good man, who loved her, and whom she loved. The trials and self-denials she saw before her she was ready to bear for her husband's sake. I do not say but that there are women who, when they marry a minister, feel that they are giving themselves to Christ and his cause, and are buoyed up by high purposes and hopes in their many heart-struggles. Then the minister has the excitement of new scenes and new faces, and is often encouraged by the sympathy and love of friends. His wife is left to the monotonous routine of daily duties and toils—left alone often with no sympathy and poor health, low spirits and a slim purse.

In the outset I want you to understand that I am no minister, nor am I the wife of an itinerant. I never expect or wish a dollar from the church, so I may claim to be perfectly disinterested in my strictures, if I make any, and I will imply some before I finish this article.

The first Methodist preacher's wife whom I remember, was a very pretty, nice looking little woman, with dark eyes and real auburn hair that curled naturally. She had brought her husband a snug little property, which, if he could have managed well, might have increased to opulence. As it was, he had to go about his "master's business," he felt "woe is me if I preach not the gospel," consequently the farm and servants did not pay expenses.

The Rev. Mr. A. was one of the "big guns" of the church. In any other profession he might have made a name equal to that of Webster or Clay. Yet I think I may truly say that the Methodist church, as a church, never supported him and his family. The church might have thought that as he had some property he had no right to a support. But it does not seem so to me.—If we employ a lawyer or a doctor we feel bound to pay him for his services, even if he be rich. I do not see that a church has a right to make a man give it his time and talents. But I have strayed from my preacher's wife number one.

In those far-off days long ago, there were no parsonages in the South-West, or very few. Mrs. —— chose to stay at the farm. I can well remember, (for I used to be there a good deal myself,) when her husband was on a station just fifty miles from home. She lived in a log cabin, very neat it was, and as good as the most of houses in the settlement. Many lonely days she passed, with no company but that of her one child and the memory of her bright-eyed boy whom God taken home. Yet she rarely looked sad. Always busy with her needle, knitting, gardening, instructing her child or reading, she rarely took time to think how lonely she was. Her husband would usually contrive to leave the city on Sunday evening and come to the house of a friend, a few miles in the country, and by taking an early start on Monday morning, he would reach home in time for supper on Monday evening. He would stay at home until Saturday morning, then take an early start, and reach his appointment Sunday, remain at the station four Sabbaths, and come home to spend five nights and four days. Of course all the care and management of the farm and family fell on the wife, and nobly did she act her part.

The property these people possessed did not justify them in giving wages sufficient to employ an efficient overseer. So matters in the field went pretty much as they would, and the preacher never made a good bargain in his life. I reckon he was too much afraid of cheating some one. Well, it is a mystery to me how that woman contrived to live as well as she did, but she saw to everything, and I think God helped her. Brother ——'s home was a Methodist Tavern. The preachers all stopped there; of course, it was their home.—Then other travelers who knew brother ——, traveling agents, beggars, clock peddlars, etc. etc., stopped there, and sister —— always had a comfortable meal provided and a good bed. I said the church, as a church, never supported brother —— and family, yet there was one Methodist man who seemed to be inspired by the good Lord to give them just the help they needed. Sometimes it was a barrel of sugar or sack of coffee, sometimes a suit of clothes, sometimes an overcoat, once a neat barouche to sister ——. Once he loaned money to help pay for a decent comfortable house for sister ——. I wish I dared to put down his name, but it is known in all our borders, and I trust recorded in "the Lamb's book of life."

To her untiring industry Mrs. —— added the kindest of hearts. Was there a poor family in the neighborhood, she was one of the first to hear of it and try to do something for them. A few years after I first knew her, her health became wretched, but her industry, her sympathy with others, her desire to be useful, her spirit of self-sacrifice did not fail her, and though most women in her health would have been bed-ridden, she managed to attend to as much as many a well woman. Yet this woman, because she was quiet and retiring, was never appreciated but by a few. If she had been a woman to descant learnedly and logically on "fate, foreknowledge, free will and the humanities," persons would have thought that brother —— had a splendid wife.

The next preacher's wife in my book of memory is Mary Hearn; her looks and character were daguerreotyped on my childish heart. I remember the first time I saw her at my father's. The feeling with me was, "there is a good woman." There was an air of quiet dignity about her that made you feel that you must respect her under any circumstances. When I saw her she had not long been married, and had traveled through the Indian Nation to our conference, where her husband's work lay. And now she was in Mississippi. She had left her "dear ones at home," whom she loved fondly, to abide among strangers, but there was a clear, calm light in her eyes that told of a peace beyond the power of adventitious circumstances to touch. The provision in those days was $100 for the preacher, $100 for his wife, and $24 for each child under sixteen years old. Uncle Hearn's district was very large and lay at one time on the west side of the Mississippi. There were no provisions for preacher's wives over there, so it was concluded that Mrs. Hearn should stay at the house of brother Winan's, while her husband went on his eight week's district. I want the stewards who may deign to read these random sketches to follow me closely and put themselves in the place of the Rev. Mr. Hearn, and their wives in the situation of his wife, thousands of miles from father, sister and brothers, among strangers—her husband absent nearly two months at a time preaching to sinners and endeavoring to build up the church. These two preachers' wives were very cheerful, very kind to each other, and in the main very happy. On Sunday they went to the church either to preaching or class-meeting. The church was three miles off, and they rode to church on horseback, as every one else did.

After the Methodist people got acquainted with Mrs. Hearn she made many friends, and there was quite a contest who should have her company. To her was verified the good word which says, "whoso leaveth father and mother and lands for my sake and the gospel's, shall receive in this life an hundred fold of houses and land and brethren." There was a home for Mrs. Hearn at Col. Richardson's, where she was received by children and servants almost by acclamation. At Judge McGeehee's, at sister Chandler's, of Laurel Hill, sister Davis's, and at sister Feary's of Pinckneyville. All this was very pleasant. But the more excellent way would have been to have had a parsonage on the district, and a reasonable sum for expenditure put into the hands of the minister as his right. All the kindness tendered them looked too much like favors, while in reality a home and a support was their right.—The times I write of were thirty years ago. But are Presiding Elders and their wives much better provided for now? What kind of a parsonage is the Rev. —— in? Our dear Brother —— who gives himself to the work of the Lord? I do not know surely, but I do not think he has anything to boast of in the way of parsonage this year.

I recollect that while uncle Hearn was absent on one of his long journeys, his wife was taken very sick at Col. Richardson's, she seemed hovering long between life and death. No one knew at what point to find her husband, and in those days there was no magnetic telegraph. All that friendship or medical skill could do for her was done, and after a long struggle she was restored to life. Her physician said her patience and equanimity saved her.

Think of that stewards, a wife at the gates of death, her husband perhaps five hundred miles off, no mother, sister or brother nearer than a thousand miles. When you make your next assessment think of Mary Hearn, and don't imagine but that the preacher's wife can be sick and need all the comforts that money can buy. When uncle Hearn came back he found his Mary better, and gathering together all the money he could get, (I reckon he borrowed some of it,) he went with a trembling heart to pay the Doctor who had so faithfully attended his wife. I think sixty-eight dollars was all that he could raise, and he was afraid that would not do. On offering it the Doctor utterly declined taking anything. Poor Doctor M., he met an untimely grave. May God have remembered him for that kindness. Do those Methodists among whom uncle Hearn went laboring, preaching, praying and doing his best to supply the word of life, ever think of him or his self-sacrificing wife now? Has any one made Mrs. Hearn a life member of the Missionary Society, or sent her the Home Circle or Guide to Holiness as a token of remembrance? Some few years ago Uncle Hearn became involved in his pecuniary matters through no fault of his, except that he had a kind and trusting heart. Did any of those people who were kept from semi-heathenism by his ministrations step forward and help him out of his difficulties? I fear not.

Now I have told you about two preachers' wives that I "have known," I will tell you about one whom I did not know personally, but of whom I have heard. Her husband was a choice spirit—one who loved God, and did his duty to the people under his charge; an intelligent man. He was sent to one of our Southern cities, where there were some wealthy Methodists, who owed every thing they were to their parents having become Methodist.—"Not to put too fine a point upon it," Methodism had brought them "up out of the ashes." Well the society thought a great deal of their intelligent, devoted preacher, but love and duty could not keep him, the Master called him, and he met the summons like a christian hero, "died in the full triumphs of a glorious faith." There was great grief in the church, and in the city. He had funeral honors from the church, the Odd Fellows, and the community. And now ——, his wife takes in sewing to eke out a living for herself and her five children.

Another dear preachers' wife that I know. She is young, amiable, intelligent, pious, and every way interesting, who married her husband with the full purpose to be a help meet for him in his great work. She has a manner which will win her way to hearts any where. She is peculiarly fitted to visit the sick, and the poor, to sooth and comfort them, and she loves to do it.—As a Sabbath-School teacher she is unsurpassed. Last year her husband was sent to a place where there was a parsonage, and where the people knew how to treat their preacher and his family. Every thing that could add to the comfort of a sensitive, delicate, affectionate young woman who was away from home was thought of. Even down or up to flowers and books on her birth day. What a kind, graceful hostess she was in her snug little parsonage home. How the people loved and petted her last year. How is it this year? They were sent to a city where there are a good many wealthy Methodists, and near which reside two able defenders of the doctrines of our church. After some difficulty they got a place to board. She has to nurse and amuse her two little children without assistance, except when her husband can spare time from his pastorial duties, his study, etc., to assist her:—She must receive the calls of the sisters and look genteel you know, or they would say that Brother ——, has a slovenly wife.

Of course she has to sew for husband, self, and children. How is she to find any time to read, to visit, to do good? I should like to know. What a short sighted policy in a church to tie the hands of a woman such as she, by forcing her to assume cares which keep her whole time employed. She is a perfectly devoted mother, and feels that the care of her children is a pleasure. Yet it is not right that she should be minister's lady, nurse, and seamstress without help. I saw a letter from her in which she says, "I came here when the baby was a month old, it was a cold, muddy day, every thing looked desolate, we had to come here where we board, no one to welcome us. The people do not know how we are situated. I am expected to receive company like any other lady, only a little more, with two babies to nurse. Well I do what I can and leave the rest undone. The greatest trial in it all is, that I am almost deprived of any public means of grace; occasionally a sermon at 11 o'clock, is all my privilege in this way. I keep up a quiet brave heart under it although." Speaking of writing, she says, "I cannot write till after I put the children to sleep, and then I feel too tired to write any thing interesting."—This preacher's wife is not one of the complaining sort, but was writing just how she was situated, to a sort of second mother.

I addressed this piece to the stewards of the church because I want them to think more about the duties of their office. Half the evils of this world come from not thinking. I make very free in addressing stewards, because I am a sort of outside stewardess myself.—My husband is a faithful steward, "though I say it who ought not to say it." In his unavoidable absences I have in my time performed some of his duties. I know what rebuffs stewards meet with. I once had a man to seem to imply that I might keep the money, at least he was not willing to let me have it—wanted to see my husband.—When my husband came into the steward's life some twenty-five years ago, people had very strange ideas about provision for a preacher, and his family. Some thought that $25 every three months was quarterage. And some of the stewards thought that $100 for the preacher, $100 for his wife, and a barrel of pork, 75 weight of coffee, and a barrel of sugar for table expenses was enough. My husband took up the matter, and battled for the rights of the preachers, till he got the most of the stewards to think and feel rightly, and made some his enemies by his plain speaking.—And now our region of country is one of the most liberal for its means of any that I know. And I believe my husband ought to be canonized as a steward when he dies. In all his struggles in this righteous cause I have sympathized with him, and now I feel like enlisting good men, and true, to do steward's duty full. Stewards generally are to still, too much afraid of rebuffs. They must give all that up, and come up like men to a good work for the sake of "Him who has done all for them."

This article is hastily written, but if I write at all I have to write in a hurry. I have at this time a great deal of sewing to do for my family and cannot take much time to write. If I get along pretty well with my boys' pants, and my little girl's dresses that they are needing very badly, I shall write another article soon. I wrote this for ——'s sake.

How to Promote Peace in a Family.

1. Remember that our will is likely to be crossed every day, so prepare for it.

2. Everybody in the house has an evil nature as well as ourselves, and therefore we are not to expect too much.

3. To learn the different temper and disposition of each individual.

4. To look on each member of the family as one for whom we should have a care.

5. When any good happens to any one to rejoice at it.

6. When inclined to give an angry answer, to "overcome evil with good."

7. If from sickness, pain or infirmity we feel irritable, to keep a very strict watch over ourselves.

8. To observe when others are so suffering, to drop a word of kindness and sympathy suited to them.

9. To watch for little opportunities of pleasing, and to put little annoyances out of the way.

10. To take a cheerful view of everything, of the weather, and encourage hope.

11. To speak kindly of the servants—to praise them for little things when you can.

12. In all little pleasures which may occur, to put self last.

13. To try for "the soft answer which turneth away wrath."

14. When we have been pained by an unkind word or deed, to ask ourselves: "Have I not often done the same and been forgiven?"

15. In conversation not to exalt ourselves, but to bring others forward.

16. To be very gentle with the young ones, and treat them with respect.

17. Never to judge one another harshly, but to attribute a good motive when we can.

TRIP TO ATTAKAPAS.

CAMP-MEETING AT PLAQUEMINE BRULEE.

Taking our seats in the elegant and comfortable cars of the Great Western train, Dr. Keener and myself were soon borne away with the speed of the iron horse, whose snort is heard everywhere.

The first character who attracted our attention was the "ice cream woman." Ice cream has become a railroad concomitant. Upon inquiry our merchantess said it was "the pure thing." Our interrogatory suggested to her some general reflections upon the depravity of the age, as evinced in the adulteration of milk.

She expressed the surprise the discovery of these arts gave her, by saying "it put out her pipe, it did that," but in a soliloquising way reflectively shook her head and said "they can't fool me, no, no." She seemed as she sat to indulge in a sort of complacent wonder at her own depth, and chidingly shook her head, urgently protesting against so much astuteness.

In due time we were at the Bœuf Depot and on board the Major Aubry, a diligent little packet whose office it is to carry the mail and passengers to Franklin. At dinner I was quite impressed with the consummate skill displayed in making variety out of sameness. Irish potatoes served up in three different styles and the like.

A pleasant run brought us by five o'clock P. M., to Franklin. The pastor, brother Davies, met us with cordial hospitality, which was soon emphasized by sister Davies, in the pleasant parsonage house. Next morning brother Murphy sent his carriage and servant to drive us twenty miles to Rev. Bro. Jenkin's, where we spent the remainder of the day in the company of some pleasant Methodist friends who called to see us.

Next morning, at four A. M., we were rolling over the smooth and beautiful road leading towards Minden, La., brother Jenkins accompanying us, and conveying us in his carriage. We made a drive in fifteen hours of some sixty miles, and reached Mr. Harwell's.

These prairies are most beautiful, giving one an enlarged idea of the boundless amplitudes of space. Indeed the country is remarkable for space—far as the eye can reach the green and gently rolling prairie spreads away, until the emerald and the blue seemed to meet and mingle. The vast expanse is dotted with farm houses and variegated and adorned with artificial groves to supply the natural destitution of shade and timber. The soil is most productive, and covered with a carpet of luxuriant and nutricious grass on which numerous herds and flock were feeding. When the great Western is finished through these fertile and beautiful plains we shall have in the city a vast increase of the supplies of the comforts of life, and at greatly reduced cost, to the mutual benefit of city and country.

On Friday morning, after a drive of twelve miles across the prairie, we came upon the camp-ground in the edge of a wood, near the prairie, on the little Bayou Plaquemine Brulee. Here the tents, the smoke, the vehicles, the people, above all the cordial welcome, brought "the light of other days around us." We had come by the travel route some two hundred miles to assist at the inauguration of the camp-meeting institution in South-Western Louisiana.

The country had for weeks been suffering for rain, but on this day the gracious Lord seemed to reward the people for their toils and sacrifices by pouring from the clouds a succession of refreshing showers, until the people felt that there was an "abundance of rain." One of the first peculiarities that struck me was the abundance and adaptation of long moss for extempore mattresses and carpeting. We missed the straw of other days, but here was as good or better thing hanging on the trees about us.

THE MEETING.

Brother Goodwyn, the Presiding Elder, and Bro. Alexander, the pastor, assisted by some eight more of us conducted the public labors of the meeting. As a camp-meeting is a novel thing in this Southern land, and as there were several points of peculiar interest, we will, with your permission, enter somewhat into detail.

First as to the support and subsistence of the meeting, the neighbors adjacent furnished meat, meal, butter and sugar, and allowed none from a distance to furnish supplies. Oxen and sheep were slaughtered every day and like Israel we had daily meat offerings for the congregation of the Lord. Some came to the meeting a distance of from twenty to sixty miles, yet their horses were generously cared for without a cent of charge.

The order and deportment of the people, although the meeting was a most novel thing, could not have been better. No drunkenness, no quarreling, no profanity, in short no riotous or disorderly conduct.

The first regular services came off about six P. M., Friday. The first penitents were called for at three o'clock, Saturday evening service, when full a score came to the altar, some of whom were happily converted. They were called at the close of nearly every service, and always came, and though the congregation never exceeded four hundred, there were at times, full fifty penitents weeping and praying for mercy. Some were converted in the tents, and some went home at night and were converted there.

"Young men and maidens, old men and children," were the subjects of converting grace. There was not a camp or family on the ground but what were blessed in some of their members with the consolations of the "great salvation."

The scene in the altar at times was awfully sublime and glorious. Scores crying for mercy, while all around were old Christians and young converts weeping, smiling, singing and shouting forth the praise of God. Old men and their venerable companions rejoicing over each other's return to God. Sisters rejoicing over their brothers newly made the "sons of God." Parents wept and shouted their grateful joy over the conversion of children long the subjects their prayers.

Some of the converts were persons who had been baptized in the papal church. They came to hear, and God blessed the word to their awakening, and many of them are now numbered with our Israel. Among them was a venerable woman, the mother of a numerous posterity, more than seventy years of of age.

The preachers entered most heartily into the work, working in pulpit and altar as need required. Every sermon seemed to be preached with a special view to adaptation and immediate usefulness, and no one preached without realizing the promise of the Master, "Lo I am with you."

The meeting resulted in sixty-six conversions that were counted, besides others who left uncounted, and seventy-two accessions to the church. Many of the heads of families and persons likely to exert an extended and permanent influence for God.

I was never at a better meeting, and for the number in attendance more sinners were convicted, more penitents converted and more believers blessed than I ever saw elsewhere.

We hear now and then some croaker, or some enemy of Methodism, saying our glory hath departed and the system has exhausted itself. Had such been with us they would have felt that the fire upon our altars never burned brighter, and that the gospel was never more the power of God than on this occasion. The conversions of course, as usual, varied in character, some were sudden as a flash of lightning, some came like the dawn of the morning. Some heard in their hearts a "loud voice" saying thy sins are forgiven. Some the "still small voice" saying "go in peace."

Many touching and pleasant incidents occurred, which we cannot note. One night all the sinners save three were at the altar, and one of them was a Jew pedlar.

A gentleman said "he had never been to such a place before—that his horse, proverbial for running away, stayed about the ground of his own accord, and that his umbrella had set under a tree two days, and nobody had touched it," which, considering the lax views that have obtained ground in relation to the right of property in umbrellas, was strongly descriptive of the high moral tone of the meeting.

The congregation subscribed $1,100 to build a church on the spot where the camp-meeting was held. They fully expect to hold another camp-meeting on the same ground in 1857. A better locality could not be found for natural beauty, good shade, good water and freedom from musquitoes. We used no bars and had not the slightest use for them.

We hope the success of the Plaquemine Brulee camp-meeting will "provoke" others in various sections of our conference. We ought to have one in the Chicot work and in Rapides.

Camp-meetings can accomplish a mission and reach a class that no other instrumentality can. Let them be encouraged by the preachers. Let the people be exhorted to hold them, and the God of our fathers will make us a thousand times as many as we are.

J. B. WALKER.

The citizens of Philadelphia have sent a committee to New York to extend a welcome to Mr. Fillmore, in behalf of that city.

Thirty-Fourth Congress—First Session.

WASHINGTON, June 21st, 1856.—The Senate is not in session.

House.—Mr. Colfax spoke upon the subject of laws emanating from the Legislature of Kansas—branding them as a code of oppression, outrage and wrong, which would be disgraceful to the Legislature of any State, as they are to the Goths and Vandals who seek to tyranize over the citizens of that territory. He argues that some of these statutes were enacted in direct contravention to the organic law and constitution of the United States, especially to those provisions relative to the freedom of speech and of the press.

Mr. Burlingame defended Massachusetts against general and specific charges, claiming that in all that constitutes true greatness she is the first State, and her present performances superior to her past recollections. He was sorry to find at the head of her assailants the President of the United States, who had deliberately perverted history to eulogize the South at the expense of the North, and become the chieftain of sectionalism. Massachusetts believed, with South Carolina, that the fugitive slave law was unconstitutional.

Mr. Keitt asked Mr. Burlingame for his authority relative to South Carolina.

Mr. Burlingame cited the remarks of the Charleston Mercury, which spoke of the fugitive slave law as an infringement of one of the most cherished principles of the constitution. In conclusion, he referred to Mr. Sumner's speech, the purity and nobleness of its sentiments and the severity of its strictures against tyranny. Mr. Sumner never had a personal enemy. His character was as pure as the snow which falls upon his native hills, and his heart overflowing with kindness for every human being bearing the upright form of man. He was an accomplished scholar and a chivalrous gentleman. A member of the House, who had taken the oath to support the constitution stole into the Senate and struck him as Cain smote his brother.

Mr. Keitt—It is false. (Sensation.)

Mr. Burlingame replied that he would not handy epithets, but he was responsible for his own language only, and doubtless the gentleman was responsible for his.

Mr. Keitt—I am.

Mr. Burlingame, after describing and severely condemning the assault, asked, "Call you that chivalry? In what code of honor did you get authority for that? If we are not to have freedom of speech, what is all this government worth? If we are to be called to an account by some gallant nephew of some gallant uncle, for everything which does not suit their sensitive nerves, we want to know it. If the conflict is to be transferred from a peaceful, intellectual field, where honors are equal and easy, we desire to know it. The time may come when Massachusetts may withdraw her representatives to her own bosom, where safety is not to be found for them under the flag of their common country. But while those representatives are here, they will speak when and how they will, answering for the consequences. If they are pressed too long and too far, they will not shrink from a defence of the honor of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and the freedom of speech.

Mr. Keitt sought to obtain the floor, which was awarded to Mr. Carlile, who declined to yield it.

Mr. Keitt gave notice that he should on Monday reply to some points in Mr. Burlingame's speech.

Mr. Burlingame was privately congratulated by his friends.

Mr. Carlisle condemned the Cincinnati resolutions, or, as he said, the fillibustering platform. Mr. Fremont could not receive the electoral vote of any district, except that represented by Mr. Giddings. The contest was between Mr. Fillmore, the candidate of the National party, and Mr. Buchanan, who is supported by a faction.

Mr. Washburn, of Maine, urged the necessity of a union of the opponents of the Administration, and those adverse to the extension of slavery in the territories. He examined the platform of the Cincinnati Convention, in connection with the principles and antecedents of Mr. Buchanan, and with doctrines of the Democratic party, concluding by saying it was an inexpressible relief to emerge from the dark and fetid atmosphere, reeking with shames and wrongs, into the clear light and healthful breezes of truth and liberty. He spoke of Mr. Fremont as the standard-bearer of freedom in this contest; a strong and true man, whose aim it would be to maintain the principles of the Constitution, and bring back the Government to the policy of Washington and Jefferson.

Mr. Washburn triumphed in the faith, nay, the undoubting conviction that the proceedings of the Republican Convention would be sustained by a large majority of the American people. The House then adjourned.

JUNE 23.—Senate.—Mr. Fish presented a letter from George Sumner, brother of Senator Sumner. It states that the impression which might be drawn from Dr. Boyle's letter, that the latter was dismissed from his attendance upon Mr. Sumner on account of the character of his testimony before the House Investigating Committee, was unfounded, as he did not know at the time Dr. Boyle was dismissed what his testimony was.

Senator Sumner was suffering from high fever, with his pulse at 104, and Dr. Perry being willing to take charge of the case, Dr. Boyle's services were no longer required.

Mr. Toombs gave notice of his intention to introduce a bill to take the census of Kansas in order to protect the exercise of the elective franchise in the territory, and provide for calling a convention to form a constitution preparatory to admission into the Union.

House.—This week, by previous agreement, had been set apart for the consideration of territorial business. A bill authorizing the President to cause the southern boundary line of Kansas to be surveyed, was passed.

Mr. Wakeman gave notice of his intention to introduce a bill amendatory of the act of 1818, prohibiting the introduction or importation of slaves.

WASHINGTON, June 24.—Senate.—Mr. Brodhead presented a communication from Judge Gilchrist of the Court of Claims, discussing the question of his jurisdiction, and asking for assistance to the Solicitor in representing the interests of the Government.

Laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Sebastian, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a bill authorizing the settlement of the accounts of O. M. Wozencraft, also of the accounts of Charles P. Babcock, Indian Agents.

Mr. Mason introduced a joint resolution for the purchase of the ship Resolute, from the salvors (persons connected with an American whaler,) and that she be restored to the British Government, and that the sum of $40,000 be appropriated for the purpose.

Messrs. Foster, Toucey and Clayton advocated the passage, when it was unanimously adopted.

Mr. Clayton called up his Kansas bill for reference to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. Adams called up his resolution fixing the adjournment of Congress for Monday, 21st July, which was farther laid over.

The hour for the special order having arrived, Mr. Hunter, of Virginia, proceeded to address the Senate on the Massachusetts resolutions.

TUESDAY, June 24.—House.—The Speaker laid before the House two communications from the President of the United States, calling the attention of Congress to certain subjects of legislation.

The bill to establish two additional land districts in the Territory of Minnesota was then read a third time and passed.

Mr. Whitney, of New York, introduced a bill to protect the public property and preserve the peace in the Territory of Kansas, which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

Various reports were then received relating to Territorial business, when the House went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and resumed the consideration of the bill to enable the people of Oregon Territory to form a Constitution and State Government, and for the admission of such State into the Union.

The subject was under discussion when our report closed.

WASHINGTON, June 25.—Senate.—Mr. Wilson presented the petition of the officers of the Massachusetts Emigrant Aid Society, setting forth the objects of that organization, and stating that they had been much misrepresented by the majority report of the Committee on Territories. They say that this society was not the cause of the troubles in Kansas, having never infringed any law, nor interfered with the peaceable execution of the law.

They never invested one dollar in the purchase of any munitions of war; never sent out persons to control the elections in Kansas, nor hired any man, except as a business agent, to go there. They never paid the passage of a single emigrant, nor is it within the knowledge of the company that any person has gone out under their auspices with any other view than settling and staying in the territory.

They also represent that their property has been destroyed by recent outbreaks, and pray that the offenders may be brought to justice, and that compensation may be made for the losses and injuries they have sustained. The petition was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. Johnson took exception to some of the comments of Mr. Seward yesterday, on the conduct of Mr. Rust in assaulting Horace Greeley some time ago.

Mr. Seward indicated the correctness of what he had said according to the facts, so far as they were within his knowledge and recollection. He did not, however, at the time remember the precise ground on which the assault was made.

House.—The House passed the bill authorizing the President to cause to be delivered at the expense of the United States, to the Territories of Utah and New Mexico, such arms as they are entitled to under the existing laws.

The bill establishing two land districts in Kansas was tabled by 26 majority.

NEW ORLEANS:

SATURDAY, JULY 5, 1856.

At Our Risk.—We had rather risk the money through the mail, if registered, than do without it. This is an answer to those holding funds who ask "shall I send it by mail?" Send it—send money, current. The largest bills, the best.

Exchanges.—They are going out regularly. Please let us hear from them. If any agent fails of receiving will he notify us of the Post Offices in the work.

Conference Officers.—Consider the call of Dr Scion—for information, prompt and full. We are witness he has called in vain. The reports, when incomplete, do injustice to the Conferences, and they owe it to themselves to look into the way their officers discharge their duties and change them if need be.

A NORTHERN CONFERENCE MOBBED

A northern Methodist Conference has been broken up in Missouri with mob violence. The telegraph brings the item, under the head of "Kansas Affairs:"

Chicago, June 20.—A mob of border pro-slavery men entered a Methodist Church at Rochester, Missouri, during the sitting of the annual conference, and took the presiding officer and tarred and feathered him—no one interfering to prevent the outrage. The conference had been ordered to leave the State, but had disregarded it.

Even if this dispatch be substantially true, it must refer to a quarterly and not an annual conference. By the published plan of Episcopal visitation, the Missouri Annual Conference is to be held in Hannibal, Mo., October 8th—Bishop Baker. The Arkansas and Texas Conference at Cave Spring, Mo., November 6th.

This is lamentable—but what else can the incendiary aggressors expect? Not satisfied with "the simplicity that is in Christ," instead of propagating the Gospel they have become other propagandists. The debates at their Indianapolis General Conference have given out—as they have boastfully wished them. Southern people have read and considered them. They accept the declarations and the votes, showing the spirit and designs of Northern Methodism. And yet, this intensely anti-slavery and meddling body, sending out their speeches, manifestoes and intentions affecting property, peace and life in the slaveholding States, send on their agents to organize conferences in those States, circulate periodicals and carry out their views generally! The conflict they have gone out of their way to invite cannot be avoided. They may think themselves martyrs, and get what consolation they can out of the thought. But we beg them, however much we respect their conscientiousness and pity their treatment, not to set down their sufferings in this cause, to the account of Christianity.

City Items.—No want of rain. An unusual number of absences. To lake shore, Gulf Coast. To North, to Europe, our citizens have scattered, to spend the income of the past business season! Crowded boats, hot cars, snobbish company, supercilious landlords, thrifty servants, high bills and low fare, fatigue and dust—make pleasure!

Our city fathers appropriated $500, for keeping the Fourth. The First District Board has raised the per annum salaries of public school teachers, on Mr. Reid's resolution:

Superintendent		$2,500
BOYS' HIGH SCHOOL.
Principal	$1,850
Assistant	1,500
French Teacher	700
		4,000
GIRLS' HIGH SCHOOL.
Principal	$1,200
First Assistant	1,050
Second Assistant	1,000
French Teacher	600
		3,850
Five Male Principals, each	$1,320	6,600
Five Male First Assistants	1,000	5,000
Five Female Principals	1,080	5,000
Six Female First Assistants	800	4,800
Ten Female Second Assistants	600	6,000
Twenty-eight Female Third, Fourth and Fifth Assistants	600	16,800

Health continues good. No case of yellow fever. For business, see our commercial column.

Louisiana Penitentiary.—We learn from the Baton Rouge Comet, of the 25th inst., that the work of rebuilding the cotton factory destroyed some time ago, goes bravely on. Already the first story of the building is up, which is to be three stories high, instead of two, as heretofore. The calculation is to have one hundred and fifty cotton looms. There were only sixty before the fire, and they were pretty much used up from service. There are more prisoners there now than at any former period, say three hundred and forty-eight.

Colonel J. Young, of Philadelphia, performed the remarkable feat of rowing a boat from that city to Cape May and back in four days for a wager of $500. The weight of the boat was one hundred pounds.

There is a curious alliteration of the names of the candidates for the Presidency and Vice Presidency. Fillmore and Fillmore, Buchanan and Breckenridge, Fremont and Dayton, form a strange combination of initials.

ANOTHER LOTTERY.

THE SHIFTS OF AVARICE.

The last is by a Baptist Church, for building a meeting house! The Methodist Church was offended against not long since, by a circular sent out from the faculty of a female school, Cuthbert, Ga., proposing to raise an endowment, on a plan with the essential features of a lottery. The names of the Quarterly and Annual Conferences were without authority mentioned therein. Of course, in such documents, the church, both local and connexional, is liable to be mentioned. They can only repudiate, and this was done promptly and unequivocally, wherever it was deemed necessary.

Notwithstanding, some of our exchanges were hopelessly scandalized. The South-Western Baptist, (Ala.,) published a long and indignant article, in which, (but how we could not see,) the evil thing was charged upon our Episcopacy! That was the act of individuals—this the formal act of a Church—the only properly constituted church!

We lay such things to their charge only who have done them—but we should like to see the comment of the South-Western or the Louisiana Baptist (which joined in the cry) on this church lottery. If the little Cuthbert, Ga. affair, unofficial and for a school, could be traced to ulterior ecclesiastical principles, whereunto will grow this Marion, Va., affair, grave, formal, official; recorded upon church book; done by order of the church, and for building a meeting house!

We copy from the Union, a Baptist paper, (Baltimore, Md.)

A few weeks ago, we published from a Methodist paper, an account (accompanied with an earnest condemnation) of a great "gift enterprise" or Lottery, proposed to be held for the purpose of endowing a Methodist Female College at the South. We regret now to be obliged to record the fact that a Baptist Church in Virginia has fallen under the temptation to pursue a similar course in order to raise money to build a meeting-house. The following resolutions were published recently in the Religious Herald.

At a called meeting of the Baptist Church at Marion, April 29th, 1856, the following preamble and resolutions were adopted:

Whereas, We believe the use of means is perfectly consistent with the purpose of God, and whereas the laudable object of erecting a house of worship for the use of the Baptist denomination is clearly set forth in the proposed gift enterprise, therefore

Resolved, 1. That we approve of the scheme as one calculated to secure money, without defrauding or deceiving any one who may purchase tickets; each ticket-holder being entitled to at least one of the gifts, and each one having equal chances.

Resolved 2. That in order to secure this equality and the object sought, we, as a church, for whose benefit the project has been originated, demand of the committee to have placed in their possession all the gifts proposed for distribution; and that they require the general agent and all subordinate agents to make to them monthly reports of their success in the sale of tickets, and to pay over to them or their Treasurer, monthly, regularly and promptly, such a per cent. on the money obtained as will secure the object sought.

Resolved 3. That in order to give satisfaction, and render successful this enterprise, the committee are hereby requested to have their Treasurer to give them bond and security for the safe keeping of all money deposited in his hands; and that they give us, as a church, the following pledge: "We, the Committee, acting in behalf of the Baptist Church in Marion, will guarantee that the distribution of the gifts shall be conducted in such manner as to give every one purchasing a ticket an equal chance according to the number of tickets purchased, and that we will require monthly reports and punctual payments from the agents until a sufficiency of money is obtained to erect the house.

WM. C. PARKS,
J. H. FRANCES,
DR. R. W. JONES,
E. W. SHEFFY,
J. H. GILMORE, } Com.

4. Resolved, further, That we, as a church, would respectfully recommend our esteemed brother, A. H. Campbell, the General Agent in the sale of tickets, to the favor and confidence of all those who may be disposed to favor this benevolent enterprise.

Resolved 5. That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to the Baptist Watchman, the Religious Herald and the Abingdon Virginian for publication, and that they also be recorded upon our church book.

Done by order of the church.

WM. HUFF, Moderator.

Wm. P. Durgan, Ch. Clerk.

The difference between the price of tickets and the gifts, (to one of which at least, each ticket holder is entitled,) is to build the meeting house! Of course, the Union condemns the scheme, as will the sound and intelligent portion of the church everywhere.

A word on the general habit if not principle. Why not throttle old avarice or whatever else stands in the way of cheerful giving—throttle and kill him by honest and direct blows? These shifts are miserable. Is the pill of doing good so bitter that it must be sugar-coated or disguised, that one may take it without knowing it?

We have actually known people go to more outlay of money and money's worth, to say nothing of pains-taking, to get up a fair for roofing a shed or furnishing a parsonage, or paying a church debt, than would have footed the bill by a plain subscription. Where human nature has to be coaxed along so and led blindfold to storming the redoubts of selfishness, grace has much work yet to do.

The salaries paid to the Government officials in Canada are enormous. The Governor gets $31,000, his house rent and servant hire. The ten ministers get each $6,000, $8 a day during the session of Parliament, and "immense patronage." The engineer of the Grand Trunk Railway has a salary of $13,000. Sir Cusac Baney, agent for that work, gets the same. Chief Justice Robinson has $6,666 per annum, $500 for travelling expenses, and a pension of $4,444 whenever he shall see fit to resign. The Register of Hamilton, Dundas and Wentworth, (he is minister also), gets $6,500. The Register of Toronto and York gets $12,000. The Governor has a Secretary to whom the Canadians pay $3,000 annually for the privilege of quill driving.

Two individuals, named Carl Bleder and Henry Egger, have been arrested at Chicago, on a charge of obstructing the track of the Michigan and Southern Railroad for the purpose of destroying the Toledo Express train.

The obstructions were three cross-ties which had been fastened across the track near Aldsworth, on the 18th inst. They were discovered in time and the train saved.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Forkland Circuit, Ala. Con. June 21, 1856.

It is truly encouraging to see the church in a prosperous condition. Don't suppose that we are now going to give you an account of a revival. This we hope to give you ere this year shall close. We have but two appointments, Forkland and Old Pine Grove.

At Forkland we have a good church, that is, a large house and comfortable enough, and a large membership, some who love our class-meetings, and we are much encouraged by the congregation who here assemble to hear the word of God. Our second quarterly meeting was held, and though early in April we took up our Conference collection and raised $135, considerable over our assessment.

Pine Grove has been a church for several years, and it was a respectable house, but in these days of new buildings it has become quite ancient looking, the community felt that they must have a house of worship more becoming.—Brother John Watson, a quiet unassuming man who has reached near four score years, proposed to build a church at his own expense. The church is now completed. It is one of the neatest churches that I ever saw in the country. The altar and part of the isles are carpeted, and a neat clock tells the time of day as in the city.

Last Saturday and Sunday our third quarterly meeting was held at the new church, which we now call Watson Chapel.

On Sabbath E. Wadsworth, D. D. dedicated this new church. He preached from "God is a spirit, and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and truth." The Doctor expounded the word of God to a large and attentive assembly, all were pleased, and many profited under this excellent gospel sermon. In the afternoon, Bro. Ramsey preached us an earnest sermon, and in conclusion we took up a missionary collection. We raised two hundred and ten dollars.

You will say well done, Watson chapel; may it ever be a missionary church, and may God bless him who at a cost of more than two thousand dollars built it. This is not all, by the close of this year we will have a parsonage bought and paid for.

Now in view of the above would you be surprised if before this year closes, God will pour out his spirit on this people.

W. I. POWERS.

Homer, La., June 20, 1856.

Dear Advocate:—A few days ago the farmers were almost in despair on account of the continued dry weather, the corn was twisting, the cotton was drooping, and every thing in the vegetable kingdom evinced a strong desire for rain. Well, yesterday week a storm came up and down poured the rain.—Last Thursday, too, it rained generally throughout the country; and from the way it pours down now, one would suppose that a little deluge was about to happen. If we could be sure of the latter rain we would have no doubt of a good crop.

I have noticed one thing during the last and present spring; the christians have been made to sensibly feel their dependence upon Providence, and even sinners have suggested that the christians pray for rain. Why is it that interest will bring men to God when all the displays of His love fail to impress them? Alas, alas for man!

Our little town of classic name is certainly one of the most delightful summer retreats to be found in the sunny South. I have summered at Bay St. Louis, Biloxi, and all the watering places on Lake Pontchartrain, but with the exception of the sea-bathing, they don't begin to compare with Homer. This town is laid out with considerable taste and skill; and there are many handsome dwellings in it. It contains about twelve hundred inhabitants and is growing larger every year. Many a noble forest oak has escaped the ruthless blows of the pioneer's axe, and in its old age repays its friends by spreading out its giant arms under which in coolest shade may repose the grateful citizen. Our well and spring water is not excelled by that of any other place. Here mellifluously bland breezes laden with the sweets of the orient, come wafted over a thousand hills to regale the senses and cool the fevered brow; and oh! how exquisitely delightful are the melodious concerts of the woodland choristers. Long before old Phœbus arises from his night's repose, they begin their songs of praise to the beneficent author of spring; they have no note-books, have never attended singing schools, or been wearied by the instructions of the music-teacher, but how superlatively excellent is the music they make! Oh! I love the country, with its hills and valleys, its murmuring brooks and waving forests; I love too, to pluck the luscious fruit that hangs in rich clusters upon the burdened trees; I love to wander amid the lofty pines and listen to the songs of the feathered tribe, or recline at the foot of some kind old oak and permit thought to soar above the delights of an earthly spring to that place where I too will be able to hymn the praise of the Deity. Ah, I pity you dear Advocate, when I contrast my country enjoyments with your city pleasures, such as snuffing the sweets of those dirty gutters, swallowing that dust and walking those flinty pavements. You may have all your elegancies, your ice-creams, etc., but give me the wild wood to range in and the plain farmer for my companion. But thanks to Him who loves us all, an eternal spring will soon burst upon the weary christian, a spring that is followed by no parching summer or freezing winter; a spring whose delights will continue while God exists.

I wish I could speak as cheerfully of "Homer College" enterprise; but truth restrains me from so doing. I saw a communication a short time since from "F. T. R," he gave you a correct account of the state of affairs then, but alas a great deal of the interest has died away. The "building committee" are afraid to risk the consequences of going on, unless the subscribers will pay in advance. I have but little hope of its success now, but you know it's said "the darkest hour is just before," and I sincerely wish it may prove true in regard to the college.

We have a fine melodion in our church here. There is some opposition to it; what do you think about it?—Many of us would like to know your sentiments upon the subject. At our second quarterly meeting we licensed a young man of fair abilities to preach. He will most likely enter the itineracy next year. We have a Tract Society here and are distributing tracts about the country. Sunday-Schools are not very prosperous.

SILVICOLA.

Georgetown Circuit, Miss. Con. June 1856.

This circuit is situated in the eastern part of Copiah county and has nine preaching places. The soil especially for a "piney woods" country is good, and when the seasons are propitious produces well. The New Orleans and Jackson Railroad runs through the western part of the circuit, and when that is completed no doubt a very great change for the better will be brought about. This is a very healthy region and no doubt will be sought as a pleasant summer retreat from the city and swamps. There are several mineral springs and wells which will soon come into notice and attract visitors. "Olivers well" by a chemist in your city has been recently proved to surpass the celebrated waters of "Cooper's well" three to one. Brown's well already has considerable notoriety.

There has been for some months a manifest improvement in the spiritual state of my charge in at least part of the societies. Class meetings which had been neglected have been revived, the members have been quickened and at some of their weekly meetings they have been abundantly blessed. One of the teachers told me a few days since that all the members nearly of his society attended class regularly whereas two or three months before from three to six were all that could be got to attend. Our second quarterly meeting embracing the second Sabbath in April was truly a refreshing season. Bro. Jones my Presiding Elder seemed like the eagle to have recovered his youth. He preached in demonstration of the Spirit; the power of God attended his words. The church was revived—one joined.

Our third quarterly meeting June 14 and 15 was a very interesting meeting. During the first prayer in the lovefeast on last Sabbath one professed sanctification. He rejoiced with joy unspeakable and full of glory. At the close of the lovefeast, I called upon all present who felt the importance of full salvation to covenant solemnly before God to seek that blessing till they obtained it. Thirty or more at once consented. May they soon realize that the "blood of Christ cleanseth from all sin." Brother Jones informs me that there is considerable interest on this subject throughout his district. He preached on the subject—he preaches what he has experienced and lived for years. It tells upon the church. God grant that all our Elders and traveling ministers may be sanctified and thus be prepared to preach effectually what they have "felt and seen." Sabbath evening we had two very clear conversions, and at night a poor backslider was powerfully reclaimed. I thank God and take courage.

L. ERCANBRACK.

The Natchez Free Trader, of the 24th inst., says that, "from the best information we can get, we are led to believe the crop to be equal to any former year—the corn crop exceeding any previous year. We are, however, informed that on some plantations in the lower end of this county, and on the Acklin place in Wilkinson county, a worm is attacking the cotton. Some call it the grass worm. It would be well to examine it closely, for we have heard surmises that it might be the army worm. For the last ten days we have had an over-abundance of wet weather, which is forcing cotton too much, and causing the grass to grow rapidly.

Hon. A. E. Maxwell, of Florida, is to deliver an oration on the life and character of Gen. Jackson, before the Democratic Association in Washington, on the 4th July.

The steamer Aguilla, from Pittsburg, passed into the Mississippi from Lake Michigan, at Green Bay, on the 23d ult. The people of that town had a celebration in honor of the event.

The Canadian steamer Anglo Saxon, from Liverpool for Quebec, put into Greenock, Scotland, on the 11th June, with her machinery disabled. She left again in a few days and proceeded on her voyage.

CORRESPONDENCE UP THE RIVER.

St. Louis—Gas vs. Moonlight—Eighth Street Methodist Church—Dr. Parsons—Methodism—The Summer Work—The City, its purity, its buildings, its people—A Ride.

The view of St. Louis as you approach it from the river below is said to be very fine. Unfortunately for me we reached the city in the night, and saw what could be seen by the light of a very new moon. This light was just enough to warrant the absence of gas light, and so we saw less than we should have seen had there been no moon. Large cities, I suppose, are the only places where under given circumstances moon-light is a misfortune, since in them alone, public safety and convenience depend upon well lighted streets. By twelve o'clock Saturday night we are in bed at Barnum's, called the best hotel here, and good enough.

Sunday morning finds us in the Eighth street Methodist Church, the first, the large and fine church of the city. Here Dr. Parsons discoursed to us for the space of an hour, on an excellent text, 1st Corinthians, 1–18. Neither myself nor his congregation had that privilege at night. The Doctor's sermon was moistened with the sincere milk of the word, and to me it was vastly pleasant and profitable to be one of his hearers. This church is in every way a good one, built I believe in the Norman style. The windows have stained glass, the seats are circular and cushioned. It has a gallery across the end for the choir, and none at the sides. The choir at this time is small but select, with some good voices in it, and they sung delightfully. The congregation did not sing, not even as much as a certain other congregation, and some one observed that an organ would be a decided improvement. The objection which lies against organs is equally against choirs of the character this was, and we were tempted to assent to observer's view of the subject. It is, besides, a pewed church. Nearly, if not all the seats are rented. I did not hear this spoken against, and the congregation seems well satisfied with the arrangement. The church is spacious, easily filled by the voice, and very neat, almost splendid in its interior finish.

Within a stone's throw of this church is the Ebenezer Chapel of the Methodist Church, North. The building is brick, and respectable in size and architecture. This is the only building of the sort, and the only congregation of our Northern brethren. Its prosperity is considerable. The sight of it reminded me of the poet's line,

"'Tis the last rose of summer left blooming alone."

I was surprised to learn that the German work here is entirely in the hands of the Northern Church, and an important work it is. They have five flourishing German congregations and three or four excellent brick chapels. These constitute a district over whom a German Presiding Elder is appointed. Our church has absolutely no German work here—not a chapel, not a congregation. Next to New Orleans this is the widest field. It does not look quite right that a field so essentially our own should be given up to the powers over the border—but the want of men, it is said, precludes any present effort. That the work among negroes was in other hands surprised me. Our church has but one chapel for colored people in St. Louis, and the congregation is not very prosperous. For the rest this interest is divided between the Baptists and the African Methodist Episcopal Church. Southern Methodism, notwithstanding, is evidently strong and strengthening. There are five well established congregations, with good church edifices, besides three or four younger charges. What we have desired for New Orleans they have in operation here, a city mission. The missionary is a missionary, so called and so paid. He works in the suburbs, in the streets, everywhere. He preaches here and there, organizes Sunday Schools, and makes and fills appointments where there are none. This leads to substantial enlargement of the church, and accomplishes what would else remain undone. The preachers have a regular organization, the style is forgotten, but they call it "the preachers' meeting." Monday morning, at ten o'clock, I availed myself of leisure to be present at the regular weekly meeting, Dr. Parsons in the chair. Each one in order is called on to report the condition of their charge and the labors of the Sunday just past. The Secretary takes down the reports and they are entered on the minutes and become permanent, reliable records. In a historical view such a society is of value for the records which it will furnish. From the minutes of the previous meeting, and from the reports of the present, a visitor obtains a tolerably full and satisfactory knowledge of our church operations. This is rather better than the informal gatherings of the Advocate office.

St. Louis is a city of churches. A bird's eye view of its steeples and spires suggests that the place is piously inclined, and for a large city it is probably as much so as any Western city of equal extent. There are many well-built rows and blocks, and but few very remarkable structures. We saw none of particular note. The Court-House is unfinished, but when done it will be an immense structure, of more than usual architectural pretensions. The water-works are not unlike those of New Orleans. The new reservoir covers about four square acres and is supplied from the river. Cistern water is rarely used for drinking, and the people draw on the Mississippi for this purpose. The city is undulating, up and down, every way, but always gently. Lime rock seems to be at the bottom of everything, and at the top of some. You would suppose that the streets ought to be clean, but they are not. They are much filthier than those of the Crescent City. Perhaps the authorities need an epidemic to stir them up.

The foreign element, especially the German, is large. We see it in the faces we meet on the streets, and we read it on the hard to pronounce names over shop windows. For all of this great quiet is everywhere, no drunkenness nor brawling. It may be here, but we did not see it. The shape of St. Louis is not crescent, but gibbous, about four miles deep, and running along the river as many as five or six miles.

Let us take a ride and so conclude. We take the river road up stream, and passing the mound, now nearly cut away, are presently in the suburbs. The road is smooth, and rows of trees on either side throw their shade across. We pass farm houses and barns, fields of grain and fields of grass. Some elegant country places are on the left hand. The grounds are most beautiful. Parks in which hills and dales are left in their own inimitable curves and swells, clothed with nature's own brussels, shorn and dressed by the hand of elegant taste, and shaded by trees of God's own planting. Six miles up the river we come to "Belle Fontaine Cemetry." On gravelled roads we ride around and through the resting places of the dead. It is such a spot as one would wish to be buried in, after life's fitful fever; what groves and dells, what secluded places, and what quiet. Perhaps its nothing where we are buried and how, but these marks of taste and affection are embodiments of evangelical truth and sentiment. Hence away we visit Hyde Park, a place of much resort, and something like, though much superior to the Carrollton Gardens. Here we are served with strawberries which grew and ripened on vines a little distance from the sylvan arbor we eat them under. The ice cream under which they groan in the saucer, is cream. And now we skirt the rear of the city, looking at the hills and fields, and the glories of the evening, and the spires and roofs which glitter in the distance. We go home by way of the Water-Works, the Natural Bridge road, by way of plank road with a toll-gate, through Washington Avenue and through this street and that, and are glad the ride is over and our letter is at an end.

THE EFFECT OF IT.

ANTI-TOBACCO SOCIETY.

Some persons were not pleased at the length and prominence of a series of articles a few months ago, against the abuse and the use of tobacco. But, they were written by a calm and clear headed man, in a good spirit—one whose practice corresponds with his precepts. Moreover, they were in sympathy with the views of many, both conscientious and intelligent readers and were, not less for their essential than representative character, entitled to a hearing.

Numerous are the responses, in one way and another. Some suggest the formation of an anti-tobacco society—but there is now to much societary and too little individual action in the reforming world. Several preachers have made confessions and perhaps burned their idols. The last is from a citizen of St. Landry Parish:

"I am an old tobacconizing back-slider. Eight years ago I make a covenant to abstain from tobbacco, five years ago I was over come by temptation and adopted the old habit again. The articles which have appeared in the Advocate upon the use of tobacco I read myself and to others, argued in favor of the positions taken against tobacco, but only for the sake of talking. Yesterday however, (Sunday 13th,) I handed the number to a gentleman not a member of any church, which contained the article referring to ladies, when he remarked that the previously written articles had caused him to become so disgusted with the nasty habit of using tobacco that he had resolved to quit it. This had more effect upon me than all the articles that have appeared. I felt the blood rushing to my face and a glow of shame to think that one who did not profess to be religious was more easily induced to forsake an evil than I was."

So he quit, short off, and turns over to charity what before went to quids and smoke.

Even where reform is not so radically effected by those articles, they have exhibited the impropriety and indecency of certain practices in so strong a light they must be moderated.

On the 22d ultimo, a fire was raging in the woods about three miles from Dennisville, N. J. It had done a great deal of damage, and was sweeping through the woods at an alarming rate. It had not been checked at last accounts.

There were 107 deaths in the city of Baltimore, during the week ending Monday, the 24th inst., being an increase of 16 over the week previous; which was attributable to the oppressive weather that has prevailed.

From our Mission Room.

Resolutions of the Board—Missionary Drafts.

Resolved, That our Treasurers be instructed to accept no draft drawn in favor of the Superintendent of our Missions, or in favor of individual missionaries, until the drafts are matured.

Resolved, That it shall not be lawful for the Superintendent of any Mission, or for any missionary to sell any missionary draft until it comes to maturity.

Reports from the Officers of Conference Missionary Societies.

The following important resolutions we publish now, in due time, and would respectfully call the attention of all concerned to the same:

Resolved, That the bishops be and they are hereby respectfully requested, at each Annual Conference which they may preside, to urge upon the proper officers of the Conference the necessity of forwarding to the Secretary and Treasurer, at Nashville, their Annual Reports, with their debit and credit accounts as provided and called for in the Discipline.

Resolved, That the Treasurers of the Conference Missionary Societies be requested to report in separate columns the amount of missionary money received, the support of the preachers on the missions and the amount received in each.

Treasurer and Assistant Treasurers.

Resolved, That the Treasurer and Assistant Treasurers publish in their next Annual Reports a special report of the amount of missionary money appropriated within the bounds of each Conference with their respective districts—how much to the white, and how much to colored missions.

Resolved, That they be empowered to procure material of this information from the Annual Conference officers within their several districts.

We most earnestly ask each of our Editors to publish all of the above resolutions, and call special attention to the same.

The resolutions in regard to the missionary drafts are very important, and have become necessary. We hope they will be strictly carried out.

Those in reference to the necessary reports of the proper officers of our Conference Missionary Societies we again commend to the notice of all concerned.

In order that the Annual Report of the Secretary and the Treasurer of the Parent Society may be full and perfect, we must have these reports. Time and again have we called for them; yea, we call and call in this matter so much, that we know if we do not ourselves feel weary in so doing, others weary at the call. But to the call again, and once more.

We will send the resolutions to every presiding bishop in each Annual Conference; and we also hope that from each Conference we shall receive proper responses as to the number of missionaries, members, moneys received, paid out, and much to destitute white and colored missions, in each Conference.

Notices of New Books.

Church and Chapel Architecture, by Rev. G. Bowler—J. P. Jewett & Co., Boston, 1856.

What we have long desired to see, a folio in neatest style of printing and colored engravings, containing seventeen plans for churches and chapels, ranging in size from two hundred and fifty to three hundred seats, and in cost from $1,500 to $50,000. The styles are Gothic, Grecian, Norman, Romanesque, Byzantine, with modifications. The church plans are prefaced by useful dissertations on the general subject—as locality, ventilation, arrangement, furniture, etc., and followed by a few plans for parsonages.

The author was once a builder and has evidently studied the subject with taste. He believes, as we, that to start to build, before you know what an expensive folly, ending in an architectural abortion; that good taste, moral effect and economy call for more care in selecting models for houses of worship. Front and side elevations, ground plans and section views are given—but no working specification. We recommend those about to build or improve their meeting houses to consult this work. Though not all they want, it will be cheap at the price.

We have it through J. C. Morgan, near the Office.

The Select Remains of Rev. John Mason, Boston, J. P. Jewett & Co., 1856.

John Mason was of the established Church of England, and died in 1694. In doctrine Calvinistic. Baxter said "he was the glory of the Church of England." His heart was as full as his head. His evangelicalness was swallowed up by his religious life. His sayings are pithy and righteous and earnest. He was an Akempis. This volume will help the rise and progress of religion in the soul. As to the publishing it is a neat specimen, if not the neatest we ever saw of American book-making. Antique letter corresponding with the author's time, strong white paper and binding suitable. We have it through J. C. Morgan.

Educational Essays—by Dr. Thompson—Sowerbrandt & Poe, Cincinnati, 1856.

We have before noticed this volume. It is rich music in American essayism.

Pisgah Views of the Promised Inheritance, by Rev. J. Cross, D. D. 1856.

This is a series of dissertations on the unaccomplished prophecies, delivered in the course of the author's ministry in Charleston, S. C., and dedicated to a distinguished layman of his congregation, G. W. Williams, Esq. The ground is taken that the gospel is yet intended to convert the world. It will make some progress in saving; more in witnessing. In due time Christ's personal coming, the resurrection of the dead and the renovation of living saints and consequent phenomena will set up another dispensation. Probation is at an end. Infidelity, anti-Christ sin are to have a sudden and violent overthrow, and the real kingdom of heaven set up on earth. The theory of a divine coup d'etat, at hand, plants a rebuke on the head of missionary societies with their programmes of world-conversion. It will be gratifying the despairing—a short route to the kingdom—for the author finds a work for them to do. His interpretation and millenarian deductions are relieved by a large quotation of authorities. The style is with the happy views caught, and is elevated to the height of the subject. But the author can forbear what we have observed in all who urge on prophecy not readily accepted. It is a book "They are impatient, and seem to say "You pig by you."

An Honor to the State.—That old radical Wm. Cobbett once observed "that the man who made two blades of grass to grow where but one grew before, was of greater benefit to the world than he who conquered a beleagured city," and we contend that he who by his meritorious invention contributes to the general welfare of society, ought to be held in higher estimation than the leader of an army. We look upon our fellow citizen W. P. Coleman, Esq., of New Orleans, as pre-eminently deserving in this respect. His valuable patent Undulatory Grain and Flouring Mills, have done more to promote the agricultural interest of the South than any other invention known to the public, and every man who wishes a Mill that will excel any one to be found in market, should call on himself of Coleman's invention. They are neat, simple in construction, easily kept in order, and give satisfaction to the purchasers. Those who wish for further information should procure a circular which will be sent gratis to all who address Col. W. P. Coleman, Box C, No. 186, New Orleans, La.

New Jersey is now sending to New York 10,000 to 20,000 baskets strawberries per day.

DEATHS.

Died—At his residence, Prospect Hill, Adams county, Miss., on the 21st May, JOHN HODSON, of disease of the heart. Aged 61 years.

He was born in Durham County England, and emigrated to North Carolina, in 1815; from thence to near Natchez Mississippi in 1821 where he resided until his death. Thus has passed one of his oldest and best citizens. His name stands high and untarnished among business men in all his transactions he was governed by the strictest integrity. In the Methodist church of which he was a member, he was faithful discharging the duties of class leader and steward for many years. "Blessings be scattered on many poor," where no eye saw but God, and many young men thank him for advice and assistance in time of need. A guiding principle of his life was to do good as he had opportunity. For some time before his death, he was aware that his time was short and he endeavored to "set his house in order." His bodily sufferings were great; and when he saw his children weeping, he exclaimed, "my children ought rather to rejoice for I will soon be at rest." P.

Died—In Mobile, May 28th, MARY SHEETS. Aged 47 years. A native of Philadelphia for the last six years a resident of this city.

For thirty four years she was an earnest, zealous follower of Christ, abounding in every good word and work. In her last illness, long protracted consumption, she exhibited a rare patience in complete resignation to God under severe suffering. Her faith filled out in the last struggle. She magnified the grace of God in Christ, announcing when barely able to speak; "all is well, all is well." K.

Died—April 27th, W. H. L. TRAVIS, son of R. P. and E. T. Travis of Greene county, Ala.

He professed religion in is 11th year at Applewhites church, Virginia, and was a constant member till death. In sickness he was troubled with doubts; but when death come he was ready. W. P.

Died—June 17, 1856, in Greene county, Alabama, WILLIAM McALPIN, son of James A. and Elizabeth Watson. Aged about two years.

W. I. P.

Died—At the Calhoun Institute, Macon Miss., May 25th, Miss DALE, daughter of Hugh Dale, Esq., of Kemper county, Miss. She had been raised piously and it was not lost upon her. Although from home and friends when death came she like a wise virgin was ready. She died in great peace.

R. Y. REW.

Wanted—A Situation as Teacher—A gentleman who has had ten year's experience in conducting both male and female schools, and who can furnish all requisite testimonials as to ability and past success, desires a situation, or the superintendence of some institution of learning. A young lady of eminent qualifications, and of considerable experience in teaching both in the North and South, also wishes a situation.

Address immediately "Teacher," Pleasant Hill, DeSoto Parish, La. jun19-5t

☞Cholera having already made its appearance in the South and West, it will be well for all to know that the most reliable preventive is Dr. Hostetter's celebrated Stomach Bitters. These Bitters, taken before meals, as per directions on the bottle, have proven their virtues beyond a doubt. During the sickly season last year here and elsewhere, they were found invaluable, and are represented to have done more for the sufferers, even after being taken with cramps, than any other medicine in the market, hence the necessity of getting a supply in time. For sale by John Wright & Co., 21 and 151 Charter street; O. O. Woodman, cor. Magazine and Common streets. jy5 1t.

☞When Machaon, the Greek Physician was slain, Homer said of him, "a good Physician is worth as much as a whole army." Then a good medicine like AYER'S CATHARTIC PILLS, is worth a great deal more, because it cures as well, works wider and lasts longer. The efficacy of the Physician's labor must be narrow, while such a remedy is available to all—can be had by every body, and is worth having. They are for sale by all our City druggists.

CURIOUS HISTORICAL FACT.—The wife of the celebrated Lord Clarendon, the author of the history of the rebellion, was a Welsh pot-girl, who, being extremely poor in her own country, journeyed to London to better her fortune, and became a servant to a brewer; while she was in this humble capacity, the wife of her master died, and he happening to fix his affections on her she became his wife; himself dying soon after, left her heir to his property, which is said to have amounted to between £20,000 and £30,000. Amongst those who frequented the tap at the brewery was a Mr. Hyde, then a pour barrister, who conceived the project of forming a matrimonial alliance with her. He succeeded, and soon led the brewer's widow to the altar. Mr. Hyde being endowed with great talent, and now at the command of a large fortune, quickly rose in his profession, becoming head of the Chancery bench, and was afterwards the celebrated Hyde, Earl of Clarendon, the eldest daughter, the off-spring of this union, won the heart of James, Duke of York, and was married to him. Charles II. sent immediately for his brother, and having first plied him with some very sharp raillery on the subject, finished by saying "James as you have brewed, so you must drink," and forthwith commanded that the marriage should be legally ratified and promulgated. Upon the death of Charles, James the Second mounted the throne, but a premature death frustrated this enviable consummation in the person of his amiable duchess. Her daughters, however, were Queen Mary, the wife of William III., and Queen Anne, both grandchildren of the ci devant pot-girl from Wales, and wearing in succession the crown of England.

SOME NOSE.—The following incident we had from a friend who knew the party: Deacon Comstock, of Hartford, Ct., is well known as being provided with an enormous handle to his countenance, in the shape of a huge nose, in fact, it is remarkable for its great length. On a late occasion, when taking up a collection in the church to which the Deacon belongs, as he passed through the congregation, every person to whom he presented the bag seemed to be possessed by a sudden and uncontrollable desire to laugh. The Deacon did not know what to make of it. He had often passed round before, but no such effects as these had he ever before witnessed. The secret, however, leaked out. He had been afflicted for a day or two with a sore on his usual appendage, and had placed a small piece of sticking plaster over it. During the morning of the day in question the plaster had dropped off, and the Deacon seeing it, as he supposed, on the floor, picked it up and stuck it on his nose. But alas for men who sometimes make great mistakes, he picked up instead, one of those pieces of paper which the manufacturers of spool cotton paste on the end of every spool, and which read: "Warranted to hold out 200 yards." Then a sign on such a nose was enough to upset the gravity of even a puritan congregation.

Thackeray, on his first visit to this country, was introduced in Charleston, S. C., to Mrs. C——, one of the leaders of society there. Thinking to be witty, he said, "I am happy to meet you, Mrs. C——; I've heard, madam, that you were a first woman." "Oh, Mr. Thackeray," she replied, with one of her most fascinating smiles, "we must not believe all we hear. I had heard, sir, that you were a gentleman." The great English wit admitted, afterward, that he had the worst of it.

The English term "husband" is derived from the "Anglo-Saxon words, hus and band, which signify the "bond of the house;" and it was anciently spelt "housebond," and continued to be spelt thus in some editions of the English Bible after the introduction of printing. A husband, then, is a house-band—the bond of a house—that which engirdles the family into the union of openness of love.

THE SCENES AT SAN FRANCISCO.

The recent events in the city of San Francisco unprecedented as they are in the history of this Republic and of the civilized world—may well challenge the serious consideration of the American people. Mobs and outbreaks have been by no means unfrequent, in times bygone; but they have commonly originated in faction and ended in blood, without conferring any lasting benefit upon any side, and without leaving anything better than a dark stain on the page of history. Far different, however, has it been with the revolution in San Francisco. There was nothing barbarous or mobocratic in that proceeding. There were no zealots to arouse the passions of the multitude—no mad enthusiasts to lead them to wrong and ruin. There was not even a mass meeting—that great characteristic of an American city—to shape the popular idea. The prevailing grievance presented but one aspect to every honest mind. Each man thought and felt for himself; and the result was an aggregation of sentiment and action as overwhelming as it was quiet, dignified and majestic. We are confident that an uprising of this kind was never seen before.

It is unquestionably a solemn act, involving weighty consequences, and hence not to be lightly entered upon, for the people to wrest the reins of government from the hands of the constituted authorities, yet circumstances may so combine as to render such an act proper and necessary—so thought and acted our Revolutionary sires. When the constituted authorities ignore the obligations of the stations they occupy—when, instead of acting as instruments to execute the laws, they shamelessly pervert them, and become agents of oppression and tyranny—then revolution ceases to be a crime, it becomes a duty.

When it happens that the rulers of a State or city are not put in power honestly, according to the requirements of the law, and dishonest office holders so manage the machinery of elections, and grease the engines of fraud, that a fair and full vote of the people cannot be had to displace them, what are the people to do?—The men of San Francisco have answered the question.

Theirs was a plain case, and there was no shirking the issue. They found their voting to be impotent, and themselves governed, indirectly at least, by the criminal horde that composed a part of the community—a tainted gang, such as are always to be found in new countries. The people kept quiet, but they kept thinking. In due time, the effects of such a government declared themselves. Corruption rankled in the town halls—government became a farce, justice a nullity. Criminals that would not dare to show their heads in their native cities, strutted through the streets and picked their teeth on the hotel steps, as if they were the first men in the community—which they doubtless felt themselves to be—and flaunting Cyprians elbowed respectable ladies on the promenades. Still the people kept quiet—but they kept on thinking. Then came another step towards the downfall of society. The era of the bowie-knife and pistol arrived. Let an honest man but show disrespect or natural contempt for a myrmidon of the party in power, and his tenure of life became as frail as a gossamer web. From time to time men were shot down in the public streets. The people waited to see what the law would do; but the law did nothing; and the people kept on thinking. A man was found who dared to tell the plain, unvarnished truth, regardless of assumed respectability. A noble, heroic man was James. King. John P. Casey, a recognized leader on the side of wrong and crime, who had grown rich in his iniquities, shot Mr. King in the public streets. The cup overflowed. At last, the people stopped thinking—the egg of the popular thought hatched, and brought forth a retributive, full-fledged eagle, whose first act was to thunder and dethrone the foul vulture that had preyed upon the community.

What the Vigilance Committee had done up to the date of the last departure from San Francisco, and what they were doing at that time, is already well known to our readers, and needs no recapitulation at our hands. There are several things we may touch upon, however.

The Governor of the State had officially declared San Francisco to be in a state of insurrection, and had called upon the militia of the State to put the insurrection down. Under his oath of office, he could do no less—but he doubtless knew what value would be attached to his proclamation. Several of the military companies at once disbanded and joined the Committee. In view of this, it was said that the United States forces would be called upon to interfere, and it was feared there would be serious difficulties.

If the Vigilance Committee were a rampant, soulless mob, outraging innocent people, it would be a different thing, and the troops might be ordered to descend upon them without compunction; but, as the Committee is composed of cool, thinking men, good citizens, who have risen, not to perpetrate outrage, but to protect themselves from outrage, no American force could be brought against them that would not feel impotent in their presence. The bayonets and cannon with which the Committee have armed themselves, would render them invincible against five times their number; but the armor of moral right in which they are panoplied will prove a safer shield than all their arms.

At the last accounts, the Committee were completely in power; but they had addressed a respectful petition to the Legislature, asking the enactment of laws to prevent a recurrence of such frauds and outrages, the perpetration of which had induced them to assume their present position. We have little doubt but that the next, or succeeding arrival, will advise us of a compromise between the Committee and the State authorities, and that, in proper time, the Committee will disband and retire into privacy with the quiet dignity that characterized their coming forth.

NICARAGUAN CORRESPONDENCE.

SAN JUAN DEL SUR, June 1, 1856.

Messrs. Editors—The stirring scenes of war and battle, in this region, are for the present closed, and the army is going into quarters for the winter (rainy) season, being divided between Penaln City, (San Juan Sur,) Virgin Bay, Leon and Granada. The General-in-Chief will make his headquarters at Granada for the present, Brig. Gen. D. B. Fry, Governor. Gen. C. C. Hornsby remains as Governor of Rivas and Gon aeasic departments, having his headquarters at Pineda, and will have command of the first Infantry Battalion and one company of the First Rifles.

In a former letter to you, I remarked that the Costa Rican Government had asked for terms of peace, but this was an error, as I have been assured that not the slightest communication has passed between the Government of this State and Costa Rica, and of course matters remain as they were immediately after the enemy retreated; and we may look for their reappearance any time they get ready to return. Gen. Walker will, however, give them every chance to make reparation for their invasion; but, at the same time, he will continue to strengthen him-self and so organize his forces as to be able, at the opening of the dry season, to pay them back in their own coin, and at the same time have a large force at home to prevent any troubles here, or meet the other States on their borders if they offer any aid to Costa Rica, or in any way give comfort to the renegade Servites from Nicaragua. The General is now firmly convinced that clemency and mercy towards that class of men is the very worst policy he can pursue for his own safety, or the tranquility of the State.

There has been much sickness and many deaths in the army since the middle of May, whilst many of the officers and men have had leave of absence on furlough, and have gone to California or the States to exert their influence as far as they can in recruiting for the service. At this time it would be difficult for the General to muster more than four hundred effective men, and unless there are large reinforcements soon, it will be rapidly cut down to nothing. The principal sickness is cholera, superinduced by a too free use of fruits, topped off with that most infamous of all liquor, aguadiente. I have heretofore remarked that no man could indulge with impunity in the two free use of alcoholic drinks in this country, and every day's experience confirms the truth of this statement. Every one who comes here should lay this fact to heart, and "beware of the tempter." The lighter wines are perhaps innocuous and may be harmless; but brandy, gin, rum and whisky, are perfect foam slayers, especially when used after eating fruit.

The news from the States, per the New York steamer that came out on the 10th, has given immense confidence to all parties here, soldiers as well as citizens. Scrip is already sought after by parties who have a little ready cash, and if there was enough money in the State to buy five millions of the State bonds, that amount would be taken up by the citizens of this State alone. We need only to hear that Padre Vijil has finally been received by the United States Government to create the wildest enthusiasm. Soldiers who have heretofore talked of giving up all claims upon the Government are now satisfied to remain contented with the service, and satisfied that before long they will receive every dollar due them from this Government.

A few days since we were all thrown into excitement by news from the North that San Salvador and Guatemala had at last plucked up courage enough to dispose our commissioners and had dispatched the united army towards our frontier. But hardly had this news been thoroughly digested ere we were informed that in Salvador a new President (Santos Mora) had been elected, and instantly on being qualified, had sent a courier in hot haste to countermarch the Salvador army and order home all the new levies, raised by his predecessor for the invasion of Nicaragua.

The coward brute, Carrera, of Guatemala, on being deserted by his ally, also countermanded the order to advance upon Leon, and thus matters remain at this writing. What are the real facts in this affair I am unable just now to say, but as Generl Walker has left Granada for Leon, and has taken with him the 1st Rifle Battalion, all newly clothed in the prescribed uniform of this State, and also ammunition for a short campaign, it looks as if there was a prospect of a brush in that direction before long. San Salvador will never enter the field against us if her people know themselves. They are Democratic to the back bone, and only bombuggery and imposition can lead them into a fight against Walker and the Nicaraguenses, but there is no telling what may be done with them by such fellows as Cabanas and the Costa Rica emissaries now in that State, all endeavoring to stir them up to a war fever with us, although there is no earthly cause for such a calamity to befal either State. But Carrera, brutal, bloody, cruel and ignorant beast as he is, well knows that the days of his power are few, unless he can, by some possible combination with the other States crush Walker and the Americans; and he knows, also, that he alone stands no chance in the field single-handed against this State. The same may be said of Guardiola, of Honduras, but he is wiser and more politic, and sooner than leap into a war with this State by himself he would abandon Servilesism and join his forlunes to the Democrats. Costa Rica is utterly humbled and unable now to coax or drive a force of fifty men again towards Nicaragua. We are told by passengers recently from San Juan, that on the return of the army to that city, the soldiers affirmed that God had taken part against them and in favor of Walker, and each avowed his purpose to never again fight against him. Still the aristocratic politicians of that State would be glad to accomplish indirectly what they failed to perform themselves when at the head of a respectable army and occupying our towns and cities, that we may for a long time be disturbed by the factious opposition of Governors and cabinets and quasi declarations of war against us by the other States. Guatemala, especially, is rolling up a long account for settlement when the proper time shall arrive, and, in my humble opinion, that time is not very remote.

The true Democratic element in all these States is in a ferment, like a volcano giving out incipient indications of an eruption and when the general struggle shall commence, Gen. Walker will act in a manner worthy of his genius and the high mission to which he has been called by the voice of the people. Peace reigns in all departments of Nicaragua once more, and the people are rapidly returning to their occupations and homes, each and all firmly trusting in the strong protecting arm of the General-in-Chief. This war has fixed Walker more firmly than ever in the affections of this people, and they seem to be indelibly impressed with the idea that he is the especial favorite of the Supreme Power, and will ultimately conquer and humble all his enemies.

In this department (Rivas) there are many estates very valuable, subject to confiscation, and the State has already seized them to satisfy its claims upon the traitors who formerly owned them. These estates are many of them, of vast extent and may be purchased at very low rates, together with their thousands of horses, mules and cattle. Now is an excellent opportunity for those who have a little capital to invest in that kind of property to come to this State. In fact, property of every kind can be bought very cheap now, but six months hence the reverse will be the case. Should war result with Guatemala or Honduras, as is more than likely, the territory of those States will be made the theater of its operations, and their wealth be made to pay the expenses of the army. If they desire war so much, let them pay for the pleasure it may afford them, as Costa Rica will yet be made to do. My opinion, therefore, is that Nicaragua will be exempt in future from the presence of an enemy, and emigrants (families) may come on at once without any fear of being disturbed by the foe. The American element grows stronger daily, and at this time there are hundreds of Americans and others here watching for opportunities to go into business of one kind or another, and all seem determined now to fix their future homes in this country.

JUNE 4. A small coaster under Spanish colors has just come into port from San Salvador, and reports that the people of that State were all in a ferment about the war which their Government had been foolish enough to declare against this State. The common people, having heard of Walker's success in the recent campaign here and the ill luck of Costa Rica, were all shouting "Vive el General Walker," so much so, that the new President had ordered back the army, and evoked the agreement of the State to ally with Guatemala in a crusade upon us. We learn also that Carrera had found it impossible to suppress the cries of "Vive el Walker," even among his regular army, and that the impressed recruits deserted and fled to the mountains at every possible chance. If this be so, and it comes from good authority, there may be battles and revolutions to chronicle in Guatemala ere long; and our "grey-eyed man" may have a part in the embroglio. We are looking for the America from San Francisco every hour.

JUNE 5. We heard yesterday through a courier from Virgin Bay, that the Louisiana steamer had arrived at Del Norte, bringing the glad tidings of the reception of Padre Vijil. Immediately the cannon in garrison thundered forth the joyful news. At night a torchlight procession was gotten up, speeches made, cognac drank plentifully, and a general illumination of houses and huts took place, the natives joining in the general demonstration with much more gusto generally than the Americans. And thus we stand. But I must close this already too long scrawl.

Yours, LAFAYETTE.

SUMMER.—Monday was the last day of June; and it is more than likely that we have passed the hottest part of the season. Of course there is abundance of hot weather during July and August, but the heat is in general more pleasantly tempered with seaward breezes than the heat of June; nor sweltering depending rather upon the absence of the breezes than the vertical sunshine.

The summer begins appears to be about at its end. The hotels and other public places are more or less depopulated, and nothing in the ways of out-door excitement is offered to the 'shay-at-homes forther than such as they may obtain by railroad riding and fishing and bathing in the lake. The schools have commenced vacation, and teachers and pupils are making the most of their time, according to their predilections or capabilities. Commercially speaking, the city is settling down by degrees for its annual nap.

But there are some pleasures left to the stay-at-homes, and no very insignificant ones either. We allude to the pleasures of the social and home circles—which are never so unalloyed as when business has ceased its rush and gaiety its flutter, and nothing is left to disturb the general harmony. Young men club together impromptu, and entertain themselves and their friends, and plan parties of sport and pleasure, in which the young ladies take an active interest when propriety permits; husband and father stay at home and play with the children more, and read and nap a little more than at other seasons; the good wives and mothers look more cozy on the galleries and more comfortable on the promenades; and when a rosy sunset winds up a sultry day, the broad promenades and the public squares become gushing fountains and streams of human gladness. A charm thus gradually spreads over the community, and to a great many, imparts a sort of family feeling that is very delicious to experience.

Magnetic Telegraph.

FOUR DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

BY THE NORTH AMERICAN AT QUEBEC.

NEW YORK, June 30.—The Montreal Ocean Steamship Company's steamer North American arrived at Quebec this evening, bringing advices from Liverpool to the afternoon of the 18th.

Commercial Intelligence.

On Monday the market was active, and advanced ¼d., with sales of 12,000 bales, of which 5,000 were taken on speculation. On Tuesday the market receded from its previous advance and closed at Friday's quotations, (per Asia—Rep.) with sales of 5,000.

Breadstuffs.

Breadstuffs are generally higher. Our circulars quote Flour, Wheat and Corn as "a trifle higher." Corn has advanced 1s. Western Canal Flour is quoted at 35s; Philadelphia, 36s. Red Wheat 11s 3d.

Manchester advices are favorable.

Political News.

The political news by the North American is important, inasmuch as it presages a speedy settlement of our difficulties with England.

It is now conceded that Mr. Dallas will not be dismissed, and that all difficulties will probably soon be amicably adjusted.

Lord Clarendon stated, in reply to a motion of Lord Derby, in the House of Lords, that it was not the intention of this Government to advise the Queen to suspend diplomatic relations with the United States.

This announcement was loudly cheered.

Lord Derby expressed his satisfaction, but said he regarded the course of the Government as an acknowledgment of error and humiliation.

Clarendon appealed to the House to not join Derby in pressing the question, and the subject then dropped.

In consequence of this phase of affairs, funds rose; and consols for money are quoted at 91¼ to 91¾.

Kansas Affairs.

CHICAGO, June 30.—Advices from Kansas state that the Chicago Company was disarmed at Lexington by from 300 to 500 Missourians and Carolinians, who threatened to fire the town if their demands were not complied with.

The Chicago Company returned to St. Louis guarded by a party of Carolinians.

CHICAGO, July 1.—A company of forty-four men from Worcester, Mass., en route for Kansas, were disarmed at Waverly, Missouri, by two hundred Southerners, who announced their intention of detaining them as prisoners.

It is reported that a company from Ottawa, Illinois, was treated in the same manner.

The people of the towns on the Missouri river are determined that no more emigrants from the Northern States shall be allowed to go to Kansas.

Steamboat Fire at Bayon Sarn.

BAYOU SARA, July 1.—A destructive fire broke out here about 2 o'clock this morning, among our fleet of trading boats lying at the levee. The fire originated on the boat belonging to Messrs. Whiteman & Hatch, and rapidly spread to that of Messrs. Leet & Irvine. Both boats, with their valuable cargoes of groceries, were entirely consumed. The books and papers, however, were saved. The loss is estimated at about $6,000, on which there is no insurance.

The fire is supposed to have been the result of accident.

Later from Texas.

By the arrival of the Charles Morgan, from Galveston and Indianola, on Saturday morning, we have received Galveston papers to the 26th inst.

The Galveston News learns from Mr. H. F. Marsh, engineer of the Mexican Gulf and Henderson Railroad, who has recently been engaged in making some preliminary surveys in the neighborhood of Bolivar Point, that the road will be built with the utmost dispatch, and twenty-five miles will certainly be completed before the 1st of February next.

From the Western part of the State the papers are filled with complaints of the drought, and all unite in saying, that unless they have rain soon, the crops in that section will be a total failure.

The drought has prevailed to an alarming extent in other parts of the State. In the north-east and eastern counties no rain had fallen for forty days.

From the Galveston Civilian of the 24th we quote the following further account of the Orange county disturbances:

We learn from Capt. Calmel, of the sloop Maggie Jane, that last Saturday, the people of Orange county proceeded to the house of Joe Brenham, and killed Neil Glover, late Sheriff, and Jack Moore, who had been warned to leave the county, and refused. At the house of Brenham, were found the implements of the counterfeiters, and a quantity of counterfeit money. This place is believed to have been the headquarters of the counterfeiters.

The Regulators then gave Col. Sapp and his son one hour's notice to leave the county.

Ashworth, who killed Deputy is reported to have fled to Louisiana.

The San Antonio Texan, of the 19th, says it expects to hear exciting news from the frontier, as the Indians are down on another plundering excursion.

Dr. Dickson, formerly Lieutenant Governor has been elected Representative in the State Legislature from Grimes county.

The steamship Perseverance, Henry Shepherd commander, from Indianola and Galveston June 29th, we have the following items:

From the Indianola bulletin of the 27th ult., we learn that a railroad meeting was held at Lavaca on the 17th ult. The meeting was opposed to what is called the State system of building railroads. The following gentlemen were appointed delegates to attend the railroad convention to be held at Austin on the 4th of July next: Messrs. Hughes, Holt, Nash, Smith, Kirkland, Fulton, Fretwell and Rowan.

The same paper adds:

Our town keeps particularly healthy for the time of the year. We have not heard of one case of sickness for the last month. We predict an unusual healthy summer.

Our business transactions appear to be good. We notice a large number of wagons daily to town, and large quantities of goods are being hauled to the interior.

The weather for the past week has been sultry and the winds variable, with occasional showers, but not sufficient yet to fill the cisterns. We learn that the rain in the interior has been general and more abundant.

The Gonzales Inquirer says that the wheat crops of Gonzales county are turning out far better than was expected. The yield will range from fifteen to twenty-five bushels to the acre. It also states that several large droves of cattle have passed through Gonzales going east.

The Waco Statesman says:

Our farmers are suffering severely from a want of rain just now. Some corn in the vicinity of town looks like it would make good whip-crackers already, and, unless we get rain soon, corn crops will be materially injured.

The Galveston Confederate, of the 28th, says:

We learn from Sabine this morning that the citizens of Madison have succeeded in catching, and have hung the Sheriff of the county, Glover, who was one of the ring leaders of the rebellion now in progress.

The City Guard of Galveston held a special meeting on Friday last, and passed a resolution tendering their services to the Governor to aid in quelling the rebellion on the Sabine.

TEXAN WHEAT.—The Northern Standard has accounts from the counties of Hunt, Fannin, Lamar, Collin, Dallas, Grayson and Cook. Some crops in Grayson, planted late on account of the grasshoppers, and some in Collin, are indifferent; but generally the crops are thrifty and the yield large, while the aggregate crop will be larger than ever before raised in Northern Texas. The Standard speaks of the apprehensions of the farmers that they will be unable to dispose of the surplus, and suggests two plans—one is to make flour, sack it, put it upon wagons, and hauling it to the cotton counties below, supply the demand at their doors, at such prices as they can bring up from below and haul from Shreveport. The other is to ship to this city. The Standard says that the product of Northern Texas is the largest, heaviest, finest looking wheat produced in America, which cannot be worth there, this season, more than 75 cents per bushel.

The Methodists have for a long time been accumulating a fund for the construction of a Metropolitan church, of large dimensions and in the most elegant architectural style, in the city of Washington, D. C. Toward this object about $37,000 have already been paid and subscribed in different sections of the country, and some $10,000 are yet needed to complete this projected monumental edifice.

British Filibustering.

The London Telegraph of the 3d exposes the Times' hypocritical horror of filibustering in the following home truths, well put:

The Times indulges in some very fine ideas respecting freebooters and filibusters. Our contemporary affects an air of outraged sensitiveness, which is the more amusing because so unnatural. * * *

It is all nonsense our exhibiting so much sensitiveness about filibustering. England has been the scene of grand filibustering from the period when our Norman conqueror first filibustered upon these shores, and parceled out amongst his followers the fair lands of the ancient Briton. We filibustered in Ireland; we filibustered in Scotland; and, in short, Great Britain is Great Britain from the successful acts of her renowned filibusters.

What have we to say about India? How can we point to the mote in our brother's eye when such an ugly beam disfigures our own organ of vision? It is only a few months since when, because the King of Oude did not do as we pleased, that we filibustered upon his country, dethroned that monarch, seized upon his revenues, and declared, "with no claim or pretext that we are aware of, merely relying on the power of the sword and the superiority of might to right," that Oude should be annexed to the possessions of the British crown. If we did not filibuster in Oude, then there is no meaning in the word. What have we to say of our most shameful attack upon and occupation of the Burmese territory. A more barefaced act of filibustering was never enacted. What is the knightly Rajah of Sarawak but a filibuster? Then let us not be compelled to fill a column showing that England is the very last nation on the face of the globe which should use as a term of reproach the word filibuster. Once American authority is triumphant in Central America, then civilization and good government will follow. The high road between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans will then be freed of Costa Rican bandits, and protection will be vouchsafed to commerce. Let us rather, then, feel glad that the Anglo-Saxon is marching onwards, and fulfilling the destiny of Providence, which is, that our race shall occupy and govern from Hudson's Bay on the north to Cape Horn on the south.

Central America will become filled with useful, industrious citizens, and the steeple will rear itself where naught now can be seen but the rude stockade of the outlaw and the relentless Indian. The Times says that it is unheard of, the United States recognizing the government of Gen. Walker before his government is firmly established—that such an act is without precedent in history. What nonsense this is! Did not France recognize the thirteen struggling States of the American Union long before we had relinquished our hold upon the young republic? Walker's government is an established one de facto, and the best thing that could have been done was to recognize it as such.

Louisiana Intelligence.

We take the following from the Clinton Democrat of Sturday last:

A young man, the son of Stephen M'Coy, met with a sad accident on the evening of Tuesday last. On his leaving Clinton, driving his father's team, he fell immediately in front of the wagon, the hide wheels of which passed directly over his breast, severely bruising and crushing it. Medical assistance was immediately procured, but it proved of no avail. He lingered until the following evening, dying from the effects of the injuries he had received.

The Pointe Coupee Echo of the 28th ult. says:

The continued dry weather which we are having is doing much injury to the immense crops of corn in this parish, and, unless we have a rain soon, a large quantity of it will be entirely lost. In addition to the drought, we hear the planters in the upper part of the parish complaining of the catterpillars, which have made their appearance and are devouring the young corn, and in some instances the cane. We have heard of one planter who has lost nearly a h

A Mother's Love.

BY THOMAS M'ELLAR.

A mother's love! a mother's love!
The softest tone from heaven
[illegible] truth—
[illegible] out
[illegible] hidden
[illegible] bidden.

A mother's love! a mother's love!
[illegible] breaking,
[illegible] the thankless child
[illegible] whom her heart is breaking,
Unmoved though he be, [illegible]
[illegible]
[illegible]
In love it must be singing.

A mother's love! a mother's love!
Far [illegible] her kindness
[illegible] child'd her heart, and seal'd
[illegible] blindness;
[illegible] voice no more is heard,
[illegible] sorrow-rived,
[illegible] her love, and learns how much
He needs to be forgiven.

My mother's love! my mother's love!
My spirit, lely weeping,
Oft wanders to the quiet spot
Where silently she's sleeping.
The [illegible] words to memory come,
Which I in youth had spoken;
And then I sorrow bitterly
Until my heart is broken.

My mother's love! my mother's love!
Could mercy but restore her,
That I might see her face again,
I'd humbly kneel before her;
I'd tell her I have often pour'd
My tears on sorrow's altar—
I know she would forgive her child!
Her love could never falter.

Onward!

BY L. VIRGINIA FRENCH.

Christ's a path enshrouded valley,
Life its river deep and wide,
Human squadrons crowding, rally
On its swiftly rushing tide;
Wild and wild its wild commotion,
War ships freighted heavily
Down upon the shoreless ocean
Of a dark Eternity.

Sweeping on in long procession
Glide the phantom-frigates by,
Hasting, striving, for possession
Of some bubble as they fly:
Souls which love and peace inherit,
Hearts at war with peace and Heaven,
Idle dreamer, fire-fraught spirit,
Onward by this tide are driven.

Like the rush and roar of battle
Thunder on the booming waves,
Driving fleets that reel and rattle,
Down upon their yawning graves.
Hosts on maddened hosts assailing,
Woe the Spoiler's deadly fang,
Drowning moans of wrong and wailing
With the haughty trumpet's clang.

On, proud soul, amid the thunder's
Win and wear a deathless name—
"Make thy mark;" engrave it under
Great ones on the scroll of Fame!
Onward! o'er that mighty river
Struggle on with spirit brave;
Tho' the rapids rear, forever
Hiding on its loftiest wave!

Onward! still of Good the agent;
Bear her Heavenly abroad,
And in Life's majestic pageant,
Learn to "work the will" of God;
O'er the dark troubled surges,
Battling with the stormy night,
Honored be the arm that urges
On the glorious cause of Right!

Though temptations without number
Throng and bar thy narrow way,
There's an eye that cannot slumber,
There's an arm to be thy stay;
Then be strong while'er betide thee,
All of joy, or all of ill,
Shall not God himself beside thee
Soothe the storm with, "Peace, be still!"

On! to coward hearts appalling
Death's a pale, remorseless king,
But to them an angel calling
To thy realm of triumphing;
Life be thine where Death comes never,
Crowned by immortal Love,
Peace from want or woe forever,
Reigning with thy God above!

A Touching Story of Filial Love.

The following most remarkable and beautiful instance of filial affection appeared in the Herald of Lima (Peru,) to which it was communicated by the Alcalde of Callao;

GENTLEMEN.—There having passed in my office (Justice of the Peace) a scene of great interest and most rare at any time and place, I cannot refrain from communicating the same to you, believing that you will concur with me in the opinion that an act so noble and worthy the best qualities of human nature, deserves to be commemorated by means of the press.

About 8 o'clock this morning, a tumultuous assembly of people invaded my house, bringing in with them a miserable looking man. They inquired for me; on demanding of them the reason of a such a collection, they all began to speak at once, so that I was for a time unable to comprehend what was the true state of the case. Having, however, obtained silence, the old man addressed me:

"Mr. Alcalde, having buried my wife, the mother of four lads, I ordered this one, named Jose to take charge of the other three, who have made choice of their elder brother's profession; two, Antanacio and Dionisio, are both the youngest, although single, supports by his labors as a fisherman. Ever since the boys was taken away from me, I have been living with my elder son, in the interior; but I never failed to receive care and attention from these three. Desirous of coming to Callao, Jose wrote to Julian to order that he should provide for me—which injunction has given offence to Antanacio, who declares that, being the second son, the whole care of my belongs of right to him. I would like to divide myself into four parts, so as to give each of my children a portion of my body, but, as that cannot be, we have come before you, Mr. Alcalde, in order that you should decide which of these young men is to be preferred."

The father had hardly finished speaking when the dispute commenced.

Antanacio, the second son, said that his father, having hitherto living with his elder brothers, it was now to have possession of him by order of right. Dionisio contended that his brother Antanacio could not be with his father because he had a great deal to do, and he could not give his father the attention he required. The fourth son, Julian, represented to me that it properly belonged to him to support his father, as he was the youngest and unmarried man. I knew not what to resolve, my heart was affected by the extraordinary picture presented to me. As I contemplated this scene in silence, the old man, Clemente, said: "My dear children, my heart overflows with satisfaction in witnessing your disputes respecting which of you shall take charge of me. I would gladly give content to you all, but as this is impossible, I propose that I be permitted to reside a while at one, dine with another, sleep in the house of the third, and thus keep changing from day to day, so that if you do not consent to this, let his honor the judge, determine what shall be done with me."

The young men unanimously rejected this proposition, because they said their father would lead an unsettled, anxious life. I then proposed to write the pieces of paper the names of the sons, the decision of chance settle the question. This was done, folded them, and drew out the last of Clemente, which served as a ballot, and the like prevailed, and there was nearly to be seen expressed in the countenance of each of the sons the hopes of being the lucky recipient of the much coveted prize. The old man put his hand into the hat and drew out the name of Antanacio; the second son! My friends, I hardly have words to express to you the new scene which then burst upon me! Antanacio, upon hearing his name called out, broke into praises to the Omnipotent, and embracing him such a hugg. With his hands clasped and raised to heaven, he repeated over and over his thanks, then fell upon his knees before his father, and bathed his sandled feet with

The Play at Venice.

Some years since, a German prince, making a tour of Europe, stopped at Venice for a short period. It was the close of summer, the Adriatic was calm, the nights were lovely, the Venetian women were in the full enjoyment of those delicious spirits that, in their climate, rise and fall with the coming and departure of the finest season of the year. Every day was given by the illustrious stranger to researches among the records of antiquities of this singular city, and every night to parties on the Brenta of the sea. As the morning was nigh, it was the custom to return from the water to sup at some of the palaces of the nobility. In the commencement of his intercourse, all national distinctions were carefully suppressed. But as his intimacy increased, he was forced to see the lurking vanity of the Italian breaking out. One of its most frequent exhibitions was in the little dramas that wound up these stately festivals. The wit was constantly sharpened by some contrast of the Italian and the German; some slight aspersions on Teutonic rudeness, some remark on the history of a people untouched by the elegance of Southern manners. The sarcasm was conveyed with Italian grace, and the offence softened by its humor. It must be obvious that the only retaliation must be humorous.

At length the Prince, on the point of taking leave, invited his entertainers to a farewell supper. He drew the conversation to the infinite superiority of the Italian, and above all the Venetian; acknowledged the darkness in which Germany had been destined to remain so long, and looked forward with infinite sorrow to the comparative opinion of posterity upon the country to which so little of its gratitude must be due. "But, my lord," said he, "we are an emnikes people, and an example like yours cannot be lost, even upon a German. I have been charmed with your dramas, and have contrived a little arrangement to give one of our country, if you will condescend to follow me to the great hall." The company rose and followed him through the splendid suite of Venetian villas to the hall, which was fitted up as a German barn. The aspect of the theater produced first surprise, and next an universal smile. It had no resemblance to the gilded and sculptured saloons of their own sumptuous little theaters. However, it was only so much more Teutonic. The curtain drew up. The surprise rose into loud laughter, even among the Venetians, who have seldom been betrayed into anything beyond a smile, for generations together. The stage was a temporary erection, rude and uneven. The scenes represented a wretched and irregular street, scarcely lighted by a few twinkling lamps, and looking the fit haunt of robbery and assassination. On a narrow view, some of the noble spectators began to think it had a kind of resemblance to an Italian street, and some actually discovered in it one of the leading streets of their own famous city. But the play was on a German story—they were under a German roof. The street was, notwithstanding its ill-omened similitude, German. The street was solitary. At length a traveler, a German, with pistols in a belt round his waist, and apparently exhausted by his journey, came pacing along. He knocked at several doors, but could obtain no admission.

He wrapped himself up in his cloak, sat down on a fragment of a monument, and soliloquized. "Well, here have I come, and this is my reception. All the palaces, no inns; all nobles, and not a man to tell me where I can lie down in comfort or in safety. Well, it cannot be helped. A German does not much care; campaigning has hardened effeminacy among us; hunger and thirst, heat and cold, dangers of war and the roads are not very formidable after what we have had to work through, father to son. Loneliness, however, is not so well, unless a man can labor or read. Read, that's true: come out Zimmerman." He took a volume from his pocket, moved nearer to the decaying lamp, and soon seemed absorbed. Another soon shared the eyes of the spectators. A long, light figure, with a kind of visionary movement, from behind the monument, surveyed the traveler with keen curiosity, listened with apparent astonishment to his words, and in another moment had fixed itself gazing over his shoulder on the volume. The eyes of this singular being wandered rapidly over the page, and when it was turned, they were lifted to heaven with the strongest expression of wonder. The German was weary, his head drooped over his study, and he closed the book. "What," said he, rising and stretching his limbs, "is there no one stirring in this comfortless place? Is it near day? He took out his repeater, touched the pendant, it struck four. His mysterious attendant watched him narrowly; the repeater was traversed over with an eager gaze; but when it struck, delight was mingled with wonder that had till then filled its pale, intelligent countenance.

"Four o'clock," said the German. "In my country half the world would be thinking of going to their day's work by this time. In another hour it will be sunrise. Well, then, I'll do you a service you nations of sleepers, and make you open your eyes." He drew out one of his pistols, and shot it. The attendant form still hovered behind him, and looked curiously upon the pistol, but on its going off, started back in terror, and with a loud cry that made the traveler turn. "Who are you?" was his greeting to this strange intruder. "I will not hurt you," was the answer. "Who cares about that?" was the German's retort, and he pulled out the other pistol. "My friend," said the figure, "even that weapon of thunder and lightning cannot reach me now—but if you would know who I am, let me entreat you to satisfy my curiosity a moment. You seem a man of extraordinary powers." "Well then," said the German in a gentler voice, "if you come as a friend, I shall be glad to give you information, it is the custom of our country to deny nothing to those who will love to learn." The former sighed deeply and mourned, "and you are a Teuton; thet you were just reading in a little case of strange, and yet most interesting figures: was it a manuscript?" "No, it was a printed book?"

"Printed, what is printing? I never heard hint of writing." "It is an art by which one man can give to the world in one day as much as three hundred could give by writing, and in a character of superior clearness, correctness and beauty; one by which books are made universal, and literatnre eternal."

Admirable, glorious art, said the enquirer, who was its illustrious inventor?

"A German."

"But another question. I saw you look at a most curious instrument traced with figures, it sparkled with diamonds, but its greatest wonder was its sound. It gave the hour with miraculous exactness; and the strokes were followed by tones superior to the sweetest music of the day?"

"That was a repeater."

"How, when I had the luxuries of the earth at my command, I had nothing to tell the hour better than the clepsydra and the sun dial. But this must be incomparable from its fuellity of being carried about, from its suitableness to all hours, from its exactness. It must be an admirable guide even to a higher knowledge. All depends upon the exactness of time. It may assist navigation, astronomy. What an invention! whose was it? he must be more than man."

"He was a German!"

"What, still a barbarian? I remember his nation. I once saw an auxillary legion of them marching towards Rome. They were a bold and brave blue eyed troop. The whole city poured out to see those Northern warriors, but we looked on them only as savages. I have one more question, the most interesting of all. I saw you raise your hand with a small truncheon in it; in a moment something rushed out that seemed a portion of the fire of the clouds. Were they thunder and lightning that I saw? Did they come by your command? Was that truncheon a tailsman, and are you a mighty magician? was that truncheon a sceptre commanding the elements? are you a n-god?"

The strange inquirer had drawn back gredually as his feelings rose. Curiosity was now solemn wonder, and he stood gazing upwards in an attitude that mingled awe with devotion. The German felt the sensation of a superior presence growing on himself as he looked on the fixed countenance of this mysterious being. It was in that misty blending of light and darkness, which the moon leaves as it sinks just before morn. There was a single hue of pale gray in the east, that touched its visage with a chill light; the moon, resting broadly on the horizon, was setting behind; the figure seemed as if it was standing in the orb. Its arms were lifted towards heaven, and the light came through its drapery with the mild splendor of a vision. But the German, habituated to the vicissitudes of "perils by flood or field," shook off his brief alarm, and proceeded calmly to explain the source of this miracle. He gave a slight detail of the machinery of the pistol, and alluded to the history of gunpowder. "It must be a mighty instrument in the hands of man, for either good or ill," said the former. How much it must change the nature of war. How much it must influence the fate of nations! By whom was this wondrous secret revealed to the treasures upon earth?"

"A German."

The form seemed suddenly to enlarge, its feeblenoss of voice was gone, its attitude was irresistibly noble. Before it uttered a word, it looked as made to persuade and command. Its outer robe had been flung away; it stood with an antique dress of brilliant white, gathered in many folds, and edged with a deep border of purple; a slight wreath of laurel, dazzling green, was on its brow. It looked like the genius of eloquence. "Stranger," said it, pointing to the Appenines, which were then beginning to be marked by the twilight, "eighteen hundred years have passed into the great flood of eternity since I entered Rome in triumph, and was honored as the leading mind of the great intellectual empire of the world. But I knew nothing of those things. I was a child to you; we were all children to the discoveries of those glorious potencies. But has Italy not been still mistress of the mind? She was then first of the first, has she not kept her superiority? Show me her noble inventions. I must soon sink from the earth—let me learn still to love my country."

The listener started back: "Who, what are you?"

"I am a spirit. I was Cicero—show me by the love of a patriot, what Italy now sends out to enlighten mankind."

The German looked embarrassed—but in a moment after he heard the sound of a pipe and tabor. He pointed in silence to the narrow street from which the interruption came. A ragged figure tottered out with a barrel organ at his back, a frame of puppets in his hand, a hurdy-gurdy round his neck, and a string of dancing dogs in his train; Cicero uttered a sigh—"Is this Italy?" The German bowed his head. The showman began his cry—"Rare show, rarer show against the wall! Fine Madama Catarina dance upon de ground! Who come for de galantee show!" The organ struck up, the dogs danced, the Italian capered round them. Cicero raised his broad gaze to heaven. "These the men of my country! these the orators, the poets, the patriots of mankind. What scorn and curse of Providence can have fallen upon them?" As he gazed, tears suddenly suffused his eyes; the first sunbeam struck across the spot where he stood, a purple mist rose around him; and he was gone!

The Venetians, with one accord, started from their seats and rushed out of the hall. The Prince and his suite had previously arranged everything for leaving the city, and they were beyond the Venetian territory by sunrise. Another night in Venice, they would have been on their way to the other world.

A Case where Strychnine Didn't Kill.

A very amusing scene occurred a few days ago in a neighboring city, not a thousand miles from this, wherein a number of the fraternity were prominent actors, about which we have lain bed off a threatened attack of winter fever, and through the same means have lost a number of buttons from our jacket. Our readers are honestly entitled to have the full particulars, and shall have a hearty laugh too. Ha! ha! ha!

The editor—whom for short we shall call Quill—having business to engage him much of the night, wisely provided a nice broil to strengthen the inner man, and having carefully stowed it away for future reference, stepped out for a short time to transact some necessary business. The foreman and typo—whom we call Quad and Rule—soon came in, and chanced to find the steak. What a chance for a joke on Quill! eat the delicious morsel he had prepared, and when too late laugh at him—bright ideas—ah, we have him on the hip! The juicy steak is broiled, and eagerly and hastily devoured, after having given it a fine brown roast. Quill comes in and goes to his labor, suspecting nothing wrong. Quad and Rule could not long retain their mirth at the rich joke they had played: the secret must out. Thanks to the careful, provident Quill, the "steak was fine."

Quill, comprehending at once the whole state of affairs, determined at once to richly pay the boys for their left-handed joke, so instantly assuming the gravity of an owl, and the solicitude of a matronly shanghai, with great earnestness, exclaimed:

"My God, Quad! you haven't eaten that poisoned meat?"

"Y-e-s," responded Quad, whilst his face assumed an ashy paleness, his limbs were seized with a trembling, and his eyes stood an inch from his forehead.

"Great God! then you are poisoned, and in fifteen minutes you are a dead man. Strychnine was put on that meat to kill wolves."

Every person in the office knew that strychnine had been procured that very day to silence some wolves that, with their howlings, made midnight hideous. Each, therefore, rushed forward to the scene of conversation, everything in the shape of business was suspended, and each waited in breathless agony the termination of this tragical scene.

"Poisoned! strychnine!! death!!!" groaned the thoroughly affrighted Quad. "O, my God, save me!" and he looked beseechingly heavenward an instant, then hastily placing both hands on his stomach, he blessed—"Ah, ye gods! I feel the death grip—the poison has taken hold of my vitals! Oh-h-h! save me! what shall I take?"

Quill suggested grease, oil, soap, lard, anything as an antidote. Devil jumped down to the press, and in an instant returned with a large bottle filled with oil, the article used on the press. The limpid stream rapidly flowing towards its level, would have soon emptied the bottle, had it not been arrested by the hand of Rule, whose quick eye measured the remains of fast-disappearing life-saving antidote. The remainder was hastily dispatched, together with all the grease that could be found in the office.

Consternation and fright now reigned in that once happy office, and prayers were said for the sinful souls of the unfortunates. The crisis was fast approaching, when another entered, and was quickly informed of the awful state of affairs, viz: that the young men had taken strychnine.

"To the doctor's! for God's sake, haste!" screamed the new-comer.

This was something new and unthought of in the bustle before. Quad sprung to the door; and was about vanishing, when Rule moaned out—

"Stop a minute, Quad. Wait, I will go. If we die, let's die together like men."

The office of Dr. M. was reached in a moment—the victims examined—said there was little danger if any; the poison would have done its work before. Quad was not satisfied, he only saw death before him—could get no oil. Pale, haggard and trembling in every limb, he rushed out, followed by all the boys in the office. Breaking through two doors into a neighboring establishment, he shouted—

"Oh! grease, lard—quick—strychnine! Oh! I am poisoned! haste or I die! Oh-h-h! The pains of death are severe—a O-o-o-o-l!"

The frightened keeper could only furnish him the little lump grease on hand, and hastily put on the fire a pan of pork. The wretched victim, almost in the agonies of death, his knees, like Belshazzar's smiting together, seized a ladle, and with his breath half cooling the accumulating fat, rapidly drank it as the sweetest morsel. The overburthened stomach could not endure anything; a tenderness and upheaving ensued, and the victim was led back with difficulty to the office, physically prostrated.

Quill was absent—the secret had leaked out—the boys couldn't hold—they tittered and laughed—the thing was out. The victims smelt a mouse, very strongly—their strength and vigor instantly returned. No oil, the press couldn't run without it, none dare mention the name of it. Doctor called next morning—bill was promptly met. Weather was exceedingly cold, yet that house was too hot for Quill for a number of days. The boys won't endure the sight of pork, grease or butter.

On Saturday night, Quad, still pale, was passing down street—a stranger called from behind, asking where was a drug store, wanted strychnine to poison wolves.

With murder in his eye, Quad turned upon him. Stranger took him for a madman, and hastily fled, hotly pursued—hats blew off in the wind; still bare-headed, as for life, each nerved himself—away—away—until lost from sight. We have heard of neither since—meanwhile Quill has returned to the office. Oil has gone up, but strychnine don't sell.

In Capefigue's last work, "Louis XVI, ses relations diplomatiques avec l'Europe, l'Inde, l'Amerique," we find the following passage which is likely to afford some entertainment as well as instruction to our readers:

Before the fall of the Choiseul Ministry agents had been sent to Boston and to Philadelphia for the purpose of observing the dissatisfaction of the colonists already shown in their resistance of the stamp act. In India alliances with Hyder Ali, the father of Tippoo Saib, were leading the way to an insurrection against the immense establishment of the company. The highly agitated condition of the English colonies appeared more serious when the spirit and character of those by whom the standard was raised was taken into view. The two leaders placed at the head of the insurrection, the one to direct military operations, the other to conduct negotiations, were admirably calculated to meet every difficulty. The one, George Washington, raised by acclamation to the rank of commander-in-chief, had already exercised command in war, with that combination of coolness and judgment which, in the decision of a question, always arrives at definite conclusions and perseverance in their accomplishment. Benjamin Franklin, a man of great activity, had raised himself from a very humble condition to a certain degree of elevation by means of real science and education. Franklin united an appearance of modesty with a desire for fame and eclat. His demure looks, together with his calm and deliberate manner, made a great impression upon the multitude; his words, though often very commonplace, were uttered, like those of the Delphic oracle, at long intervals; moreover, he was very shrewd and discerning with regard to the interests of his country and of his own reputation, thoroughly acquainted with France, where all charlatanry is successful. A strong and determined resolution had just been taken by the American insurgents. Victory having crowned the first efforts of the colonists against Gen. Gage and Gen. Howe, the Americans were emboldened, and the provinces, in Congress assembled, had proclaimed the republican principles drawn from the writings of the Abbe Raynel and of Rousseau. Congress was thoroughly imbued with the prevailing spirit of the people. At the very beginning of the insurrection the insurgents, under pretext of advancing commercial interests, had sent to France Mr. Dean, an influential member of Congress; but he not being a person of sufficient reputation or influence, it was resolved to dispatch Franklin on a sort of embassy connected with the Academy of Sciences, in correspondence with all the philosophers of renown. Mr. Franklin could not fail to make a certain impression in Paris. Courted on all sides, became the fashion. His Quaker costume, his linen, which looked so purely white under his drab coat; his forehead, bald and broad, without a wig; his slow and deliberate speech; the retirement to which he condemned himself in the village of Passy, all contributed to his renown. His air of good nature concealed extreme shrewdness. He had understood that in France a man must keep himself continually before the public if he desired to influence public opinion, and this he did not fail to do.

A CHINESE STREET ARTIST.—A man seated on the pevement holds in his hand a white porcelain tile, about a foot square. This he overspreads with a blue color, from a sponge dipped in a thin paste of indigo, and asks us to name a flower. I suggest a lotus. He extends his fore-finger—most remarkable fore-finger, crooked, flexible as an elephant's trunk, and as sharp as if the end had been whittled off—gives three or four quick dashes across the tile, and in ten seconds or less, lo! there is the flower, exquisitely drawn and shaded, its snowy cup hanging in the midst of its long swaying leaves. Three more strokes, and a white bird, with spread wings, hovers over it; two more, and a dog stands beside it. The rapidity and precision of that fore-finger seem almost miraculous. He covers the tile with new layers of color, and flower after flower is dashed out of the blue ground.

Mrs. Pepper got the better of the philosopher the other day, in arguing the question whether women or men talked the most. 'You say a woman can talk a man almost to death,' said Mrs. P., 'but I would like to know if Sampson didn't jaw a thousand Philistines to death.' The philosopher gave in.

Punishing a Prince.

An anecdote is told of her Majesty, which although, perhaps, insignificant in itself, is important as showing the manner in which the royal children are treated when they have committed an error, supposing the anecdote to be true. During her Majesty's residence some years ago at Osborne, in the Isle of Wight, her children were accustomed to ramble along the shore. Now, it so happened on one occasion that the young Prince of Wales met a boy who had been gathering sea-shells. The boy had got a basket full. The young Prince, presuming upon his high position, thought himself privileged to do what he pleased with impunity. So without any malice he upset the boy's basket and shells. The poor lad was very indignent, and observed,

"You do that again, and I'll lick you."

"Put the shells into the basket," said the Prince, "and see if I don't."

The shells were gathered up and put into the basket.

"Now," said the lad, "touch 'em again, old fellow, if you dare," whereupon the Prince again pitched over the shells. And the lad "pitched into him," and gave him such a licking as few princes ever had. His lip was cut open, his nose knocked considerably out of its perpendicular, and his eyes of a color which might have well become the champion of a prize ring. His disfigured face could not long be concealed from the royal mother. She inquired the cause of its disfigurement. The Prince was silent, but at last confessed the truth. The poor boy was ordered before the Queen, doubtless with visions of Jack Ketch and the gallows floating before his eyes. He was asked to tell his story. He did so in a very straightforward manner. At its conclusion, turning to her child, the Queen said:

"You have been rightly served, sir. Had you not been punished sufficiently already, I should have punished you severely. When you commit a like offence I trust you will always receive a similar punishment."—[Eng. paper.

THE PIN AND THE NEEDLE.—A pin and a needle being neighbors in a work basket, and both being idle, began to quarrel; as idle folks are apt to do.

"I should like to know," said the pin, "what you are good for, and how you expect to get through the world without a head?"

"What is the use of your head," replied the needle, rather sharply, "if you have no eye?"

"What is the use of an eye," said the pin, "if there is always something in it?"

"I am always active, and can go through more work than you can," said the needle.

"Yes; but you will not live long."

"Why not?"

"Because you have always a stitch in your side," said the pin.

"You're a poor, crooked creature," said the needle.

"And you are so proud that you can't bend without breaking your back."

"I'll pull your head off if you touch me again."

"I'll pull out your eye if you touch me; remember, your life hangs on a single thread," said the pin.

While they were thus conversing, a little girl entered, and, undertaking to sew, she very soon broke off the needle at the eye. Then she tied the thread around the neck of the pin, and attempted to sew with it, she pulled its head off, and threw it into the dirt by the side of the broken needle.

"Well, here we are," said the needle.

"We have nothing to fight about now," said the pin. "It seems misfortune has brought us to our senses."

"A pity we had not come to them sooner," said the needle.

"How much we resemble human beings, who quarrel about their blessings till they lose them, and never find out that they are brothers till they lie down in the dust together, as we do."

A lieutenant in the service, by the name of Broom, was advanced to a captaincy, and naturally enough liked to hear himself addressed as Capt. Broom. One of his friends persisted in calling him plain Broom, much to his annoyance, and one day having done so for the fortieth time, Broom said:

"You will remember, sir, that I have a handle to my name."

"Ah," said his tormenter, "so you have; well, Broom-handle, how are you?"

ASK THE PHYSICIANS.

ALL medical men admit that intestinal worms cause the death of thousands of children annually, and entail many terrible diseases on those whom they do not summarily destroy. No apology therefore is needed for introducing a preparation like WINCH'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE, which in three days will annihilate and carry off either Tape Worms, Thread Worms, Round Worms or Maw Worms, and at the same time act brace and intensify the digestive powers of the stomach, that a return of the disease is next to impossible.

IMPROVED EAGLE COTTON-GINS.

Warranted to separate the Seeds, Dirt and Trash from the Cotton, without injury to the Staple.

DEPOT NO. 57 ST. CHARLES STREET,
Tauro Buildings, four doors from St. Charles Hotel, New Orleans.

THE Proprietors of the EAGLE COTTON-GIN MANUFACTORY furnish Saw Cotton-Gins of every description, adapted to every variety of cotton, and warranted superior in every respect, viz:

POWER-GINS, of from 25 to 80 or 100 Saws each, for horse, steam or water power—will turn out from two to ten bales per day of clean Cotton, of 400 pounds each.

HAND-GINS, of from 10 to 20 Saws each, so constructed as to be driven by cranks upon the Saw-Cylinder shaft, or at a much greater speed by an extra driving pulley—will clean from 150 to 450 pounds per day.

These Cotton Gins combine all the late improvements in machinery, and are warranted of the best materials and workmanship.

A MEDAL was awarded to the Manufacturers of the Eagle Cotton-Gin by a Jury of the Royal Commissioners connected with the Exhibition of the Works of All Nations, at London, in the year 1851, as will be seen by the subjoined copy of a letter received by them.

Executive Mansion, Washington,
January 31st, 1853.

To the Proprietors Eagle Cotton-Gin Co.

GENTLEMEN: I have the pleasure to inform you that a Jury of the Royal Commissioners connected with the Exhibition of the Works of all Nations, at London, in the year 1851, in consideration of your having exhibited a specimen of a Cotton-Gin has awarded you an Exhibitor's Medal, Certificate, and a Copy of the Reports of the Juries.

These articles are in the possession of Col. Peter Force, of this city, Chairman of the American Executive Committee, and will be forwarded to you by such mode of conveyance as you shall suggest.

Very respectfully, your obedient Servant,
MILLARD FILLMORE,
Chairman of the Central Committee, U. S.
PETER FORCE,
Chairman of the Executive Committee.

A Prize of $1350, and a Gold Medal

Was awarded to the Eagle Cotton-Gin Co., by the Agricultural and Horticultural Society of India, for a Re-Stand for making fine Cotton, as will be noticed by the following copy of a letter dated—

Agricultural and Horticultural Society of India,
Calcutta, September 30, 1853.

GENTLEMEN—I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 14th July, 1851, advising the despatch of a Cotton-Gin to compete for the prize of Rupees, 5000, offered by the Government of India in 1849, through the Agricultural and Horticultural Society of India.

In reply thereto, I have now the honor to enclose two Bank of England Post Bills, being the equivalent of the sum of Rupees, 2500, which has been granted to your machine.

I have further the pleasure to inform you that the Society has been pleased to award you its GOLD MEDAL on the same account, and which will be forwarded you by another opportunity as soon as the inscription has been placed on it.

I am, Gentlemen, yours faithfully,
A. H. BLECHYNDEN,
Secretary A. and H. Society of India.

A medal was also awarded them at the Crystal Palace, New York.

Some of the peculiarities of the Eagle Cotton-Gin are the following:

The "Detached Grates," EXCLUSIVELY used by us and PATENTED, are so formed that when set in the frame or breast, the teeth are entirely detached from the breast, as well as from the other grates; and when the Gin is in operation, the fibres of the cotton, which are partly separated from the roll by the saw teeth, are permitted to pass up freely and without obstruction, and to clear themselves from the tops of the grates. The tendency to choke and clog, and the consequent increase of friction and injury to the staple, are thus entirely obviated, and the injurious forms of grates, is thereby avoided, and the ease with which the cotton is detached from the seed and carried through by the saw-teeth, is peculiar to this form of grate. They are drilled or hardened at the point where the saw-teeth pass, and the strictest attention is paid to their finish and setting.

The "Improved Brush" is also peculiar in its construction and mode of operation, the object of the invention having been to combine the advantages of the cylinder, or close, and the whirl or open Brushes, and to avoid the objectionable features of each of these forms. The supply of air for the Gin-Stand (the regulation and control of which is one of the most important functions of the Brush) is admitted through openings in the brush bands, and it is forced out, when the Brush is in motion, through long narrow slits or opening at the circumference of the Brush and between the rows of bristles. The several thin sheets or currents of air act alternately with the rows of bristles to detach the fibres of cotton from the saw-teeth in minute portions, and, with the aid of the "Patent Mote," give to the cotton, when delivered into the Gin-room, that peculiar combed or carded appearance so well known and so much desired by purchasers.

This Brush may be made to blow through a flue of twenty or thirty feet in length, or may be used with a short flue, as may be preferred. The very ingenious and ornamental covers of air which attend the use of the common open or whirl Brushes are entirely avoided, and a uniform and steady draft, of any desired strength, may at all times be secured by varying the speed, the depths of the wings, or the area of the space through which the air is supplied.

The Sliding Bars or Hoods, by which the Breast or Gate-Fall is attached to the frame of the Stand, were invented and applied to the Eagle Gin Stand, in order to adapt it more fully to the different views and wishes of planters, to the varieties of cotton, and to the various states of the cotton of different pickings. A peculiar curve is given to the front surface of the grate, at the point where the saw-teeth pass, and the front of the saw-tooth may be made to assume any desired angle with this curved surface of the grate, at the pleasure of the planter, thus enabling him to adapt the machine to the different varieties of cotton, or to the state of the weather, as may be desired or shown at pleasure. This invention, although very simple, is believed by us to be one of the most useful ever attached to the Cotton-Gin; and, when properly understood and adjusted, it gives to the planter almost perfect control over the product of his ginning machine, in a great measure both the quantity and quality of that product.

In making the saw-teeth, to ensure the greatest accuracy possible, we have just invented especially for the purpose, a machine or, called the "Dentometer," or tooth measurer. By this instrument, the exact angle of every saw is measured when the tooth is cut; so that the various angles described above can always be determined with great precision, and the range of grinding angles may be varied to any desired extent.

Startling and Interesting Facts
CONCERNING
CHOLERA, DIARRHŒA, DYSENTERY, COLIC,
Summer Complaints, etc.

A fact that should startle us this: One feels a slight uneasiness in the bowels, a slight diarrhœa comes on, which is little thought of; in a short time, in a few hours, perhaps, a cholera, it is attended with sickness of the stomach, a most sinking weakness, rapid discharges, coldness, cramps, spasms, blackness, collapse, DEATH—and yet all this fatal result from a disregard of the warning, premonitory Diarrhœa, and neglect of a wise provision of a safe and sure remedy that kind Providence has made easy to all.

This remedy is made palpable from the strongest desire to rescue the imposed, under the best substantial conviction that it is certain in its good effects, and with it on hand, no one heeding the warning and using the remedy, need be a victim to the Cholera.

DR. BILLINGS'
CARMINATIVE and ASTRINGENT SYRUP
IS THIS SURE REMEDY.

By its aid we and upon reports of hundreds, whose lives have been saved—of many even when apparently in the very last stage of death—he has been induced to make still more efforts to give a wider publicity to a remedy so greatly successful.

The perfection which he and others ascribe to this remedy may appear beyond the power of medicine to possess; yet the faithfulness of the claim is most thoroughly established, and will be fully confirmed by calling on the individuals who have witnessed its effects, and used it with complete success, some of whose names we are authorized to give.

For Cholera, Colic, Cholera Morbus, Dysentery, Diarrhœa, Bloody Flux, Summer Complaint and Weakness of the Bowels, this medicine is offered as a certain remedy. This is the medicine that arrested that horrible disease so prevalent among the Mexican soldiers. The officers first commenced its use, after which they gave it their soldiers, and cured in every case without an exception. I would refer to the officers and others who served in the war with Mexico. Sold by Spiritual Death and Christ as Life-Giver.

God alone has life. The life of God must encompass the life of the whole universe. If we assert that anything else has an underived life, we signalise a new factor in the universe, and therefore make two Gods, and thus vacate the divine perfection. All spiritual life must flow from God. If there be a divine the circumference of that divine must inclose all spiritual life. There is no middle ground between the acknowledgement of God as life-giver and absolute atheism. Accept the proposition—"man has life in himself," and you cannot postpone the conclusion of the fool—"there is no God."

In his state of primal innocence, man was the spontaneous efflux of the divine. This phenomenality—by which I mean, his thoughts, his words and deeds, in short his biography, was the phenomenality of God, the evolution in time and space of the divine existence.

The fall was a cessation of this life-relation between God and man. Endowed with free will, man had power to absolve this life relation and to move from his state as passive receptivity for the divine. In doing so he must of course resign the life which flowed through this divine connection, and receive in return a life of egotism or selfhood, which threw him outside of that circumference inclusive of all life, into the realm of death. The sin of the fall was therefore a refusal on the part of man to acknowledge God as the source of life, and willful persistancy in regarding himself as underived and self-created. Looked at on the negative side, the sin of the fall was ungodliness, on the positive, selfishness.

Our logic would lead to the absolute annihilation, the sudden destruction of man, in the first moment of selfishness, in the very crisis of disjunction with God. So it would, and truth forbids us shrink from the dread inane that tumbles before the pathway of our reasoning. Christ comes in here as a mathematical and syllogistic necessity. A Christless universe were a vast grave yard of spirits disjoined from God. The personality that man carried with him beyond the limits of divine, verged with each rising and setting sun, deathward. Christ as life-giver counteracts this death tendency of our race, and enables us to invade anew the circumference of the divine, wherefrom we have wandered as prodigals from the hearthstone of our own Father.

Spiritual death is the disjunction of men from God, the removal of man from within the circumference of life to the outside world of death or no life. It is estrangement from God, loss of affinity for the divine. Life in Christ is the reintegration of man in God.

As life-giver Christ overrides human volition. He places every man, nolens volens, in a sufficiently living relation with God to enable him to recover his lost position in the universe. Nay, further, he places him in that position.—He calls upon us to acknowledge this life as coming from God through him. If we refuse, we repeat in ourselves the sin of Adam—selfhood—and drop again to the bottomless hell of spiritual death. Every man commences life an unfallen Adam; every woman commences life a sinless Eve. The fruit of the tree of knowledge, which is a self-created life, is before us all; if we eat thereof we must be driven from the Eden of infantile innocence.

The fall of man was too disastrous to be accounted for by a wave of sin, troubling the outer edge of his being; it was a shaft of lurid lightning shot from hell into the heart of humanity.—The groans that issue from the abyss of our spiritual nature declare too plainly its death throes. What is my own experience? I feel in my soul a life that in its true connection with God, is immortal, dissevered therefrom, living it is true, but constantly verging deathward, I wander in aimless search for the true life that never dies. The speculations of philosophy instead of satisfying my troubled soul, reveal the certain on-coming of death that never dies. I turn to Jesus and a voice reaches my desolation,—"I am the Resurrection and the Life," and

> Is bright as at creation's day."

I behold in Jesus my immortality set free from the jail of death. I feel the God-breath stirring my soul to new pulsations, and quickening my being to new life, light and rapture. I begin a new aeon of progress which proceeds along the line of gospel teaching, till my being is merged into the infinite. I behold in Jesus.

> "The anchor of my purest thoughts; the nurse,
> The guide, the guardian of my heart, the soul
> Of all my moral being."

IGNATIUS, JR.

The Cultivation of Spirituality in the Ministry.

Without assuming to question the spiritual life of the clergy, as a class, it can not be less important to call attention to it, than to other subjects in connection with the high office of the ministry of reconciliation. If it is the province of the press to discuss manner and matter, as they pertain to pulpit duties, occasional reflections on the importance of preserving a suitable tone of personal piety can not be unimportant. To young men in the ministry this is particularly worthy of attention because habits formed at an early period are apt to continue through life.

There is danger of losing, to a sensible degree, our individuality of experience in regard to religious truth, in the application of which we constantly make to those who hear us. What the preacher prepares, he prepares for others; their condition is before him, their necessities shape his exhortations, and their spiritual growth lies constantly upon his heart. This is as it should be; but he must never forget, that he may read human nature more truly in a faithful analysis of his own heart, than elsewhere; and that the highest qualification, in connection with aptness to teach, which he can possess, is an intimate acquaintance with the experiences of the Gospel. Enlarged experience in the realities of grace is indispensable to exalted and permanent usefulness in the ministry.

In the prosecution of religious or theological studies, there is danger, as every young minister will find, of substituting them for habitual acts of devotion. By this phrase we mean those withdrawals to closet-meditation and prayer, which must be cultivated as a habit, to ensure a constant glowing zeal in holy things, and an experience corresponding to what we teach. In reading the biographies of the early Methodist preachers, we are struck with their adherence to habits of private, closet prayer, at stated times. We do not charge our modern brethren with a neglect of this thing; but we suggest that in the press of other duties, particularly where much time is spent in reading, with a view to pulpit preparation, and in acts of public devotion, there may be a temptation to regard the latter as a substitute for the former, and a consequent loss may ensue, which may scarcely be estimated, until its evil effects are realized in coldness and dead formality.

Dr. Porter, in his Lectures on Homiletics, says: "The man who imagines that he can perform his secret devotions in the street, as well as in his closet, or as well without, as with stated times for the purpose is ignorant of his own mind." We may apply the same remark to those pious ejaculations which will be prompted, in the prosecution of religious studies. They are very well, and ought to be encouraged; just as it is very proper and becoming for a good man to find in his daily walks incentives to a devotional frame of mind. But they must not be allowed to put aside the stated daily self-examination and closet communion with Him who is the source of all spiritual strength. Daniel, the Prime Minister of Persia, with the vast responsibilities of more than a hundred provinces resting upon him, did not allow them to deprive him of time to go "into his chamber three times a day, that he might pray and give thanks to God." The spiritual-minded, in all ages of the church, have been assidnous in the cultivation of this privilege, and in its observance as a sacred duty. And we venture the remark, satisfied of its thorough correctness, that the man who does not faithfully cultivate the habit of stated private prayer,—in the neglect of it, deadens his own spiritual sensibility, and materially abridges his qualifications for efficiency as a preacher of the Gospel. He may talk well on theology—he may preach with fluency—and interest—he may have a fixed adherence to doctrinal tenets, and discover no fondness for worldly company or pursuits; but the glow of zeal which personal experience alone can bestow will be wanting, and his own soul will be barren in the fruits of a sanctified life.

A Solemn Thought.—It has been observed, with much significance, that every morning we enter upon a new day, carrying still an unknown future in its bosom. How pregnant and stirring the reflection! Thoughts may be born to day which may never die.—Feelings may be awakened which may never be extinguished. Hopes may be excited which may never expire. Acts may be performed to day, the consequences of which may not be realized till eternity.

CORRESPONDENCE UP THE RIVER.

The Course of Empire—Prosperity—Missouri—Rare Dish—Passengers—Rock Island and Davenport—Scenery of the Upper Mississippi—Hills and the Distance—Rocks—Sugar-Loaf—Maidens' Rock—Lake Pepin and St. Croix.

From St. Louis to St. Paul, Minnesota, is variously estimated from seven to eight hundred miles. What with rapids, shoals and fogs and a heavy cargo of freight and passengers we are a full week on the river. There are three links in the line of packets. The first to Keokuk, going fourteen miles by land around the Rapids; the second to Dubuque, and the third from Dubuque to St. Paul. A "through boat" is better on many accounts, as it saves change of boats and trouble. So on the good steamer York State we embark on Tuesday evening, June 10, at 5 o'clock precisely. The wharves are crowded with people, baggage and produce, and many boats are blowing their whistles, ringing their bells, whilst the heavens are black with smoke which belches from their chimneys. There are boats leaving for the Upper Mississippi, for the Missouri as high as Council Bluffs, for the Illinois river, and for various points in Kansas and the extreme Western World. Berkley said well "Westward the course of empire takes its way." Star you know is a late improvement of this celebrated line.—Course is better, for the stream of immigration is like some vast river, rapid, exhaustless, deep. Every boat is crowded to its utmost capacity, and many are left behind to swell the current that will flow on after us. A glance at the wharves as we back out into the river and hurry past the fleet of steamers which lie thick along, reveals one source of prosperity. St. Louis is the great distributing office of Northern and Eastern travel and of Western immigration. It is the point of departure to the regions beyond.

We pass the mouth of the Missouri by nightfall and obtain such view of it as we can by moonlight. It is eighteen miles above St. Louis. The mouth has not the clear and chiseled lips of the Ohio, and there is no distant prospect up between its banks. The water is thick and of a milky whiteness, and its mixture with the clear water of the Mississippi is imperfect for miles. The latter seems to shrink from the union and keep close to the opposite side, as if to escape the muddy embrace of its perturbed and giant tributary. Large patches of muddy water float along amidst the pure water, and little eddies of thick water whirl around like tops amidst the purer waves and currents. The Missouri is the main river, it gives character to the water below, and in spite of the large volumes which are poured into it the ascendancy is maintained to the Balize. From the mouth of the Missouri the water is as different as can be imagined. At first of a reddish clearness and then becoming limpid and sparkling like a brook.

Before attempting to give you a pen-glimpse of the Upper Mississippi, let us look at ourselves and our fare. Our first breakfast was encouraging—good appetites and good cooking made it so. The table is not set out in so stately a manner as the lower packets. The style is less but the cusine is not inferior. The meats and pastry are rather superior. But at our first breakfast we had a rare dish. It smacked of Paris, China, or the Gallic epicureanism of New Orleans. It was a broil of nether extremities. They had a look of life—a living, jumping attitude.—Doubtless the cook had spitted them in the very act. I thought of Æsop, the boys and the frogs, "sport to you, but death to us." Nobody but an old croaker could object to the flavor. It was so nice to see, and so delicate and squab-like to taste. The company in cabin is unusually various. More than a fair compliment of children, all mindful of their right to make as much noise as possible. There are men and women of course. Young people and old people. Invalids going to St. Paul for better lungs and improved digestion—Eastern men bent on land speculations and parties of pleasure—raftsmen returning to the lumber regions, and wanderers seeking homes and fortunes where they may best find them. Taken together as samples of Western steamboat company, they are more orderly, well-behaved and kind than we have seen elsewhere. Very little drinking, no gambling, and but a moiety of the profanity which may be heard on the tributaries of the Lower Mississippi.

Between St. Louis and Rock Island the scenery is worthy of note, though not comparable with what awaits us farther up. There are a number of cities which have sprung up in an incredible short space of time. Alton, Quincy, Keokuk, Nauvoo and Burlington are all beautiful and flourishing places. Nauvoo, the quondam capitol of the Mormons, is more beautiful for situation than any. A hill rises in long and graceful slopes from the water. Around it the river makes a spacious bend, so that we seem to nearly circumnavigate the place. The houses are built on the slopes of this three-sided hill in circular order, and looking toward the river. On the summit and facing up stream, stands the unfinished temple. Two winged turrets and a center wall which connects them are all that we see. The town is now occupied by a company of French Socialists, who are making an experiment in political economy, not as demoralizing but quite as absurd as that of their Mormon predecessors. A peculiarity of city building on the river is that there are usually two, one on each side. A spirit of rivalry and emulation inspires them, and looking each other in the face they are pushed forward in enterprise. Rock Island and Davenport are opposite, the former in Illinois and the latter in Iowa. The approach to these towns from below is fine—indescribably so. As we steam along within four or five miles we find ourselves enclosed in a vast amphitheater, having a diameter of at least ten miles. We are surrounded by hills which rise gradually from the basin, and whose distant summits are robed in azure. The river is dotted with islands, amongst which we make our way. The towns grow upon our vision, stretching up and down on both sides and climbing the heights.—Rock Island, from which one of the cities takes its name, rises in the channel between and nearer the left bank. Its face to the South is steep and rocky. From either shore to this island there is a railroad bridge, not suspension, but with arches and abutments. This and the suspension bridge at the Falls of St. Anthony are the only bridges which have spanned the Mississippi. Its entire length is 5,830 feet, consisting of six spans of 250 feet each. The draw-pier which stands in the middle of the channel on the West side of the island, and on which a section turns on a pivot for the passage of boats, is forty feet in height, forty-five feet in diameter at its base, and thirty-seven feet at the top. When this section turns on the pivot, an opening of 120 feet is made on each side of the pier. Two of the arches, recently destroyed by fire, have not been replaced. From the highest point in the rear of Davenport, we have a perfect view of the whole, a view which some of our well-traveled friends pronounce equal to any in the West.

From this point our progress is one of uninterrupted interest. The main features are the same, but variously combined. Sometime prairies come quite to the shore and roll away in graceful swells beyond the sight.—These are diversified by the growth of different kinds of grain and by fields in every stage of culture. There are patches of virgin soil freshly turned, and there are others chequered with young corn or yellow with the signs of approaching harvest. The hills, the everlasting hills, are most prominent. At times their tops are in the blue distance, everywhere surrounding like the mountains round about Jerusalem.—Then they rise directly from the water to a height of four hundred feet, and the castle-like rocks at the summit look as if they would topple over and fall upon us. Frequently these hills are all around us, and the clear river with its islands, looks like a placid lake embosomed amongst them, or like a prisoner hemmed on every side and taken unawares. Very often they stand in groups, peaked and grotesque, and then again they assume the attitude of regular mountain ranges, with every imaginable beauty of outline.—There is an island in the channel but a short distance below Lake Pepin called "Sugar Loaf Island" which is 350 feet high. It is a notable curiosity and one which excites the attention of all who pass it.

Lake Pepin is celebrated for its scenery, but we were so unfortunate as to pass through it in a dark and rainy night. One object we saw through the gloom, the Maidens' Rock, which has a perpendicular of four hundred and fifty feet. Tradition says that years and years ago an Indian maiden, daughter of a chief, being thwarted in love, threw herself from the top of this promontory. This was a very romantic way for a young red lady to rebel against fraternal authority and to die for love.

The lake is simply an enlargement of the river, six miles across in its greatest breadth, and reckoned variously from thirty to sixty miles in length. Lake St. Croix is at the entrance of the river of the same name. This is scarcely more than one mile wide and without current. Its length is twenty miles. We enter this lake early in the morning, and soon after breakfast reach Stillwater, a small and thriving town at the head of the lake. Boats for St. Paul usually run up to this place first, and then go around to St. Paul. Instead of going round, a distance of sixty miles, we take a stage and cross over by land, making a journey of eighteen miles. The country between the two towns is pleasant. Burr oak openings and prairies, highly cultivated in places, and interspersed with little lakes whose banks are covered with small pebbles; running brooks brawling with life and of crystal clearness make the views delightful. It was a charming ride, our first trip in Minnesota, and our first glimpse of its interior. Thus it came to pass that we entered St. Paul, the capitol of the Territory, and dined therein on the 18th day of June, in the year of grace 1856. But I must have done. My next will be of St. Paul and St. Anthony, of Minnesota and Menehaha.

WOODSMAN.

June 19, 1856.

For the N. O. Christian Advocate.

Good—Worthy of Imitation.

In the Woodville station, Mississippi Conference, there is a parsonage with good substantial furniture, and a parsonage library for the benefit of the preacher.

It was gotten up by contributions of books from some, but principally by the ladies sewing society.

What a fine collection of books, too. I should like to have some such in my own library, but am not able.

Suppose our Methodist people think of the propriety, convenience and importance of this parsonage library. Is there a circuit or station but might have one if a little effort were made? If this were a general thing it would save our itinerant—preachers several dollars of expense every year in buying and moving his books. Our people want us to read, study, keep up with the age and preach to them and their children and servants, but we must be at the expense of getting, keeping up and moving our libraries. Is this right?

Then, again, if a good library was connected with each church or congregation many who are poor could get good and useful books who do not now have scarcely a book to read.

If we desire an intelligent church we must get them to read good solid books.

If you want your preachers to have such books for reading, reference, etc., just begin now to get up a church or parsonage library contribute your money and some books. It is a good idea and will work well.

Make up your money and send to the Book and Tract Agent, Vicksburgh, for the books.

Perservere in Training.—In home training two rules must be adhered to, if parents would accomplish great and imperishable results. The first is prayer, and the second perseverance.—Wesley's home education, under the tutelage of his parents, was peculiar and well calculated to initiate him early in habits of order, and resolute effort in accomplishing any object he might undertake. "Why, my dear," said his father to his mother, or she to him, (I forget which,) while patiently teaching one of their children a simple lesson, which it was slow to learn, "why my dear, do you tell that dull boy the same thing twenty times over?" "Because," replied the other, "nineteen times won't do. If I tell him but nineteen times all my labor is lost, but the twentieth time secures the object!" All classical antiquity has not bequeathed us a maxim of more practical wisdom. Christian faith imbibes it from the Word of God. If we would teach knowledge to the young, and make them to understand the doctrine fraught with life, and holiness and salvation, "precept must be upon precept, line upon line, here a little and there a little." In such a school, Wesley's mind was prepared to achieve the greatest things by being taught the smallest, and whatever he learned at all, he learned well.

Meditation on death gives a grand and mellow tint to our habits of thinking; as a great ocean exposed to the rising sun borrows from its edge to the farthest bound of waters a celestial glow of light.

The ordinance of the Lord's Supper is like a tree laden full of fruit; but none of this fruit will fall unless shaken by the hand of prayer.

THREE DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

ARRIVAL OF THE CANADA AT HALIFAX.

The R. M. steamship Canada, Capt. Long, from Liverpool on Saturday, June 21, arrived at Halifax between nine and ten o'clock on the evening of the 1st inst.

The steamer Indian, from Quebec, arrived at Liverpool on the evening of Thursday, the 19th.

H. B. M. screw steamship Himalaya, from Halifax, arrived at Portsmouth on the 17th June, in a passage of 8 days 3½ hours—the quickest on record.

The screw steamer Edinburg sailed from the Clyde for New York on the 18th June.

The Collins steamship Baltic arrived out at Liverpool on the evening of the 18th ult.

The news is generally unimportant.

The excitement consequent upon Mr. Crampton's arrival out speedily subsided; and, as Mr. Dallas was not to be dismissed, the recruiting business was regarded as definitely settled, and hopes were freely interchanged that the Central American question would soon be also.

Mr. Buchanan's nomination made but little stir.

Peace meetings and friendly addresses to America were abundant.

Mr. Baillie's motion in the House of Commons respecting the American difficulties, and on which it was supposed the Palmerston Ministry would be defeated and resign, is withdrawn.

A rumor prevailed that Great Britain would send no Minister to Washington during the administration of President Pierce. It was only rumor, however.

Great Britain.

The following is the latest in Parliament:

On the evening of Friday, the 20th, Mr. Gladstone stated that on Monday last, when Lord Palmerston announced it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to continue diplomatic relations with the American Minister, he did not give any explanation of the motives which led to that course, nor did he advert to the conduct of the American Government in the dismissal of Mr. Crampton. At that period there was reason to expect an immediate discussion upon the question, and therefore he might have thought the explanations at that time premature. He did not complain of this silence, but the motion to which he referred having been withdrawn, and there being some uncertainty also as to the line which an honorable gentleman opposite, who had given notice of his intention to introduce the question, was about to take, he thought it important that the House should know as early as possible the nature of the reply which the Government was to give to Mr. Marcy's dispatch respecting the dismissal of Mr. Crampton from Washington, and, perhaps, when they had that answer it would be time to discuss the question. He, therefore, wished to know whether the Government would be prepared to lay their reply to Mr. Marcy upon the table.

Lord Palmerston said his honorable friend had rightly understood the motives which induced him to abstain on Monday from taking any observations upon the subject—motives equally strong prevailed on the present occasion. He would, therefore, say in reply to the question that he had no doubt of being able to lay all the papers upon the table, including Lord Clarendon's answer to Mr. Marcy, at an early day.

Sir J. Packington said, the honorable gentleman had acted quite right in asking the Government for the production of the papers, and he was glad to hear that in the course of a few days the House would be in possession of the answer returned to Mr. Marcy's dispatch. It would, perhaps, be only fair towards the Government to postpone any discussion on their conduct with regard to the enlistment question, until the dispatch was produced—but he earnestly hoped that discussion will not long be delayed. He spoke in no party sense and with no party object, when he said that he regarded with feelings of the greatest anxiety—he might also say of shame—the present state of our relations with America. For the present painful position of affairs, he attached the blame, judging only from the public documents which were in the hands of honorable members, to what he considered to be the serious misconduct and unwise policy of her Majesty's Government, by which the Government of the United States had been irritated, deceived and offended. Under these circumstances, he regretted that Mr. Baillie felt himself under the necessity of withdrawing his motion, but he trusted that the intention of Mr. Moore or some other independent member, would afford honorable members on the conservative side of the House an opportunity of calling attention to the real merits of the question.

Sir G. Grey strongly deprecated the tone adopted by the Hon. Baronet, in expressing so decided an opinion upon the question at the present moment. He was glad to find, not only from the cheers on his own side of the House, but from the manifest indications on the side of the Hon. Baronet, that his views did not meet with general concurrence.

Mr. Moore appealed to Lord Palmerston to appoint an early day for discussion upon the subject.

No answer was returned, and the subject was dropped.

Sir Edmund Lyons is to be raised to the Peerage, for services rendered in the Black Sea, being the only Peer manufactured from the war with Russia.

The Queen gave a grand ball on the evening of the 17th. Two thousand invitations had been given out. Mr. Dallas was present.

Prince Napoleon is visiting English ports in a yacht.

The baneful Ribbon system is prevailing extensively in the North-western counties of Ireland, especially Donegal and Sligo. Owing to instructions from the Government, the Constabulary are making great exertions to break up the confederacy, and numerous arrests have taken place. In Donegal, one day last week, twenty-one persons were marched into Lifford by the Constabulary, and committed for trial at the Assizes.

France.

Louis Napoleon is taking steps to have the Empress appointed Regent for her son.

The project of law on the subject has been sent to the Senate, and debated with closed doors. The project proposes that on the Emperor's demise, the Empress should reign, assisted by the Council of the Regency, whose names the Emperor shall leave under a sealed envelope—meanwhile the Government papers are writing up the project.

The latest from Paris, under date the 21st, states that the Moniteur contains a decree ordering the creation of a general system of inspection of the army and commissariat, by a special staff established for that peculiar purpose. The Moniteur also gives the project of the Senators Committee on the Regency. It states that the Empress mother is to be regent and guardian of her son during his minority, but is not to contract a second marriage while it continues.

In case of the death of the Empress, the Regency is to pass to the Senior Prince of France, thence to the other Princes, in order of hereditary succession, and failing them all, to the Council of the Regency, chosen by the Senate.

Two and a half millions of francs have been collected for the sufferers from inundation.

Italy.

Two or three changes have taken place in the Sardinian Ministry, the chief one being the appointment of Gen. La Marmora to the War Department.

Baron Wesse, Austrian Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs, has gone to Rome. It is rumored his object is to convince, if possible, Cardinal Antonelli and his colleagues of making necessary reforms.

Advices from Vienna state that Marshal Radetsky has sent his government word, from Lombardy, that if the excitement continued in the Lombardo-Venetian provinces, he should demand an increase of 30,000 Austrian troops. The government agreed that the increased force should be accorded if necessary.

The ship Sarah Bryant, from Cronstadt, for New York, was the first American vessel which passed the sound since the expiration of the treaty. She paid the dues under protest.

The Russian government is turning its attention to the colonization of its American territory. A large colonization party was being fitted out at Hamburg by a Russian American Company.

It appears to be settled that very little grain will be exported this season from Russia. Hundreds of vessels which went to the Black Sea ports for cargoes will return empty.

Let the Children Sing.—The editor of the American Magazine, in speaking of vocal music, says:

"All children can learn to sing, if they commence in season. In Germany, every child is taught to use its voice while young. In their schools, all join in singing, as a regular exercise, as much as they attend to the study of geography; and in their churches singing is not confined to the choir, that sits apart from the others, perhaps in one corner of the house, but there is a vast tide of incense going forth to God from every heart that can give utterance to this language from the soul. In addition to the delightful influence music has upon the character, it has also a marked influence in suppressing pulmonary complaints. Dr. Rush used to say that the reason why the Germans seldom die of consumption was, that they were always singing."

It is stated in letters from California, that the Vigilance Committee have sent word to ex-Governor John Bigler not to return to that State.

THREE DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMSHIP ASIA.

By the British and North American mail steamer Asia, which arrived in New York on the morning of the 27th ult., we have dates from Liverpool, London, Paris and other parts of the continent of Europe to the 14th ult.

The Fulton arrived at Southampton on the morning of Saturday, the 14th.

Although the Anglo-American question still occupied a large share of public attention, commercial men seem to have not much fear of any real disturbance of relations between England and the United States.

The government presses continued to stir up excitement, especially the London Morning Post and London Times, both of which, in language studiously offensive and irritating, demand the dismissal of Mr. Dallas and the application of force to the United States. On the other hand, the obstinacy of the government was awakening the attention of the country to the terrible consequences which a war with America would produce, and as Manchester is moving in the matter, and the conservative party seem particularly interested, it is hoped the result will not be war, but the overthrow of the Palmerston administration, for it cannot be overlooked that—(while the organs of the British Government continue to reiterate that the excitement is kept up by President Pierce and his cabinet for private ends)—the excitement in England is mainly attributable to the necessity that exists for the Palmerston party to have some rallying cry to keep themselves in power.

The anxiety which is felt may be best ascertained from the tone of the inquiries in Parliament, made on Friday evening, the 13th. The position of affairs was there spoken of as critical, and Lord John Russell had given notice of a special motion of inquiry on the subject for Monday, the 16th.

A peace address to the people of the United States was placed for signature in the Manchester Exchange and received eight thousand signatures in a few hours.

The citizens of Ramsgate, of which place Col. Lake (of Kars,) is a native, have subscribed to purchase for him a sword of honor.

The Lord Mayor of London had called a public meeting to raise subscriptions for the sufferers from the floods in France.

Captain Thompson, one of the defenders of Kars, had died from the effects of his wounds and privations.

Richard L. Swift, British Consul at Buffalo, is appointed to the same office at Riga.

The rumor of a new French loan is contradicted in the Moniteur.

The Emperor Alexander had arrived at Riga.

Mr. Dillon, French Consul at San Francisco, has been named Consul-General at Port-au-Prince. A Paris letter asserts that he has instructions to intimate that France will not permit Soulouque to invade the Dominicans.

William Palmer, the surgeon of Rugely, convicted of poisoning his friend, John Parsons Cook, with strychnine, was hanged at Stafford, on Saturday morning, the 14th ultimo, in the presence of 20,000 persons. He made no confession.

The following is an extract from a letter written to a banking firm in New York, under the date of June 13th, which we find in the New York Evening Post, of the 27th ult.

"In spite of the lamented misunderstanding between our two Governments, there has been a somewhat extensive business doing in the American securities during the past week.

"We have been getting prices which show confidence in the amicable adjustment of our differences, and the preservation of peace."

The East.

According to Constantinople advices, letters from Odessa state, that M. de Bontenieff is named minister of Russia at Constantinople, and M. Ozeroff, at Athens. The Turkish journals speak of great projected speculations, particularly in new buildings, which will be erected in the beautiful quarter of Buyuk dere upon the Bosphorus. The Europeans await the return of Ali Pacha, in order to claim a reform in the tenure of landed property. The crops throughout the Turkish empire present a favorable appearance. The Sultan has made a splendid present to Miss Nightingale. At Constantinople, on the 2d ult., a report spread that the Russians had destroyed the fortress of Ismael, and the defences of the city of Kars. French civil officers will be charged with the organization of the customs duties in the Turkish empire.

Later from Texas.

The steamship Mexico, Capt. Lawless, from Indianola and Galveston, arrived yesterday morning. By this arrival we have Indianola dates to the 4th, and Galveston of the 5th inst.; but they contain very little information of importance.

The Galveston Civilian of the 4th says:

A few days since, the horses attached to a buggy in which were the daughter and niece of Mr. Slaneros, of Victoria county, ran away. The niece of Mr. S. was instantly killed, and Miss Slaneros badly injured.

The same paper of the 5th says:

The rivers continue down, and the receipts of produce are almost all from Houston, and by way of the Harrisburg Railroad.

The weather here is warm and dry. The want of rain seems to be again felt. Much depends upon the weather during the next two weeks; but we think the promise of good crops is generally fair with indications of an early harvest.

In spite of the warm weather, the fourth was celebrated with becoming spirit in Galveston.

The Liberty Gazette states that Messrs. Frazier and Bryan contemplate establishing a semi-weekly line of coaches from Lynchburg to Liberty, and on to Bouz Lake.

Mr. Phelps, of Brazoria county, passed through Liberty on the 27th ult., with 225 brood mares and jennets, which he is taking to Mississippi.

A mad dog was killed a few days since in San Antonio, after having bitten some fifteen other dogs. Great apprehensions are felt of the spread of hydrophobia, and an indiscriminate slaughter of all dogs running at large has been determined upon.

The last number of the Lavaca Herald says: The heat of the weather during the last week has been mitigated by several slight showers. A greater quantity of rain would, however, be beneficial to vegetation, and also to the cisterns.

Business was very dull at both Brownsville and Matamoras. There was a rumor that the yellow fever had broken out at the latter place.

Mr. Russell, mate of the steamer Nautilus, who was remaining at Brazos Santiago, while the vessel was repairing at New Orleans, died very suddenly on the 25th ult. He was buried the following day at Point Isabel.

A rather severe storm occurred at the Brazos, lasting from the 20th to the 23d ult. During its height, a steamer, supposed to be the Government steamer Fashion, was seen in the offing, where she remained nearly two days, but was ultimately compelled to put to sea.

The Rio Grande rose four or five feet on the 30th ult.

From Costa Rica.—We extract the following from the Costa Rica correspondence of the New York Tribune, of the 2d inst.—

San Jose, C. R., Wednesday, June 4, 1856.

Since my last of the 8th of May, our prospects here have not bettered in a commercial point of view, for trade is now the dullest of the dull. It was at this time of the year that the interior trade of the country was formerly most active, the merchants disposing of their imported goods to the country people, who now keep back their harvest earnings, some from necessity and the greater number from fear of the future. For the present, the war is at an end, and the army has returned; the untranquil state of the communications between Nicaragua and the settlements of the Guanacaste being a sufficient check upon any hostile movement General Walker might undertake against this country. The total loss of the Costa Ricans in the campaign has been some 700 men—an irreparable loss, that will be felt should peace even continue uninterruptedly its blessings for many years to come. France and England have lost many thousands of men and a vast amount of treasure; Russia is reported to have lost nearly half a million of men in the late war; but neither of those countries will have to suffer so severely from those losses as shall this small Republic from the loss of those 700 men. Before the war, laborers were scarce, and insufficient to harvest the coffee crop. What will it be now? I fully expect to see many a rich estate lose its crop next season.

THE SPIRITUAL ELEMENT IN THE ORGANIC CHURCH.

The Church of Christ is a living body—organic, not inorganic. Arrangements and means of grace that work well in spiritual health, are the first to be complained of and most in the way as decay and death come on. Spirituality is a necessity. The Church must have it and have it more abundantly.

Rev. Mr. Arthur, a Wesleyan minister, is credited with these profoundly evangelical remarks:

"The order of the Christian Church aught to be such, her outward framework so constructed, that she shall not be as a building, which, though it looks more cheerful when there is life within, yet will stand when there is none; but rather as a body, which falls the moment the spirit forsakes it, and tends to decomposition. No Church aught to be otherwise constructed than in entire dependence on the presence of the living Spirit in all her ministerial arrangements. Her frame ought to answer, to no definition that would suit an inorganic body; but to answer exactly to the celebrated definition of an organic one, namely, "that wherein every part is mutually means and end." The pervading presence of the Spirit should be assumed, so that, if it be absent, the pains of death shall instantly take hold upon her, and the cry be extorted, "Lord save, or I perish!"

That portion of our "outward framework" called class-meetings can be estimated by this rule. They are not functional, but organic. Unless there are classes where are your leaders and leaders' meeting? In the absence of these how can the economy of the church be supervised, the quarterly conferences be constituted, or preachers be licensed? But without spirituality class-meetings cannot be kept up. The people will love them and attend them only so long as there is the groaning for redemption and desire for holiness, in which they had their rise.

The itineracy, as a system of gospel supply and ministerial distribution, originated in zeal for God's church; and a love for perishing souls that disregards self and breaks through domestic and local associations. The same spirit in preachers and people, must sustain it. The natural tendency is to subsidence and self-appropriation. The congregational, the social, the selfish elements are ever trenching upon the catholic and religious.

The voluntary system has important relations to the spirituality of the church. Inconvenient it is felt to be very often, but inconvenient to indolence and lukewarmness. If any church will not work neither shall it be supported, and so of its ministry.

This is not as humanity would have it. Men affect establishments. An endowed ministry or episcopacy is desired by some. Remove the workman a step or two, from immediate dependance upon his work! Not at all. Then you may see fine meeting houses without congregations, and well to do pastors without flocks. The church is dead, but remains a deceptious form, a moral nuisance. Whereas, a crumbling tower, a shortened income would have reminded of prevailing spiritual indifference. The want of the spiritual element could not be defied. The very temporalities falling about the ears calls attention to that which is less readily perceived.

The material equipments of Methodism or as some call them "our secondary interests" were never in a more flourishing condition. Colleges and schools are rising up; the periodical and book press is a growing and felt influence; churches and parsonages are being built and remodeled all over the country. We are literally taking ground and fixing down our stakes. These are good and hopeful signs of progress—conservators too. They are made necessary by spiritual outworking and development. But let us not forget that they are secondary. His is the mere excellent vocation and the higher, who by conversation and example, by preaching and prayer and by every means cultivates the spiritual element of the church. That underlies all. Methodism cannot survive that.

A church so constituted must be a creature of dependance and of constantly recurring necessities. This is a merit, not a fault. It is a law of organic life. Her machinery will not go of itself, but requires an expenditure and recuperation of power. Evil, extinction itself will often threaten, which can be averted only by being true to the principles of her existence—drawing close to Christ and getting filled with the Spirit.

We learn from the Memphis papers that the building of the Marshall Female Institute, in Marshall county, Miss., was destroyed by fire on the night of the 27th ult., together with the books of the young ladies, and the demonstrating apparatus of the school. The Memphis Whig says:

Fortunately, the boarding house was situated about one hundred yards distant, and entirely escaped the conflagration, otherwise the loss of life among the students might have been terrible. The institute was under the control of Rev. Mr. Douglass, upon whom the loss falls heavy. The building was insured in the Memphis Insurance Company for $5000. The fire took place at twelve o'clock at night, and was, without doubt, the work of an incendiary. We understand that the citizens are already subscribing liberally to rebuild the institute.

OTHER CHURCHES.

In the Texas Baptist—a new and interesting denominational paper, by the by—we find the following, headed "a voluntary acknowledgement."

To Baptists Everywhere:—Brethren, when I lived in Eastern Texas I fell into the error of open communion, and I thereby wounded the cause of Christ and the feelings of my Baptist brethren. For all of this I am truly sorry. Having seen the error of that thing, and having now turned from it; and hoping that the Lord has forgiven me, I ask my brethren to forgive me. And for the few days I have to remain in the world, I will, by the help of God, try to be more faithful in the house of the Lord.

Your most obedient servant in Christ,

PETER ELDRIDGE.

We the undersigned gospel ministers, having had a personal conversation with Brother Eldridge, feel that we can heartily forgive him, and co-operate with him in the ministry.

JOHN GIBSON,
RICHARD HOWARD.

The Editor, who seems to have had knowledge of Bro. E's open ways, thus gives him the right hand of fellowship with a quiet grip:

"As to Brother Eldridge, he has never been regarded as a sound Baptist in Texas, but a very erratic one. We hope he has seen his error and repented of the much evil he has done to the churches by his inconsistent course as a professed Baptist minister. We would cheerfully forgive him, and hope to hear of his success in building up that holy cause he has done much to hinder if not to destroy."

There are signs of bolting among the super-ultras. The Methodist Episcopal Conference, which has just held its annual session at Syracuse, N. Y., on account of dissatisfaction with the editorial management of the Northern Christian Advocate, published at Auburn, under the auspices of the General Conference, has resolved to organize an association for the publication of a new paper, with Rev. Mr. Hosmer, the former editor of the Advocate, at its head. The present editor of the Advocate is Rev. Mr. Hibbard, represented as "a moderate man," whereas Mr. Hosmer is "a strong, outspoken, and uncompromising," etc.

The struggle between the high and low church elements of the Protestant Episcopal Church has begun in earnest. At the late convention of the New-Jersey diocese the services were intoned or nosed, to the astonishment, amusement or mortification of members. Bishop Doane's son was one of the performers! The convention rose up against it—were about to vote the nasal performance a nuisance, but the Bishop begged off and promised it should occur no more. The effort to introduce papal novelties was thus rebuked.

In Kentucky there is a Bishop Smith whose development has taken place since his elevation. An old, strait-laced but honest-minded Episcopal preacher, late of Mississippi, voted for him. Bishop S. was elected by a close vote, perhaps this old gentleman's. He was afterwards wont to say—"It repenteth me that I have made Smith Bishop."—The Louisville Watchman gives this news:

On the 28th ult., the Diocesan Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Kentucky, met in this city. Bishop Smith occupied an hour and a half in the delivery of his charge, which is said to have been the ablest document that has ever issued from this Diocese. In discussing the qualifications of ministers for their sacred office, the Bishop took occasion to express the opinion that the "sacramental system" is utterly detrimental to religion, and virtually advocated the doctrines of total depravity and conversion. Upon a motion being made to print the charge, the friends of Mr. Craik, Rector of Christs Church in this city, opposed it on the ground that the charge seemed to reflect both upon Mr. Craik's parish and chiefly upon a book of theology which he has recently published. The Bishop disclaimed all intention of personality, but acknowledged that Mr. Craik's book furnished the "occasion" of his charge. A long and very animated discussion followed. The motion to print the charge prevailed by a majority of 23 to 8. If this can be considered anything like a test vote of the sentiment in the Diocese on the subject involved, it shows that low church Episcopacy is generally in the majority.

A good deal of friction has characterized the correspondence between the Old and New School Presbyterian Assemblies, and those numerous congregational bodies of New England and the North, called associations and consociations. Small but smart little bodies these, touched with impudence. They for years have abused the privilege of correspondence by badgering the Assemblies about tolerating the "peculiar institutions" and by meddling generally. These Assemblies got tired of it and resolved that such liberties were not covered by "correspondence" and must end. The associations are now cutting off the Schools, old and new. The New York Observer gives the history of the way it was done at the late Rhode Island Convention:

Rev. Dr. Leavitt, of Providence, presented from the Committee on Overtures, the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas, the General Assemblies of the Presbyterian Church, with which we are in correspondence, regarding slave-holding as not inconsistent with good standing in the Church of Christ, decline receiving fraternal remonstrance and reproof from corresponding Christian bodies who may differ from them on this subject;

Therefore, resolved, That we cannot, consistently with our principles and Christian obligation, continue our correspondence with these bodies.

He made a speech and the resolution prevailed. Before the exclusion, however, Drs. Rice of the Old and Poor from the New School were allowed to be heard for the last time. Neither of these Assemblies, on account of their attempt to conciliate Northern and Southern Churches and hold compromise take high ground on Slavery.—They cannot stand, flat-footed, on Southern principles. But, Dr. Rice laid in a few hard licks, at parting:

I was pleased to observe that Dr. Leavitt admits that we treat the subject as the Apostles treated it though I was not satisfied with his reasons in favor of a different mode of treatment at the present time. And the newspaper called the "Congregationalist" says that the Apostles did not condemn slavery out and out, but laid down principles that centuries afterwards might be revived and applied to its condemnation. Then you hold that the Apostles received heinous sinners into the church; did not require them to cease from their sin; did not even tell them that slave-holding was sinful, but only laid down certain principles to be applied 1800 years afterwards! If you will prove this, I will throw away the New Testament, as utterly unsafe to guide us in the matter of morals. Na sir, they never took a man into the church until he had put away all sin, and to say that inspired Apostles winked at sin of any kind, is to impeach the character of those men, and the inspiration of the God who sent them."

But Dr. L. tells us Roman slavery was not as bad as American slavery. Then there is no truth in history. Masters had not only power to separate husband and wife, parent and child, but to kill their slaves at pleasure: and they exercised their rights on the aged and infirm. The laws of this State may allow a man to treat his wife very badly, but will a man remain a bachelor because the law allows such an abuse? He says the laws of the slava States allow masters to withhold the Bible from their slaves. And so the laws of Rhode Island allow parents to withhold the Bible from their wives and children, and they do it if they are Romanists or Jews. The law may be very bad, but there is no sin in having the power to do wrong, if you abstain from its exercise.

Before you pass this resolution I think you ought to agree among yourselves what is the duty of the Assembly in the premises. On the subject you are not agreed: One says slavery is a sin per se. Another says no: it is only a sin when you hold men for the sake of gain. I agree with this doctrine, and go further, and say if a man makes money for money's sake—that is, for mere gain—it is a sin. Now you ought to agree among yourselves as to these things, and having told us what we ought to do, see if we will not do it, before you cut us off.

A. R. RAMEY.

A Bee in the Bonnet.—"Was the cross on the ass' back," said a young ecclesiologist to Dr. Parr, "caused by our Lord sitting on that animal's back on his way to Jerusalem?" "If you had more of the cross and less of the ass about yourself," was the reply of the savage but learned antiquarian, "you would never have asked." I do not say that this was the way to have treated the inquiry, but I think the right reason was given. And I can not but think that some of the late ecclesiological devices must spring from what the Scotch would call a "Bee in the Bonnet" of their reverend fabricators. Take for instance the announcement gravely made that family worship, to be acceptable, must be made in a room which has no story above it. Prayer it would seem, like heat, is supposed to be kept the more closely imprisoned by the number of air chambers which may be interposed between it and the upper atmosphere; and in order that it may freely escape these chambers must be dismantled.

A Truth for Parents.—The Rev. Dr. Duff remarks:—"I am prepared, from experience, to say that, in nine cases out of ten, the hoards of accumulated money given to children, by whom they were never earned, and who never acquired habits of industry, or thrift, or laboriousness, prove, in point of fact, rather a curse than a blessing. I am prepared to substantiate that as a matter of fact, not merely from my own knowledge of the subject, but from the statements of men who have been of watchful and observant habits, cultivated not only in Great Britain but America. Yet it is a melancholy fact, that so little do parents know of the mass of misery they are accumulating for their children, in heaping up those hoards, so little do they know how big with misery those hoards are." The remark is worthy of the best consideration of parents; and the truth it inculcates should constrain them to use their wealth in doing good, and not hoard it up to injure their children.

The Dead Child.—Few things appear so beautiful as a young child in its shrond. The little innocent face looks so sublimely simple and confiding amongst the old terrors of death.—Crimeless and fearless, that little mortal has passed alone under the shadow.—There is death in its sublimest and purest image; no hatred, no hypocrisy, no suspicion, no care for the morrow ever darkened that little face; death has come lovingly upon it, there is nothing cruel or harsh in its victory. The yearnings of love, indeed, cannot be stilled; for the prattle and smile, all the little world of thoughts that were so delightful, are gone forever. Awe, too, will overcast us in its presence for the lonely voyager, for the child has gone, simple and trusting, into the presence of its All-Wise Father; and of such, we know, is the Kingdom of Heaven.

Merit.—The labor of a whole life directed to the object of establishing a merit of our own, will only widen our distance from peace; and we know of nothing that will send this visitant to our agitated bosoms but a firm and simple reliance on the declarations of the gospel.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Revival—Dedication.

The Methodists of Jefferson, Marengo county, Alabama, have just finished a neat house of worship, which for tastefulness and comfort will compare favorably with any village church in the State. Everything necessary—nothing unnecessary. On the first Sabbath in June Rev. P. P. Neely, D. D., of Marion, preached the dedication sermon to a congregation, which to witness the services had gathered from nearly all portions of the county.

The sermon was in Brother Neely's usual style, ornate and eloquent. At night the sacrament of the Lord's supper was administered, and the indications of revival influence were so marked as to induce us to protract the meeting. Brother Neely stayed and preached Monday night, and being compelled to leave on Tuesday, Brother F. M. Grace, of Demopolis, came down and labored with us most efficiently and faithfully in the pulpit, in the altar and from house to house. Brother McBryde came down the following week and assisted us with much success and acceptability.

Ten professed conversion, eight of whom have united with the Methodist Church and one to the Baptist Church. The other will probably join the Baptists. The converts were principally young ladies. Three widow ladies, also; one of whom received on last Sunday morning the ordinance of Baptism, and immediately brought her three sons to the altar, and had them dedicated to God in the same holy ordinance. An entire family brought into the covenant relation with God. The conversion of this lady was one of the most signal manifestations of converting power I have ever witnessed. Indeed I have never seen mourners who appeared to take a more rational and constant course until converted. The church is thoroughly alive now, and we take this refreshing from the presence of the Lord as prophetic of yet greater things.

It is with no inconsiderable degree of pleasure that I mention the fervent and constant aid rendered us by the pastor of the Baptist Church, Rev. J. W. Parker. Brother Parker is "after the most straitest sect" a Baptist, and sails under no false colors, yet with a converted heart seeks to aid every good work. The greater part of his congregation entered deeply into the spirit of the meeting. May God's spirit effectually unite the hearts of all who bear the name of our Blessed Saviour, and thus put a stop to the silly and absurd strife which has been engendered in some parts of our country. If I mistake not the signs, these are the buddings of a glorious revival on this circuit.

JOSEPH B. COTTRELL.

Spring Hill, Marengo county, Ala.

Woodville, Miss., June 30, 1856.

Dear Brother:—Enclosed you will find a draft for three hundred and fifty-four dollars missionary money, which was subscribed and collected at and since our missionary meeting, which occurred on the 18th ult., in this place. Dr. Winans preached an able and appropriate sermon on the occasion, which warmed to a considerable degree the missionary zeal of his hearers, and they gave immediately in cash and subscription, over four hundred dollars. I think there will be more given yet. Of this amount one person gave one hundred and fifty-five dollars. Another person gave sixty-five dollars. But these figures indicate but a small portion of the liberality of these generous souls whom God has made fat. Several others gave very liberally.

The following persons were made life members in the Parent Society of the M. E. Church, South, viz: Dr. Wm. Winans, Mrs. Martha Winaus, Dr. B. M. Drake, Rev. W. P. Barton, Mrs. Lucy Barton, Wm. B. Hines, Mrs. Dr. Drake and Miss Mary Eugenia Burruss, by her father Mr. J. W. Burress and then the following persons gave fifty dollars in memory of the sainted dead: Elijah Steele,—Mr. J. W. Burruss, $5; Hon. E. McGehee, $5; W. F. Simrall, Esq., $5; Mrs. Mary B. McGehee, $5; Master Winans Steele Hoard, $5; Miss J. Wild, $5; Miss Mary B. Barton, $5; Mr. M. Wicker $5; Miss Burress, $5; Mr. J. Howard Newell, $5. Happy thought! The memory of a good man will never die. The mantle of Elijah has fallen upon his friends,—"Though dead he yet speaketh."—Though "the dust has returned to its dust," and the deathless spirit gone to swell the chorus of heaven and add new peans to the triumphs of the cross, his memory still lives in active promotion of the great missionary enterprize which he loved and for which he labored on earth. "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord, for their works do follow them."

While our society in Woodville has been liberal in giving to the missionary cause, there are other societies in this section of country far in advance of it in liberality.

The modus operandi adopted, and which has proved so successful in this section for the last two or three years in collecting missionary money is this: The devotion of the fifth Sabbaths in the year to special missionary effort, by appointing at the first Quarterly Conference a preacher, and an alternate for each fifth Sabbath, whose duty and pleasure it will be to present the claims of this cause earnestly and thoroughly to the consideration of the people, and then take up a collection and subscription in the usual way, as at annual conference missionary meeting, and then proceed to make life members of the parent society. Thousands of our people never read the missionary reports in our papers, and consequently are ignorant, almost entirely ignorant of our missionary operations, and the great need, felt need, of money to sustain our present missions and send out others to perishing heathens, and their apathy is equal to their ignorance. This plan would bring the subject, claims and great interests of this cause before the people generally; do away false and foolish objections so frequently made to giving to the cause of missions, and awaken an interest hitherto unfelt and give an impetus to missionary machinery hithorto unknown. The results are being realized in this section, and will be everywhere, if this or some other plan be adopted equal to it.

I candidly believe that the surest way to temporal as well as spiritual prosperity, is the hearty and liberal consecration of the first fruits of our increase to God. This opinion is based upon Scripture authority, Prov. 3; 9, 10, "Honor the Lord with thy substance, and with the first fruits of all thine increase. So shall thy barns be filled with plenty and thy presses shall burst out with new wine." Again, Luke 6, 38, "Give and it shall be given you; good measure, pressed down, shaken together and running over shall men give into your bosom."

WM. B. HINES.

Columbus, Miss., June 20, 1856.

Our congregations are good and I have received several in the church.—Yesterday afternoon I preached to the children, and such a congregation!—They were attentive too, listening without weariness to a discourse nearly an hour long. It was a delightful occasion. My charge has lately increased by having the colored people added.—Brother Graham, the missionary here, has been taken away to supply Brother Schoolar's work, he being in bad health.

Quarterly Conference Resolutions.

Auburn, Alabama, June 16, 1856.

At a meeting of the Quarterly Conference of the M. E. Church, South, Auburn Station, held on the 7th inst., the following resolutions were passed and the Secretary requested to forward them to the different church papers for publication:

Resolved, 1st. By the Auburn Station Quarterly Conference, that, in our judgment, the contemplated East Alabama Male College to be located at Auburn is demanded by the wants of our people.

Resolved 2d, That we recommend said college to the cordial support of our brethren and fellow citizens.

J. M. CARLTON, Sec'y.

The Honorary Degree of Doctor of Divinity was recently conferred by the Nashville University upon the Rev. A. R. Erwin, of Tennessee Conference.

Emory and Henry College.—The Catalogue of this well-known Institution exhibits 183 students the past session. Under the Presidency of Rev. E. E. Wiley, D. D., the College is prospering and doing good. For terms, see advertising columns.

How to Converse.—The thread of conversation is sustained among several persons by each knowing when to take a stitch in time.

There are persons who speak a moment before they have thought, there are others with whom you have to undergo in conversation all the labor of their minds—they talk correctly and wearisomely.

Literature.—It opens a back door out of the busy and idle world into a delicious garden of moral intellectual fruits and flowers, the key of which is denied to the rest of mankind. Our happiness no longer lives on charity, nor bids fair for a fall, by leaning on that most precarious and thorny pillow, another's pleasure for our repose.

Friendship.—It is not the least advantage of friendship, that by communicating our thoughts to another, we render them distinct to ourselves, and reduce the subjects of our sorrow and anxiety to their just magnitude for our own contemplation.

I have noticed that the prayer of every selfish man is "forgive us our debts," but he makes every body pay who owes him, to the utmost farthing.

He is the happy man, not whom other men think, but who thinks himself to be so.

BUSINESS—BANKS—COTTON, ETC.

The general results of the mighty trade which has been transacted in this city since the first day of September last is in the highest degree satisfactory. It is most noticeable in the stable and sound condition of our banking institutions, insurance offices and the general standing of our merchants and traders.

Taking a cursory view of the commercial and financial aspect of this emporium, we cannot arrive at any other conclusion than that the general body of our merchants have, in all that constitutes probity, business, faithfulness and integrity, carried out the divine injunction, and are entitled to be addressed, "well done good and faithful servants." Of course, exceptions may now and then appear, but they are only a trifling a nature they will not tarnish the general character of the merchants of New Orleans.

If we were called on to refer to any particular branch of trade—commerce or finance—to sustain our views, we can, with proud feelings, point to the banking institutions of our city. They are now the flag up the season's operations, and in no one of them do we find but that they have earned, for the last six months, less than six and a half to eight per cent. for this is not the most prominent feature of their operations. What they have done for stockholders is not to be considered alone important. What they have done for the general public good is of equal importance. In our opinion, it is folly to assert that the immense commerce of this city can be conducted without the aid and co-operation of banks. To money supporters refer us to the city of Boston where an immense business is conducted without the aid of banks. Yes, and we can well retaliate and point to the current rate of exchange prevailing there at the date of our last accounts, say eight to nine and a half per cent. discount on New Orleans, and ten to eleven per cent. discount on Northern Atlantic cities. Others again will point to Mexico, where business is transacted without the aid of banks. True, but how? With the promptness, safety and cheapness with which it is in this country? Assuredly not. The case must, indeed, be a weak one when better authority than those quoted can be found to sustain an opposition to the sound banking system of Louisiana. We have not, however, the space at this time at command to go into a lengthy dissertation on banks, but we have this to say, that in all the various attributes constituting soundness, usefulness to the public and profit to their stockholders, the banks of New Orleans stand without a parallel.

The general trade of the city is good for the season. The weather, though sultry in the middle of the day, is not of that oppressive character of which we read in our exchanges from Northern cities.

The commercial community having thoroughly discussed and canvassed the probabilities of a war with England, appears to have settled quietly down to the conviction that it is a long way off yet. As, however, discussion of this subject, reference has been frequently made to the important bearing the cotton crop had on the matter, we append tables showing the number pounds of cotton imported into England each year since 1840, and what portion of it was from this country. This "cotton question," it seems to us, is of more importance than the "enlistment question" or the dismissal of a dozen ministers or consuls. It is a home argument that commercial England clearly comprehend:

Abstract of the Report of the Kansas Committee.

The report states that as soon as the bill to organize the Territory of Kansas was passed, a large number of the citizens of Missouri went into the Territory and held squatter meetings, passed resolutions denouncing Abolitionists, and declaring that slavery existed therein. In the autumn of 1854, a secret political society called the Blue Lodge was formed, the plan of operations, oaths, etc., of which are given in the report. This Lodge controlled all the subsequent movements, and invasions on the part of the Missourians.

At the election on November 29, 1854, for a delegate to Congress, there was no fraud, except in the sparsely settled and remote districts, where citizens of Missouri appeared and voted. Details in relation to these facts are given in the report; which says the reduced to mathematical precision that seven hundred illegal and non-resident votes were cast by citizens of Missouri, and that the remainder, five eleven hundred legal votes. Whitfield received a majority and would have been elected without the aid of his Missouri friends.

During the winter, very great excitement existed on account of the invasion, public meetings were held and much bitter feeling was manifested. In February, 1855, a census was taken, and the number of legal voters was ascertained to be 2905. It was discovered that on the 30th of March, 1855, only days before the election, active preparations were in Missouri, where a complete organization was effected. Leaders were appointed; tents, provisions, ammunition and arms distributed, and the forces divided into companies in Missouri; and on the day of the election at least 5000 citizens of Missouri, testified, took up their line of march for Kansas. Companies went into every council and representative district of that territory but one. The great body testimony consists in detailing the acts and sayings these companies.

The investigating committee had before them the poll books, census rolls, etc., showing who were legal as well as illegal voters; and from accurate and the most absolute proofs it appeared that of about votes, five thousand were those of non-residents, a majority of the members of both houses of the Legislative Assembly, the committee say, would have been free State men had there been no invasion of Missourians. The Governor set aside the results of elections in some of the districts on account of irregularities. A new election took place thereupon on the 22d of May, but this did not affect the result.

* * * * * Free State men were chosen in these districts, except Leavenworth, where there was illegal voting.

The committee took a large mass of testimony regarding the proceedings of the Legislative Assembly which they say are characterized by recklessness and injustice. They likewise speak of the crimes, such as murders and robberies, which were frequent, and say that in no case with the exception of McRae, (a free State man,) was there any arrest, indictment, or prosecution for those offences.

The report contains full and complete details of everything connected with the Territory of Kansas prior to the 19th of March last, and says it is proved and distinctly proven that Samuel J. Jones, the Sheriff, was the cause of recent disturbances in which he was prominently figured. Mr. Oliver, of Missouri, a member of the investigating committee, made a speech in the Fifteenth District, but did not vote, although he went over with one of the companies from that State into Kansas.

The conclusions of the committee are that the elections in Kansas was carried by invasion from Missouri, that the Legislative Assembly is an illegally constituted body, and, therefore, has no power to enact valid laws. For these reasons its enactments are void. The election of J. W. Whitfield was not held by any valid law, nor was the election of Reeder in accordance with law. The committee suggest no remedy.

The report treats of obstructions thrown in the way of the committee, and of the general system which prevails in the Territory. It is very voluminous and is signed by Messrs. Sherman and Howard.

Another Hot Day at the North.—On June 20th, was one of the warmest days known for a long time in the Northern cities.

In Boston, the thermometer ranged from 86 to 90 deg. in the shade.

In Philadelphia, 98 deg. in the shade, and 120 in the steeple of the State House, an elevation of 180 feet.

In Baltimore, it was up to 98 deg. in the shade.

MARVELLOUS CURES.—We have always been slow to believe the wonderful cures which one medicine after another pretends to have made—but slow as we are we will own up, when we are fairly convicted. Those of our readers who are acquainted with the cases of Mrs. Bench and Mr. Farwell, will feel think us lightly turned when we confess our belief that Ayer's Cathartic Pills have virtues for purifying the blood which excel anything within the range of our acquaintance hitherto. For those who are not cognizant of the facts, we will say, briefly, that both have suffered for over eight years with scrofula which only grew worse, in spite of all the remedies she could employ, until she took Ayer's Pills. Under their influence one after another of her sores have healed, until she is apparently as free from the complaint as ourselves. He has had liver complaint with pain in his side that disabled him from work for a long time; all other medicines had failed to afford him any permanent relief, but a few doses of Ayer's Pills cured him and he now stands at his old post of conductor on the cars.

The Rhode Island Legislature has adjourned without electing an United States Senator. It will, however, have another chance next winter to make an election. Resolutions were adopted to amend the constitution so as to abolish the registry tax, and authorizing the Legislature to impose a poll tax. A resolution to require a twenty-one year's residence in the country as a qualification for voting, was rejected.

OPERATIONS OF THE U. S. MINT.—A statement of the operations of the Philadelphia Mint for the month of June, shows that the gold bullion amounted to $321,300—of silver, $76,800—total deposits, $398,100. The coinage for the month in gold, was $1,315,499—in silver, $145,000—three cent pieces, $3,660, and in cents, $3,913 88. Entire coinage of the month, $1,767,132 88. The whole number of pieces coined was 2,570,074.

MORE MORMONS.—The ship Horizon, Capt. Reed, says the Boston Ledger of the 30th, arrived at this port yesterday, from Liverpool, and anchored on the quarantine ground. She has on board another colony of Mormons, numbering in all about 830, which makes the third let that have landed at this port from Europe this season. They are similar in character to those who have preceded them, and are all bound for the land of promise, the fertile regions of Utah.

RESUSCITATION OF DROWNED PERSONS.—Dr. Hall, an eminent physician of London, gives instructions for the resuscitation of persons apparently drowned, totally at variance with the methods now in use. He says: There is one great impediment to the restoration of the functions of respiration, which is the falling back of the tongue across the top of the glottis, or entrance into the windpipe. In order to remove this, the patient is to be placed upon his face and breast, and the body is to be turned slowly on to the side, and then returned slowly to its former position.

This motion, whose effect is to cause a considerable amount of air in the lungs to be expelled and reinspired, is to be kept up until breathing is restored, or all hopes of resuscitation from this source are abandoned.

MARRIAGES.

DEATHS.

Died—At her residence in Vicksburgh, on the 19th inst., MRS. MARTHA P. WILLIS, only daughter of the late Burwell Vick, Esq., in the 61st year of her age.

It is a painful task to record the death of this estimable christian lady. What a vacancy is created in the ranks of the intelligent, useful women by the loss of such a person. By the death of one so useful, so gifted, so good, not merely one or two families, relatives and friends are made sufferers, but the whole community is bereaved. The cause of christianity sustains a loss, elevating female influence is abated, exemplary refinement and dignity of character are withdrawn from active usefulness. The open hand of charity is palsied, the wise and gentle counsel, the ripe fruitage of many years of widsstitude and experience is hushed forever, while sackcloth and symbols of woe usurp the once joyous home of the loved and lost. Such are the results of the decease of the excellent lady who has been so recently called from our living circles to the silent slumbers of the grave. It is a consolation to know that she felt that her "life was hid with Christ," and the assurance of a blessed immortality removed all gloom from the grave and took away the "sting of death," while she peacefully contemplated her transition from death to life, and from earth to the bosom of God.

Haywood, her father's residence in Madison county, and this city, had been her home for many years past, and there have been but few, if any, who have made more friends or drawn those friends with closer ties around them. She was a woman with unusual vigor of mind, and that mind had been cultivated with assiduous zeal and without cessation. We know of no lady who has given more careful and studious attention to the Scriptures, especially for the few past years of her connexion with the church.

The circle of her acquaintance embraced a large number of the most estimable, cultivated and distinguished persons throughout the West and South, many of whom, like herself, had grown with her growth and strengthened with the strength of our young State and Southern interests generally, and very few had contributed more to the elevation of her own sex or exerted a wider influence on social society.

A solemn knell chimes along the thinned ranks of the early settlers of our State and city, as the compulsous of their early years are being swiftly hurried from their small remaining numbers to the shades of death, and in that knell there is a voice that cries with the accents of Divine authority "What thou doest do quickly, for in the grave whither thou goest, is neither wisdom nor knowledge nor salvation."

Thus star by star declines,
Till all have passed away,
As morning high and higher shines,
To pure and perfect day;
Nor sink those stars in empty night,
But hide themselves in heaven's own light.

C. K. MARSHALL.

Vicksburgh, June 23, 1856.

Died—On the morning of the 26th June, in the city of Natchez, SARAH BURRESS, infant daughter of Rev. W. H. and Elizabeth Watkins.

Died—On the evening of the 3d inst., CARY LURTON, daughter of Dr. J. W., and Frances E. Harmon, aged 2 years and 8 days. Her remains were taken to Baton Rouge for interment.

"God, walking over starry spheres,
Did clasp her tiny hand,
And led her through the vale of tears,
Into the Mystic Land."

Died—In Jasper, Walker county, Ala., on the 25th June, 1856, A. HENRIETTA SELF, aged 23 months and 24 days, daughter of N. H. and E. J. Self.

A Tribute of Respect to a Sunday-School Teacher.

On the 19th of June 1856 MISS MARY ELIZA BLACKMAN fell asleep in the arms of Jesus, calmly, trustingly as a child upon the bosom of her mother. Amiable, talented and accomplished, she was the pride of her family and an ornament to society. Hope painted her future in colors bright and glowing. Suddenly, in the prime of youth, she was overshadowed by the cloud of death, but its ebon bosom was arched with the rainbow of promise prophetic of an eternity full of peace and joy and heaven. Just budding into womanhood her Heavenly Father transferred her to a more genial clime, where there is neither chill nor blight. There in the sunlight of heaven, under the smile of her God, to unfold the beautiful flower whose lovely bud we were permitted to enjoy. Ah how rare the bud even on earth—how glorious will be the flower in heaven's own clime. Associated with the Chunnynugee Sunday-School from its origin as a scholar, she was distinguished for diligence and punctuality as a teacher, for promptness and zeal to imbue the minds of her class with the sacred truths of our holy religion. Those truths are now seen by the scholar in heaven's glowing light. Heaven's unspeakable joy is the teachers exceeding great reward. For the early death of one so lovely the school expressed its sorrow in the following resolutions:

Resolved, That in the death of one so noble, so eminently gifted, this Sunday-School lost a most effective teacher and one of its most valued members.

Resolved, That we desire to sympathize most tenderly with the stricken and crushed parents and to them and the bereaved family, we do hereby offer the condolence of our most sincere regard.

Resolved, That as a token of respect we wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days.

Resolved, That a copy of the above preamble and resolutions be sent to the family, also to the Sunday School Visitor, Charleston Christian Advocate, New Orleans Christian Advocate and Macon Republican.

J. F. ELLISON, Sept.

Miss V. L. Vaiu,
" A.S. Ellison,
" E. V. Holmes,
" M. J. Robison,
" V. L. Druen,
" L. J. Powell. } Com.

Before the adoption of the preamble and resolutions, Dr. Powell rose and said he would be doing injustice to his own feelings were he to withhold the expression of his poignant grief and sorrow occasioned by the sad bereavement which has befallen not only our Sabbath-School but a whole community in the premature death of Miss Mary Eliza Blackman.—He had known her from her infancy. She was a child of genius, possessing natural endowments of the highest order. Hence her rare attainments in science and literature for one so young, added to her serene and lovely disposition and dignified, lady-like deportment, entwined her around every fibre of our hearts. For more than two years she had been a member of his Bible Class. She was never absent unless prevented by sickness. Prompt and energetic, her liberal attainments were astonishing, for she was never known to miss a question. But she has passed away from the scenes of earth to mansions in the skies. Oh may her glorious example shed a light upon the pathway of her classmates and juvenile friends, and may they strive to be useful in their day and generation, and glorify their Creator upon earth and dwell with him above.

Thirty-Fourth Congress—First Session.

WASHINGTON, June 27.—Senate.—The Senate passed the House bill authorizing the President to ennoe the southern boundary of Kansas in be run and marked; also passed the bill respecting the harboring of deserters, and to protect the public interests in regard to the enlistment and discharge of minors.

House.—Mr. Mullen, of Virginia, announced the death of his colleague, Mr. Bayly, passing an eulogium on his public and private character, and offered the customary resolutions of respect. Messrs. Goode, Cobb, of Georgia, and Campbell, of Ohio, spoke in favorable terms of the deceased.

WASHINGTON, June 28.—Senate.—The Senate was not in session to-day.

House.—Messrs. Howard and Sherman, of the Kansas Investigating Committee, have arrived, and resumed their seats to-day.

The consideration of the bill to admit Kansas into the Union was resumed.

Mr. Stephens having the floor, intimated his design to offer a substitute.

Mr. Campbell, of Ohio, asked him to accept an amendment thereto, in effect to repeal so much of the Nebraska and Kansas act as declares void the Missouri Compromise.

Mr. Stephens. I do not accept it.

Mr. Campbell. I suppose not.

Mr. Washburne, of Maine, said Mr. Stephens' proposition was a side blow to kill the Kansas bill.

Mr. Stephens denied this, expressing his desire that the latter should be referred to the Committee of the Whole. He vindicated the Kansas and Nebraska act, and condemned the movements of the Northern people to thwart the policy of that measure.

Mr. Evans, of Texas, said he was in favor of admitting Kansas at once, without any regard to the number of inhabitants, provided a fair election could be had. In order to secure such a result he thought Gen. Scott should be sent there, and if the existing government of Kansas had been established by force or fraud it should be abrogated.

Mr. Dunn, of Indiana, said that desiring to strike down, what had, in his judgment, made the disturbance in Kansas, and restore things as they were before the passage of the Kansas and Nebraska bill, he submitted an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia, which was substantially to restore the Missouri Compromise.

Mr. Grow, of Pennsylvania, called the previous question.

Mr. Walker, of Alabama, at 4 o'clock, moved the House adjourn. Negatived—yeas 77, nays 118.

Mr. Walker then moved to lay the bill on the table, which motion was not agreed to—yeas 70, nays 101.

Mr. Crawford, of Georgia, moved that the House adjourn, which motion was negatived.

The previous question was then seconded—yeas 98, nays 63—and the main question was ordered to be put.

Pending the motion of Mr. Stephens, of Georgia, to commit the bill to the Committee of the Whole, with instructions to report his amendment and the amendment of Mr. Dunn, in lieu of the original bill, the House, at half past four o'clock, adjourned.

WASHINGTON, June 30.—Senate.—The bill authorizing the issue of an additional number of arms for use in California has passed.

Mr. Douglas, from the Committee on Territories, to which was referred various bills relative to affairs in Kansas, made a voluminous report on the subject.

House.—Mr. Grow made the closing speech in favor of the bill for the admission of Kansas into the Union, opposing all the substitutes for the measure under consideration.

WASHINGTON, July 1.—Senate.—Mr. Cass said that a very grave transaction has occurred on the Pacific coast, according to the accounts just received, into which an examination ought to be made. Governor Stevens, of Washington Territory, has proclaimed martial law there, and arrested the Judge of the District Court and sent him away to some distance and closed the Court.

Mr. Cass said he did not desire to prejudice the cases, but it certainly seemed to be a great assumption of power. He submitted a resolution calling on the President for the facts in relation to the matter, which was read and adopted.

Mr. Collamore submitted a minority report from the Committee on Territories on the Kansas question, which was read and ordered to be printed.

House.—Mr. Barclay moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the Kansas bill was rejected, and in assigning his reasons for doing so, said that he was informed that warrants are in this District directing the arrest of ex-Governor Reeder for treason. This was regarded as farcical, and he was disposed to rebuke it by now voting for the bill, in order to protect the people of Kansas.

Mr. Houston expressed his regret that the gentleman had changed his mind either in consequence of persuasion or other means.

Mr. Barclay replied that he had acted on a conservative sense of duty, and would not be intimidated by the lash.

Mr. Houston disavowed any intention to impeach the integrity of the gentleman, nor did he censure him. He moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

WASHINGTON, July 2.—Senate.—The Chair laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of State, transmitting the original journal of the proceedings of the board of American Commissioners at Paris, to liquidate and audit the claims of American citizens against the French Government, being for debts due them, and for the satisfaction of which provision was made by the convention between the United States and France, April 13th, 1803.

Mr. Clayton said that this report was made in answer to a resolution submitted by him some time ago. He desired to call attention to the document, because it completely reported the ground upon which the President based his veto of the French Spoliation bill. The veto rested on the assumed basis that the claims for spoliations were all examined and allowed under the treaty of 1803, but this document discloses the fact that, so far from this, they were excluded for the reason that the Commissioners have nothing to do with them.

He alluded to the fact that several years since, he examined the subject which it was before the Senate, being a member of the select committee, of which Daniel Webster was chairman, Mr. Webster took no part in the matter, and Mr. Clayton being second on the committee, investigated the subject and reported a bill, which, contrary to the expectations of many of its friends, passed both houses by decided majorities, but unfortunately encountered the veto of President Polk. Afterwards another bill similar to that was passed by Congress and vetoed by President Pierce, but the latter veto was not based upon the same reasons as the former, and any Senator who will take the pains to examine the documents now before the Senate, will see that the whole foundation of Pierce's veto was an error.

He added that his sympathies were strongly in favor of these claimants, and he hoped some measure would be adopted by which justice may be done.

House.—Mr. Campbell, of Ohio, asked leave to offer a resolution changing the daily hour for the meeting of the House from 12 to 11 o'clock.

Mr. Jones, of Tenn., objected, unless the time for the third adjournment be first fixed.

Mr. Giddings.—No bargains.

Mr. Houston moved to take up the Senate's adjournment resolutions.

Mr. Matteson and others objected.

The reading of the report of the Kansas Investigating Committee was resumed.

"Life," says the graphic Neal "is like a field of blackberry-bushes—mean people stoop and pick the fruit, no matter how much they may blacken their fingers; but genius, proud and perpendicular, stalks on and gets nothing but scratches and holes torn in his trowsers."

Aunt Mary, whilst going along the street the other day, saw over the tailor's door a sign bearing the inscription, "Fountain of Pantaloons." "Ah!" exclaimed she, "that must be the place where squirts come from," at the same time casting a malignant squint at a couple of young men with imbidden whiskers and standing collars. A woman of great perception is our Aunt Mary.

Not long ago an Englishman observed a stone roll down a staircase. It bumped on every stair until it came to the bottom; there, of course, it rested. "That stone," said he, "resembles the national debt of my country; it has bumped on every grade of the community, but its weight rests on the lowest."

A diffident lover going to the town clerk to request him to publish the banns of matrimony, found him at work alone in the middle of a ten acre field, and asking him to step aside as he had something for his private ear.

FOUR DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

ARRIVAL OF THE BALTIC.

NEW YORK, July 6th. The United States mail steamship Baltic, from Liverpool on the afternoon of the 25th. The Cunard steamer Atlantic arrived out at Liverpool on the 22d.

Commercial Intelligence.

COTTON.—The last advices from the United States had a favorable effect, though the market is unchanged. (A portion of the despatch unintelligible.)

Consols are quoted at 94⅞ to 94¾.

Orleans Middling 6 3-16; Upland Middling 6 1-16.

Flour is 6d. higher, with an improved demand. Corn is dull with a downward tendency. Provisions are generally unchanged, and the market is dull.

General News.

The London papers say that judging from the tone of the provincial press, the country is delighted with the turn the American question has taken, and are surprised to see how much the country has been enlightened on the subject by this portion of the press, it having devoted itself to the national exposition of the American difficulties.

The country appears pleased with Buchanan's nomination.

Our Liverpool correspondent says that all feeling in regard to American affairs have subsided, and they no longer have any influence on the markets.

The Czar has constructed a new cabinet, including Gortschakoff, Lansken, Osten Sabken and Orloff.

River Intelligence.

LOUISVILLE, July 7.—The river is at a stand, with four feet in in the canal.

Domestic Markets.

NEW YORK, July 7.—Flour has advanced. State is quoted at $5 40 to $5 65; Ohio, $6 60 to $6 85. Mess Pork, $20 12½. Lard in barrels, 12½c. Whisky, 31c.

CINCINNATI, July 7.—Flour—The market is dull, and prices are unchanged. Mess Pork, $18. Whisky, 27c.

From yesterday's Evening Picayune we copy the following:

River Intelligence—The Ohio Falling.

LOUISVILLE, July 8.—The river at this point has fallen two inches since yesterday noon, and is still falling, with three feet ten inches in the canal.

Manchester Trade.

NEW YORK, July 8.—Trade at Manchester and generally in the manufacturing district, is reported to have evinced more activity than prevailed at last accounts.

Money and Consols.

The demand for money in the London market is stated to have fallen off, and rates were consequently easier.

Consols are reported at an advance of ¼ per cent. since last advances, the quotations at the close on Wednesday, the 25th ult., being given as 94¾.

GENERAL NEWS.

The Jewish Disabilities.

The British Parliament had re-assembled.

In the House of Lords, the bill which had passed the House of Commons, amending the oath required to be taken by members before being admitted to their seats, so as to allow of its being taken by Jews, had been rejected by a majority of 32.

Great Britain and the United States.

There had been no further discussion in Parliament with respect to the state of affairs between Great Britain and the United States, and even with the press it had ceased to be an exciting and prominent topic.

The Daily News asserts on what it represents as perfectly reliable authority, that the only increase being made in the British naval forces on the North American and West Indian stations, was at Greytown, whither a competent squadron had been ordered to proceed. The other vessels which were leaving for the stations mentioned, it adds, are simply intended to replace those returning home multi for service. In addition to this, it says the most stringent instructions have been given to the British admirals and other officers of the fleets, to be careful to avoid everything in the least degree calculated to provoke a collision.

Allied Troops in Constantinople.

It is stated that 60,000 French troops, and 10,000 British troops are to remain in Constantinople for the present.

Russia.

A new cabinet has been formed in Russia.

Shipwreck.

The Baltic brings intelligence of the total wreck of the American ship Unicorn.

FROM WASHINGTON.

Mr. Herbert in Jail

Mr. Herbert, member of Congress of California, against whom the grand jury have found a true bill on the charge of having murdered Keating, is now in jail, and is to be tried on the indictment on Wednesday next.

Spain and Mexico.

Spain has agreed to accept the mediation of France, for the settlement of her difficulties with Mexico.

Departure of the Atlantic.

The Collins steamship Atlantic, Capt. West, which left yesterday with the mails and a full complement of passengers for Liverpool, took $1,000,000 in specie on freight.

Central America.

Intelligence has been received here to the effect that the feeling against Walker is increasing very much, and that between the several adjacent States an invasion of Nicaragua will shortly be made with forces 9,000 strong.

Congressional.

WASHINGTON, July 3.—Senate.—In the Senate today the Kansas bill as reported by the Committee on Territories, was passed after a session of twenty-two hours. It is believed here that the House will kill the bill.

House.—The House has passed the bill admitting Kansas as a State with the Topeka constitution, by a majority of three. [Mobile Tribune.

Later from Texas.

By the arrival of the steamship Louisiana on Saturday morning, we have Galveston papers to the 3d inst., and dates as late as due from all parts of the interior of the State.

The friends of Mr. Fillmore, in Galveston, fired a salute of fifty guns on the 28th ult., in honor of his arrival in the United States.

The Houston Telegraph says that about seventeen miles of the Red River Railroad have been completed, and the laying of the iron is progressing.

The Austin State Times, of the 28th ult., says:

During the week, we have been favored by several showers. They have benefited very much, though the effects of the drought are still being experienced, and if heavier rains do not fall soon, the crops in these regions will be very short. The bad winter, followed by locusts and a drought, render this a rather memorable year in Western Texas.

The Brenham Enquirer, of the 26th ult., reports several showers of rain in that quarter during the past week.

The Gonzales Inquirer, of the 28th ult., says:

A delightful rain—the first in several weeks—fell in this place last Sunday. Of course vegetation of every kind has been considerably revived, and our farmers, as well as the rest of us, highly delighted. As far as we can learn, the rains have been quite general, very heavy in some portions, but rather light in others. Of the river particularly, it has rained harder than on the hills; but as the prospects are still favorable, all portions will no doubt receive an abundant supply. As it is, we believe we can safely say that it has rained enough to insure the corn crops.

Last week two Mormon preachers regaled our citizens with a couple of discourses on some of the doctrines of Mormonism. Good congregations were present both nights, but whether they succeeded in making any converts or not, we are unable to say.

In relation to the Orange county troubles a correspondent of the Galveston Civilian writes:

The war and rumors of war are just hushed. Fifteen or twenty rascals have suddenly emigrated without resistance.

The San Antonio Herald, of the 28th says:

A rumor reached here that four men, three Americans and one Mexican, went to Guerrero, in Mexico, and robbed the Church at that place. Being chased from that side of the river they came to this side, and commenced their depredations. The Rifles got after them, shot two, hung another, and got their plunder. A fellow named Hines, the same who was engaged in burning the Adjutant General's office, is said to have been one of the party. He made his escape.

The San Antonio Texan, of the 26th ult., reports that the party of citizens who went in pursuit of the Indians who had been committing depredations near the Sabinal, overtook and had a fight with them, and came off victorious, killing and wounding a number of them.

The Dallas Herald states that the experiment is going to be tested the ensuing year of furnishing the United States troops stationed in the State with flour, bacon and pork, grown and manufactured in the county. The supply of flour, about 2500 bbls, the Herald says, can be obtained from that quarter.

THE STANDING ARMIES IN EUROPE.—A late European statistical writer estimates the standing armies of the different States of that continent at the close of the last year as follows:

Great Britain	250,000	Sardinia	70,000
France	700,000	Holland	60,000
Russia	1,200,000	Belgium	65,000
Austria	650,000	Sweden, Norway	170,000
Prussia	630,000	Denmark	70,000
Turkey	500,000	Naples	10,000
German Confederation	250,000	Greece	10,000
Total			4,855,000

THE FOURTH.

The celebration of the Glorious Fourth passed off joyously and harmoniously—not an untoward incident of a public character, that we heard of, tarnished the lustre of the day; that is to say, so far as things lay in human control. There was, however, an elemental demonstration in honor of the day, which rather broke in upon the terrestrial merry-makings, and for a time gave things an untoward aspect. But afterwards, when the floods were crossed and damp habiliments doffed, the storm and its thousand incidents were food for general yaro-spinning and merriment, and in the end the thing appeared to be a very agreeable addition to the pleasurable excitements of the day.

The morning was ushered in with the usual firing of salutes, hoisting of banting, and military bustle—not to mention the aggregation of the feminine and juvenile branches of the population about street corners and in windows, and upon balconies, or of the masculine branch in the convivial precincts of St. Charles and St. Louis streets. Health-drinking and hob-nobbing became very general, at an early hour.

The first military company out was Company C of the National Guard, who, with elate faces and brisk tread, marched to the Pontchartrain depot, to the music of Jordan's inimitable band—their destination being the steamer Creole and Pass Christian. In due time the portly and elegant Continentals trundled the streets, and then returned to their armory and dispersed to mingle in the conviviallties of the day. The Washington Artillerists, too, marched through the principal streets with their usual perfection of drill, and then took the cars for the Greenville Grove. Company G, of the National Guards, which embraces the flower of the youth of the Old Third, had an independent parade, after which they went down and joined the ladies in the pic-nic at the Macarthy plantation. The Louisiana Legion, under Gen. Palfrey, also paraded during the forenoon. Creole Fire Company No. 9 turned out in full strength, and left on an excursion to Madisonville. What other excursions and processions there may have been, we cannot tell, as New Orleans is a wide-spread city and we are not ubiquitous.

After the glorious "mise and confusion" of the forenoon had subsided, public attention became divided between the target shooting and the pic-nic of the Washington Artillerists at Greenville, the ladies Temperance pic-nic at the Macarthy Plantation, and the Methodist Sunday School celebration in the Rev. Mr. Ivy's church, in the Third District.

The Artillerists had just such a time as any one acquainted with them would have anticipated. Arrived beneath the shades of the Greenville Oaks, they were dismissed and went into individual competition at target-shooting for the four prizes that awaited claimants. The result was that Sergeant Tarleton won the first prize which was choice between the gold medal of the Company, and a handsome silver cup. He chose the latter, explaining the reason of his choice in a handsome manner. Corporal Bruce won the second prize, the gold medal; Private Leary won the third prize, and Private Parks won the fourth prize. The Company then presented Mr. Kelley, their armorer, with a handsome gold watch; Sergeant Tarleton being selected to perform the graceful act. Meantime the grove had become enlivened by visitors of less martial, though more killing presence, and the galeties of the pic-nic silenced the twitter of the feathered songsters overhead. To the music of a fine brass band, soldiers, civilians, ladies and children mingled and whirled in a good old fashioned Fourth of July country dance, and all went merry as a round dozen, at least, of marriage bells. At the proper time came the "spread," and divers and sundry good things filled their destiny; then toasts, patriotic and gallant were drank with due honors, and glowing responses made. After this, the dance, the promenade, and the tete-a-tete resumed their sway and the grove had altogether a parodisical appearance.

The pic-nic at the Macarthy Plantation was a scene of unalloyed enjoyment. A rustic salle de danse was made of planks laid on the ground, in the shade of the tall trees, with benches and tables scattered about, swings hanging to the boughs, and large crocks of ice-cold lemonade stationed around in different places. The temperance ladies who got up the pic-nic displayed a great deal of taste in the matter. Company G, of the National Guards, upon arriving, pitched their tents in the field back of the grove, and dispersed themselves amid the gaieties of the occasion. A good band of music being on hand, dancing was of course the paramount sport. The planks, being unshaven and loose-laid, one might have thought, would have been a sore test to heels and toes accustomed to the polished floors of our city saloons; but the manner in which the sprightly lads and sylph-like lasses of the Old Third got over them was of once marvellous and charming. There were dancers there, we are sure, that could execute a polka mazourka or a redowa waltz on a pile of rails, with as much grace and correctness as a good many folks show on a polished floor. The tables, from time to time, were supplied with edibles, substantial, dainty and abundant; and the afternoon passed off right merrily between the pleasures of the table, the dance, the swing and the promenade.

The Methodist Church at the corner of Moreau and Enghien was, during the greater part of the day, a scene of blended piety and patriotism that no one could look upon without emotions of pleasure. The children of the Sabbath School were there in full force and in holiday attire, and entertained the large assemblage of spectators with a series of songs and addresses appropriate to the occasion. After they had concluded, the teachers and the "pillars of the church" had a reunion, which in its way was gratifying to all concerned.

During the day, the heat was somewhat tempered by a hazy pall of clouds, which everybody considered propitious. Towards evening the breeze stiffened. The Northern horizon assumed a deep indigo hue, and low mutterings of thunder occasionally reached the ear. It was just at that witching time of day, when the pic-nickers were at the height of their festivity, the stay-at homes mixed around at each other's homes, and indefinite crowds wended lakeward for the pleasures of the bath and the fish dinner. Nobody thought there was going to be much of a storm, if any; and therefore nobody took much pains to meet it, or rather avoid it. The result was a most blinding, deafening, and superlatively hydropathic illustration of human shortsightedness. The preliminary sprinkle was short—it only served to get frolickers on the move, when the storm was at their heels. In the city, people were only subjected to the inconvenience of staying in doors an hour or two longer than was desirable; at the lake, ample shelter was furnished by the houses of entertainment and the railroad cars.

The particularly unfortunate moiety of the population were the pic-nickers. At the Greenville Grove there was a regular stampede for shelter, and the car-house was crammed with as many ladies and children as could get into it; others, less fortunate, had to remain outside and share an indefinite quantity of cold duck with the gentlemen. 'Twas pitiful to see the parasols lose their lustre, the little bonnets their sauciness, the little slippers their enchantment, and the gay flounces their vivacity—all wilting and drooping like flowers in a December blast; but there was no help for it. In due time the cars came along, and brought the jaley but hilarious crowd to the city. At the Macarthy Plantation, nobody would have been ducked, but for the foolish reliance that was placed in the tents and awnings, and in the leaky old shanty in which the edibles of the day were stowed. A good part of the crowd took time by the forelock, and left to secure shelter in the vicinity. Those who remained soon found toddling beneath the awnings and the paddling of the water around their feet any thing but a dry business; and some of them got wofully drenched. The National Guards retreated to their tents, but tents did not save them. The field became a lake—they had to pull up stakes and travel, and they marched up town during the most terrific part of the storm, their band of music contending bravely but feebly against the deafening roar of the upper artillery. There were a great many other interesting and semi-zoological scenes about town, consequent upon the suddenness and fierceness of the storm, and over flow of the streets.

The storm, we may mention, was one of the severest that has visited the city for years, and more heavily charged with electricity than any we can remember. Peal after peal of thunder shook the city, keeping up an unbroken roar; the sky looked like a sky of fire shaking its million sparks downward instead of upward, and many people closed their shutters in very fear of the sight. Considering the number of the electric bolts that struck the earth, we consider it extremely fortunate that we are called upon to record only one death thereby. A carriage driver named John Burke was struck and killed whilst sitting in his carriage in front of the Lafayette cemetery, and his horses ran off with his corp

The Jewels of God.

BY OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES.

If man's duty to set them that they may shine
On the mind.

When the earth has run its largest round
Of sin and triumph, joy and woe,
And all its outward show!

[illegible] tried under tires and drooms,
Its day is dust, its keel forgot:
Its farthest voyages mean but loops
That float from life's entangled knot.

And when within the narrow space
Of [illegible] soul hath lived and wrought,
Lies [illegible] open to embrace
The [illegible] realms of deed and thought.

When stricken by the freezing blast,
A nation's living pillars fall,
Where truth's adored page, how vast
A [illegible] can recall!

He raised for its festival face,
He speaking marble cheats your eye,
Yet, while these pictured lines I trace,
A living image passes by.

A reef beneath the mountain glass;
The closure of a hill-girt plain;
Thus fruit of life's [illegible] lines;
A second beside the moving main.

These are the scenes, a boy appears;
Set life's round dial in the sun,
Count the swift [illegible] of seven years,
His [illegible] is done.

Beyond the mountain's [illegible] brow,
Its bleaching rays no mainspell's power,
A sun took upon the mighty shade.

[illegible] hide,
[illegible]

[illegible] a shattering strife,
Back from the strife that made it free;
[illegible] its banners dip
[illegible] in the western sea.

[illegible] prairies learned his name,
[illegible] the mountain echoes knew;
[illegible] breezes swept his fame
[illegible] to warm bayou.

He lived—in peace he died—
His life's full circle now complete,
Part of his share of power and pride,
And laid them at his Maker's feet.

His rest is by the storm-swept waves,
Where life's wild tempests roughly tried,
Whose heart was like the streaming caves
Of ocean throbbing at its side.

Death's cold white hand, is like the snow,
Laid softly on the furrowed hill,
It hides the broken seams below,
And leaves its glories brighter still.

In vain the envious tongue upbraids;
His name a nation's heart shall keep,
Till morning's latest sunlight fades
On the blue tablet of the deep.

[illegible] the sudden in circles so gay
[illegible] and flee, in her ringlets they cling,
While glancing and gleaming they tearfully sing
O'er the silence their musical lay.

[illegible] our tender names, thou'st cruelly torn [illegible] our life-giving tie.
And [illegible] the warm glowing breath of the morn
[illegible] to see us lie as we lie so forlorn,
We shall wither, fade, wither and die.

[illegible] happy were we, in our innocent glee,
[illegible] claiming our fairy-like bells,
[illegible] many blooms opened joyous and free
[illegible] of the sun or the song of the bee,
[illegible] ruled our beautiful cells.

Beginnings of the National Debt of Great Britain.

The following is an extract from one of Macaulay's new volumes of the History of England:

It was about the year 1685 that the word stock-jobber was first heard in London. In the short space of four years a crowd of companies, every one of which confidently held out to subscriber the hope of immense gains, sprang into existence; the Insurance Company, the Paper Company, the Lutestrina Company, the Pearl Fishery Company, the Glass Bottle Company, the Alum Company, the Blyte Coal Company, the Sword-blade Company. There was a Tapestry Company, which would soon furnish pretty hangings for all the parlors of the middle class, and for all the bed chambers of the higher. There was a Copper Company, which proposed to explore the mines of England, and held out a hope that they would not prove not less profitable than those of Potosi. There was a Diving Company undertook to bring up precious effects from shipwrecked vessels, and announced it had laid in a stock of wonderful machines resembling complete suits of armor. In front of the helmet was a huge glass eye, like that of cyclop; and out of the crest went a pipe through which the air was to be admitted.

The whole process was exhibited on the Thames. Fine gentlemen and fine ladies were invited to the show, were hospitably regaled, and were delighted by seeing the divers in their panoply descend into the river, and return laden with old iron and ship's tackle. There was a Greenland Fishing Company, which could not fail to drive the Dutch whalers and herring busses out of the Northern ocean. There was a Tanning Company, which promised to furnish leather superior to the best that was brought from Turkey or Russia. There was a society which undertook the office of giving gentlemen a liberal education on low terms, and which assumed the sounding name of the Royal Academies Company. In a pompous advertisement, it was announced that the directors of the Royal Academies Company had engaged the best masters in every branch of knowledge, and were about to issue twenty thousand tickets at twenty shillings each.

There was to be a lottery; two thousand prizes were to be drawn; and the fortunate holders of the prizes were to be taught, at the charge of the Company, Latin, Greek, Hebrew, French, Spanish, conic sections, trigonometry, heraldry, japanning, fortification, book-keeping, and the art of playing on the theorobo. Some of these companies took large mansions, and printed their advertisements in gilded letters. Others, less ostentatious, were content with ink, and met at coffee-houses in the neighborhood of Royal Exchange. Jonathan's and Garraway's were in a constant ferment with brokers, buyers, sellers, meetings of directors, meetings of proprietors. Time bargains soon came into fashion. Extensive combinations were formed and monstrous fables were circulated for the purpose of raising or depressing the price of shares.

Our country witnessed for the first time those phenomena with which a long experience has made us familiar. A mania, of which the symptoms were essentially the same with those of the mania of 1720, of the mania of 1825, of the mania of 1845, seized the public mind. An impatience to be rich, a contempt for those slow but sure gains which are the proper reward of industry, patience and thrift, spread through society. The spirit of the cogging dicers of Whitefriars took possession of the grave senators of the city, wardens of trades, deputies, aldermen. It was much easier and much more lucrative to put forth a lying prospectus announcing a new stock, to persuade ignorant people that the dividends could not fall short of twenty per cent., and to part with five thousand pounds of this imaginary wealth for ten thousand solid guineas, than to load a ship with a well chosen cargo for Virginia or the Levant. Every day some new bubble was puffed into existence, rose buoyant, shone bright, burst, and was forgotten.

The new form which covetousness had taken furnished the comic poets and satirists with an excellent subject; nor was that subject less welcome to them because some of the most unscrupulous and most successful of the new race of gamesters were men in sad colored clothes and lank hair, men who called cards the Devil's books, men who thought it a sin and a scandal to win or lose two pence over a backgammon board. It was in the last drama of Shadwell that the hypocrisy and knavery of these speculators was, for the first time, exposed to public ridicule. He died in November, 1692, just before the stock-jobbers came on the stage, and the epilogue was spoken by an actor dressed in deep mourning. The best scene is that in which four or five stern Nonconformists, clad in full Puritan costume, after discussing the prospects of the Mousetrap Company and the Pleakilling Company, examine the question whether the godly may lawfully hold stock in a company for bringing over Chinese rope dancers. "Considerable men have shares," say one austere person in cropped hair and bands, "but verily I question whether it be lawful or not."

These doubts are removed by a stout old roundhead Colonel who had fought at Marston Moor, and who reminds his weaker brother that the saints need not themselves see the rope dancing, and that in all probability there will be no rope dancing to see. "The thing," he says, "is like to take; the shares will sell well, and then we shall not care whether the dancers come over or no." It is important to observe that this scene was exhibited and applauded before one farthing of the national debt had been contracted. So ill-informed were the numerous writers who at a later period, ascribed to the national debt the existence of stock-jobbing, and of all the immoralities connected with stock-jobbing. The truth is, that society had in the natural course of its growth reached a point at which it was inevitable that there should be stock-jobbing, whether there were a national debt or not, and inevitable, also, that if there were a long and costly war, there should be a national debt.

A Scene at the Church of the Epiphany.—The Slavery Question in the Pulpit.—Notwithstanding the extreme heat of the weather, a large congregation assembled last night, at the Protestant Episcopal Church of the Epiphany, at the corner of Chestnut and Fifteenth streets, attracted thither by an advertisement in the papers of Saturday, that the Rector, Rev. Dudley A. Tyng, would discourse on the subject of "Our Country's Troubles." The announcement created more sensation than usual from the fact that the Episcopal denomination, as a body, have always discountenanced the introduction of such topics into the pulpit, as well as from the circumstances that the Rector, since his connection with his parish, has generally preserved silence on questions having the most remote allusion to public affairs. The minister having selected an appropriate text, briefly gave his reasons for introducing the subject into the pulpit, and then proceeded to denounce in an eloquent strain and straight forward manner, the outrages in Kansas and at Washington, the aggressions of the slave power, the miserable truckling of the North to the South, the horrors of slave-breeding, and concluded by urging his congregation to exercise their rights as freemen at the ballot-box, in staying the progress of the monster evil, and invoking aid for the suffering emigrants in Kansas. The sermon was listened to with breathless attention, and without interruption until the speaker spoke of slave breeding, rearing immortal souls (who were made for heaven,) for bondage, when Dr. Casper Morris, formerly a church-warden, rose from his pew, and, as one of the original church-wardens, entered his solemn protest against the desecration of the place and the day by such services. The preacher continued his discourse without noticing the interruption, and at the conclusion of his sermon respectfully suggested to the gentleman who had interposed his objections, to point out the wrong which he had committed in using the Sabbath as the time, and an Episcopal pulpit as the place, for the utterance of anti-slavery sentiments.

Mr. Tyng suggested, too, that it would have been as well to have waited until he had concluded his remarks before interposing any objection to them. If he (Mr. T.) was wrong, he was open to correction, but he would, as a minister of Jesus Christ, express his views of the great exciting topic of the day. Mr. Tyng was perfectly calm throughout the unusual scene, and he appeared to be entirely unmoved during the decided sensation incident to the interruption of Dr. Morris. We should state that at the commencement of the remarks of Mr. Tyng several members of the congregation left the church.

After the sermon was finished, the members of the congregation gathered in knots to discuss the unusual event, while many of them congratulated the minister upon the decided stand he had taken. We understand that the matter will be referred to the Bishop of the Diocese.

It is said that George IV. would not hesitate to resort to an out-and-out lie to relieve himself from an embarrassing position. O'Connell declared that it was his belief "that there never was a greater scoundrel than George IV.," and related an occurrance that took place when the Prince, Mrs. Fitzherbert, and Charles James Fox, were dining together:—

"After dinner Mrs. Fitzherbert said, 'By the by Mr. Fox, I had almost forgotten to ask you what you did say about me in the House of Commons the other night? The newspapers misrepresent so very strangely that one cannot depend upon them. You were made to say that the Prince authorized you to deny his marriage with me.' The Prince made monitory grimaces at Fox, and immediately said, 'Upon my honor, my dear, I never authorized him to deny it.' 'Upon my honor, sir, you did,' said Fox, rising from the table; 'I had always thought your father the greatest liar in England, but now I see that you are. Fox would not associate with the Prince for some years, until one day he walked in unannounced, and found Fox at dinner. Fox rose as the Prince entered, and said that he had one course to pursue, consistent with his hospitable duty as an English gentleman, and that was to admit him."

Florida Indian War.—The Tampa Peninsular Extra, of June 18th, has the following intelligence:

Information reached this place on last Monday morning, to the purport that Alderman Carlton, William Parker, and James Whidden, were killed by Indians on Thursday the 12th inst., within two miles of Fort Meade. No details have reached us. Firing was heard from the above Fort during the while night, at Mr. Tillis' house, and it is supposed that it was attacked, and that he was bravely defending himself.

No official report has been made, yet circumstances assure us of the truth of this statement.

The Origin of Lithography.

At Munich, in the year 1795, a new comedy was acted one night at the principal theater. The part of one of the characters, whose duty it was to keep the audience in a perpetual roar of laughter, was sustained by a young man, whose mournful actions and spiritless gestures were strangely at variance with the drolleries he uttered. He seemed to be about seventeen years old, his figure was tall and slender, his countenance pale, and his large blue eyes wore an expression of profound melancholy. The piece was unmercifully hissed; and as soon as it was over, one of the attendants made his appearance.

"Mr. Aloise Senefelder," said he, "the manager wishes to speak to you immediately."

"Tell him I am coming," replied the young man; and hastily finishing his toilet, he repaired to the manager's room.

"Mr. Senefelder," said the man in authority, "do you know that I am the author of the play acted to-night?"

"Yes, sir," said Aloise timidly.

"Do you know the piece is condemned?"

"Sir," said Aloise, "I did my best—"

"To make it fall, and you have succeeded," said the incensed author. "From this moment you are no longer one of my company. Here is what I owe you, take it, sir, and withdraw."

Astonished at these words, Aloise stood like a statue. He seemed without power to take the money or to move. At length, the book-keeper, who was present, took the few coins and placed them in his hand; and the cold contact of the silver, recalling him to recollection, he clasped his fingers convulsively together, and falling on his knees, burst into tears.

"Ah! don't send me away! don't send me away!" he cried.

"I want an actor, not a mourner," said the manager author, in whose ears the hisses were yet ringing. "In place of laughing you weep."

"Sir, my father died two days ago, and is not yet buried, for want of a coffin to contain his dear remains. My mother and my five little brothers and sisters have only me to depend on. Try me, then, Mr. Sparman—try me once more, I beseech you."

"Sorry I can't grant your request," said the manager, taking up his hat and moving towards the door. As he passed Aloise, on whose pale face the burning tears seemed frozen by despair, the feeling of the man partly conquered those of the author.

"Double the salary and pay the father's funeral, Mr. Fitz," he said to the box-keeper, and then went out.

Fitz took a few crowns from the drawer, placed them in the hands of Aloise, helped him to rise, and then, giving him his arm, assisted him out of the theater.

Kindly supporting the poor boy's tottering steps, the box-keeper led him to an undertaker's shop, and gave orders for an humble coffin. Then seeing him able to walk to his mother's lodging, Fitz took leave of him and returned to the theater.

The widow Senefelder inhabited a miserable apartment in an obscure part of the city. Want and misery were stamped on the innocent faces of the five little ones, who surrounded her, and who, with one accord rushed towards Aloise as he entered.

The eldest, a pretty girl about ten years old, drew them back, and putting her lips close to her brother's ears, whispered:

"Have you brought any supper, Aloise?"

"Here," said he, giving her the silver he had.

"So much as that?" said the sister; "they must be much pleased, to give you so many crowns."

"So much pleased, Marianne, that they have dismissed me."

"Then you are no longer an actor," said one of the little boys. So much the better. It is an ungodly profession, our curate says."

"Yes," rejoined another child, "but how shall we get money to buy bread, if Aloise does nothing?"

"Hush, hush," said Marianne: don't let your dear mamma hear bad news to-night. We shall pray to God, who has taken papa to himself, and perhaps he will send us some consolation."

Aloise was silent. He watched all night by his father's corpse, and the next morning followed it to the grave. Instead of returning home he wandered idly through the streets, pursued by the still recurring question, "What can I do?" Night approached; he thought of returning to his mother, recollecting how uneasy his absence would make her; but when he looked around he knew not where he was. In absence of mind he had wandered far into the country, and the rushing of a river struck his ear. He approached its bank, and overcome by fatigue and hunger, sank down upon the soft grass. For some time he watched the flowing water, till a dreadful idea entered his poor and harrassed brain.

"Beneath that quiet wave," he thought, "all my woes would soon be ended. I am no longer good for any thing. I am only a burden to my mother, giving her another mouth to feed. I will therefore die, and then all will be over!"

Aloise had been educated in sentiments of christian piety, and now, like a ray of light from Heaven, the thought struck him that he was meditating a fearful crime. He shuddered, and kneeling down prayed fervently to God for pardon.

While on his knees, his ideas became gradually confused, the water ceased to flow and the stars to shine. Aloise slept.

When he opened his eyes it was daylight. The scene around was guilded by the rising sun. He heard the pleasant singing of the birds, and his heart expanded with joy. He was still among the living—he had not accomplished his wicked resolution; and falling again on his knees, he thanked God for his mercy. Notwithstanding his bodily weakness, he felt refreshed, and sat for a few moments on the grass to collect his thoughts ere he set out on his return to the city.

While thus resting, his eyes fell on a smooth white chalk-stone, on which was traced the delicate semblance of a sprig of moss, with all its minute flowers and tender fibres. He remembered that the evening before his tears had fallen on this stone, and moistened the sprig of moss, which had probably fallen on it from the beak of some wandering bird. No, the moss was not there, the wind having blown it away, but its impress remained so exquisitely traced on the smooth white surface of the stone, that the young German could not help being struck with the phenomenon.

"This means something," thought he. "I may have been led in mercy to this spot. I am a bad actor, a bad singer, but who knows? I may be reserved for something better."

Taking the stone in his hand, Aloise rose up and turned his steps homewards.

At the gate of the city he met his little brother, whom his mother had sent to seek him. The child told him that an old uncle of their mother had come to see her the morning of the burial, and had given her a sum of money to relieve her wants.

"My God! I thank thee," said young Senefelder, mentally. He did not then know that the stone which he held in his hand would cause in a few days greater emotions of thankfulness.

At first he only employed his discovery in ornamenting the covers of baskets, snuff-boxes, etc., but one day it occurred to him to take off on wet paper the picture drawn on stone. The experiment succeeded, and lithography was discovered.

In time, Aloise brought the art to perfection. He studied chemistry for the purpose, and rich and happily were his prosperous family around him. He felt that he never could be sufficiently thankful for having outlived his design of self-destruction.

"Why should we ever despair?" he would say. "God can turn our pain into pleasure and our bitterness into joy."

Expense of Royalty.—The royal family of Great Britain costs the country nearly eight hundred thousand poands, or about four millions of dollars a year. Prince Albert alone receives annually about two hundred thousand dollars, although he renders the kingdom no other service than to give it an heir to the throne. The Queen's coachmen, postillions and footmen, receive as much, within about thirty thousand dollars, as is paid to all the executive officers of the United States Government."

Queen Victoria's milk bill alone is seven thousand dollars per annum; and what in this country would be called her "liquor bill" amounts to the handsome annual sum of fifty thousand dollars—equal to two years' salary of our President. The stones aloue in the crown worn by the Queen on opening the sessions of Parliament, have cost the people about five millions of dollars; while the aggregate salaries of our President and his Cabinet amount to but about one hundred thousand dollars per annum. These are mere items of public money received by a few individuals. Add to these the enormous sums necessary to keep up the civil, military and naval establishments, and ten million annually paid to public pensioners, and the frightful expense of the established church, and we cease to wonder at the rate of taxation to which the British public is compelled to submit. The following table shows the relative taxation imposed on the people of six different nations; per capita, for every man, woman and child, viz:

England	2	12	6
France	1	4	0
Prussia	0	12	0
Austria	0	11	4
Russia	0	9	9
United States	0	9	9

From this it will be seen that British taxation is the highest, and that of the United States the lowest, in the countries named—the former five and one-half times greater than the latter.

When Peter the Great was sojourning in London, he visited Westminster Hall during term time, when the court was crowded with lawyers in their wigs and gowns. Peter enquired "who those persons could possibly be?" Being informed that they were all members of the legal profession, he exclaimed: "Lawyers! why I have only two in all my dominions, and I believe I shall hang one of them when I get back."

Machine for Pegging Boots and Shoes.—A new machine for this purpose has been brought forward. The boot is placed on one part of the machine, and a stick of wood on another, motion being given, one portion of the mechanism operates to prick the holes with an awl; another to make the pegs; another to feed the pegs to the mouth of the holes, and another to drive the pegs home. These various operations are performed with great rapidity, about two minutes only being required to double peg each boot.

How to Catch a Thief.

The father of the great American statesman was a very humorous and jocose personage, and innumerable are the anecdotes that are related of him. As he was once journeying in Massachusetts, not far from his native town, he stopped rather late one night at an inn in the village of ——. In the bar-room were about twenty different persons, who, as he entered, called out for him to discover a thief. One of the company, it appeared, had, a few moments before, a watch taken from his pocket, and he knew the offender must be in the room with them.

"Come, Mr. Almanac-maker, you know the signs of the times, tho hidden things of the seasons, tell who is the thief."

"Fasten all the doors of the room and let no one leave it; and here, landlord, go and bring your wife's best brass kettle."

"Whe-ew! want to know! my stars! my wife's—Whe-ew?" quoth Boniface.

"Why, you wouldn't be more stuck up if I told you to go to pot."

Boniface did as commanded; the great brass kettle was placed in the middle of the floor, its bottom up,—as black, sooty, and smoky as the chimney back. The landlord got into his bar, and looked on with eyes as big as saucers.

"You don't want any hot water or nothing, to take off the bristles on the critter, do you Squire?" said the landlord, the preparations looking a little too much like hog killing. "The old woman's gone to bed and the well's dry."

"Now, go into the barn and bring me the biggest cackler you've got."

"Whew! you won't hile him, will you? he's a tough one. I can swear, Squire, that he didn't steal the watch. The old rooster knows when its time to crew without looking at a watch."

"Go along, or I wont detect the thief."

Boniface went to the barn and soon returned with a tremendous fat rooster, cackling all the way like mad.

"Now, put him under the kettle and blow the light out."

The old rooster was thus under the inverted kettle and the lamp blown out.

"Now, gentlemen, I don't suppose the thief is in the company, but if he is, the old rooster will crow when the offender touches the bottom of the kettle with his hands. Walk around in a circle, and the fowl will make known the watch-stealer. The innocent need not be afraid you know."

The company then to humor him, and carry out the joke, walked around the kettle in the dark three or four times.

"All done, gentlemen?"

"All done!" was the cry; "where's your crowing? We heard no cocksdoodledoo."

"Bring us a light."

A light was brought as ordered.

"All up?"

"All up," was the answer.

"All—don't know; here is one fellow who has not held up his hand."

They were examined, and were not black like these of the rest of the company.

"You will find your watch about him—search."

And so it proved. The fellow, not being aware, any more than the rest, of the trap that had been set for the discovery of the thief, had kept aloof from the kettle, lest when he touched it, the rooster should proclaim him as the thief. As the hands of all the others were blackened, the witness of his own showed of course, that he had not dared to touch the old brass kettle, and that he was the offender. He jumped out of the frying pan into the fire, and was lodged in as uncomfortable a place as either, to-wit, the jail.

Super Heated Steam.—Super heated steam has some singular properties. While a chip held a quarter of an inch from the nozzle of a try-cock, would be forced away by the issuing steam, held within the eighth of an inch of the nozzle, it would be suddenly drawn to, and forcibly retained against the opening, as if by magnetism. The property of super heated steam to absorb water is also remarkable. A boiler of self-neting discharge for excessive steam, the machinery of which was heavily weighted, being neglected under brisk firing one day, got over-heated. When the discharge acted, it was through a nozzle turned downward into a pail of cold water; the steam shot into it did not, as would be supposed, blow the water about the engine room, but it converted every drop of it into steam, filling the whole building with a dense cloud of vapor.

MURDEROUS SCAVENGERS.

Shallow practitioners have asserted that intestinal worms are not injurious, in fact that they act the part of scavengers, removing foul and indigestible matter from the alimentary canal. What audacious humbug! What miserable philosophy! Every experienced physician knows that these animals cause inflammation of the bowels, and sometimes actually eat through the coating of the stomach and lower intestines, causing inevitable death. Of all the diseases of children this is the most dangerous and distressing. Unfortunately, too, it is one of the most common. In WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE, however, a safe, quick, unfailing remedy is provided. The proprietor challenges the world to show that it ever failed to effect a cure.

IMPROVED EAGLE COTTON-GINS.

Warranted to separate the Seeds, Dirt and Trash from the Cotton, without injury to the Staple.

DEPOT NO. 67 ST. CHARLES STREET,
Town Buildings, four doors from St. Charles Hotel, New Orleans.

The Proprietors of the EAGLE COTTON-GIN MANUFACTORY furnish Saw Cotton Gins of every description, adapted to every variety of cotton, and warranted superior in every respect, viz:

Power Gins, of from 25 to 80 or 100 Saws each, for horse, steam or water power—will turn out from two to ten bales per day of clean Cotton, of 450 pounds each.

Hand Gins, of from 10 to 20 Saws each, so constructed as to be driven by cranks upon the Saw-Cylinder shaft, or at a much greater speed by an extra driving pulley—will clean from 150 to 450 pounds per day.

These Cotton-Gins combine all the late improvements in machinery, and are warranted of the best materials and workmanship.

A Medal was awarded to the Manufacturers of the Eagle Cotton-Gin by a Jury of the Royal Commissioners connected with the Exhibition of the Works of All Nations, at London, in the year 1851, as will be seen by the subjoined copy of a letter received by them:

Executive Mansion, Washington,
January 31st, 1853.

To the Proprietors Eagle Cotton-Gin Co.

Gentlemen: I have the pleasure to inform you that a Jury of the Royal Commissioners connected with the Exhibition of the Works of all Nations, at London, in the year 1851, in consideration of your having exhibited a specimen of a Cotton-Gin, has awarded you the Exhibitor's Medal, Certificate, and a Copy of the Reports of the Juries.

These articles are in the possession of Col. Peter Force, of this city, Chairman of the American Executive Committee, and will be forwarded to you by such mode of conveyance as you shall suggest.

Very respectfully, your obedient Servant,
HILLARD FILLMORE,
Chairman of the Central Committee, U. S.

PETER FORCE,
Chairman of the Executive Committee.

A Prize of $1350, and a Gold Medal

Was awarded to the Eagle Cotton Gin Co., by the Agricultural and Horticultural Society of India, for a Gin-Stand for working the Cotton, as will be noticed by the following copy of a letter dated—

Agricultural and Horticultural Society of India,
Calcutta, September 3d, 1853.

Gentlemen—I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 14th July, 1851, advising the despatch of a Cotton-Gin to compete for the prize of Rupees 5000, offered by the Government of India in 1849, through the Agricultural and Horticultural Society of India.

In reply thereto, I have now the honor to enclose two Bank of England Post Bills, being the equivalent of the sum of Rupees, 2500, which has been granted to your machine.

I have further the pleasure to inform you that the Society has been pleased to award your its Gold Medal on the same account, and which will be forwarded you by another opportunity as soon as the inscription has been placed on it.

I am, Gentlemen, yours faithfully,
A. B. BLECHYNDEN
Secretary A. and H. Society of India.

A medal was also awarded them at the Crystal Palace, New York.

Some of the peculiarities of the Eagle Cotton-Gin are the following:

The "Detached Grates," exclusively used by us and patented, are so farmed that when set in the frame or breast, the top is entirely detached from the breast, as well as from the other grates; and when the Gin is in operation, the fibres of the cotton, which are partly separated from the roll by the saw-teeth, are permitted to pass up freely and without obstruction, and to clear themselves from the tops of the grates. The tendency to choke and clog, and the consequent increase of friction and injury to the staple, which attends the use of the other various forms of grates, is thereby avoided, and the ease with which the cotton is detached from the seed and carried through by the saw-teeth, is peculiar to this form of grate. They are chilled or hardened at the point where the saw-teeth pass, and the strictest attention is paid to their finish and setting.

The "Improved Brush" is also peculiar in its construction and mode of operation, the object of the inventor having been to combine the advantages of the Cylinder, or close, and the winged or open Brushes, and to avoid the objectionable features of each of these forms. The supply of air for the Gin-Stand (the regulation and control of which is one of the most important functions of the Brush) is admitted through openings in the Brush heads, and it is forced out, when the Brush is in motion, through long narrow slits or opening at the circumference of the Brush and between the rows of bristles. The several thin sheets or currents of air set alternately with the rows of bristles to detach the fibres of cotton from the saw-teeth to release portions, and, with the aid of the "Patent Motes," give to the cotton, when delivered into the lint-room, that peculiar combed or carded appearance so well known and so much desired by purchasers.

This Brush may be made to blow through a line of twenty or thirty feet in length, or may be used with a short line, as may be preferred. The varying eddies and counter currents of air which attend the use of the common open or winged Brushes are entirely avoided, and a uniform and steady draft, of any desired strength, may at all times be secured by varying the speed, the depths of the wings, or the area of the space through which the air is supplied.

The "Sliding Butts or Hinges," by which the Breast or Grate-Fall is attached to the frame of the Stand, were invented and applied to the Eagle Gin Stand, in order to adapt it more fully to the different views and wishes of planters, to the variety of cotton, and to the various states of the cotton of different pickings. A peculiar curve is given to the front surface of the grate, at the point where the saw-teeth pass, and the front of the saw-tooth may be made to assume any desired angle with this curved surface of the grate, at the pleasure of the planter, thus enabling him to adapt the machine to the different varieties of cotton, or to the different states of it, and to gin fast or slow at pleasure. This invention, although very simple, is believed by us to be one of the most useful ever attached to the Cotton-Gin; and, when properly understood and adjusted, it gives to the ginner almost perfect control over the product of the gin, determining, in a great measure both the quantity and quality of that product.

In making the saw-teeth, to ensure the greatest accuracy possible, an instrument invented especially for the purpose is made use of, called the "Dentometer," or tooth-measurer. By this instrument, the exact angle of every saw is measured when the tooth is cut; so that the various angles described above may always be determined with great precision, and the range of ginning angles may be varied to any desired extent.

Startling and Interesting Facts

CONCERNING

CHOLERA, DIARRHEA, DYSENTERY, COLIC, Summer Complaints, etc.

A fact that should startle is this: One feels a slight uneasiness in the bowels, a slight diarrhea comes out, which is little thought of; in a short time, in a few hours, perhaps, seldom days, it is attended with sickness of the stomach, a most sinking weakness, rapid discharges, coldness, cramps, nicotes, blackness, collapse, DEATH—and yet all this fatal result from a disregard of the warning, premonitory Diarrhea, and neglect of a wise provision of a safe and sure remedy that kind Providence has made easy to all.

This remedy is made public from the strongest desire to rescue the exposed, under the best substantial conviction that it is certain in its good effects, and with it on hand, no one heeding the warning and using the remedy, need be a victim to the Cholera.

DR. BILLINGS'

CARMINATIVE and ASTRINGENT SYRUP

IS THIS SURE REMEDY.

By the advice and urgent request of hundreds, whose lives have been saved—of many even when apparently in the very last struggles of death—he has been induced to make still more efforts to give it wider publicity to a remedy so greatly successful.

The perfection which he and others ascribe to this remedy may appear beyond the power of medicine to possess; yet the truthfulness of the claim is most thoroughly established, and will be fully confirmed by calling on the individuals who have witnessed its effects, and used it with complete success, some of whose names we are authorized to give.

For Cholera, Colic, Cholera Morbus, Dysentery, Diarrhea, Bloody Flux, Summer Complaint and Weakness of the Bowels, this medicine is offered as a certain remedy. This is the medicine that arrested that horrible disease so prevalent among the Mexican soldiers. The officers first commenced its use, after which they gave it their soldiers, and cured in every case without an exception. I would refer to the officers and others who served in the war with Mexico. Sold by MEN THAT ARE MEN!!!

Among the diseases this Pill has cured with astonishing rapidity, we may mention

Costiveness, Bilious Complaints, Rheumatism, Dropsy, Heartburn, Headache, arising from a foul stomach—Nausea—Indigestion, Morbid function of the Kidneys, and pain arising therefrom, Flatulency, Loss of Appetite, all Dicorous and Cutaneous Diseases, which require an evacuant Medicine, Scrofula or King's Evil. They also by purifying the blood and eliminating the system, cure many complaints which it would not be supposed they could reach; such as Deafness, Partial Blindness, Neuralgia and Nervous Irritability. Derangements of the Liver and Kidneys, Gout and other kindred complaints, arising from a low state of the body, or obstructions of the functions. They are the best Purgative Medicine ever discovered, and you will but need to try them once to know it.

Minnesota, its Climate and Productions—St. Paul, its appearance and Society—White Bear Lake and Fishing—Falls of St. Anthony and Cheevers Tower—Minnehaha, "the laughing water"—Fort Snelling.

Minnesota, which being interpreted is "sky-tinted water," is the first Territory I have visited. Everything goes on here just as in the States. The people are well-behaved and enterprising beyond most countries. The Territory was organized by act of Congress March 3, 1849. It is seven years old, and by the census is already entitled to the dignity of Statehood. This is decidedly West and North. The climate is healthful and invigorating to wasted constitutions, and the soil is black, deep and productive. The articles of culture are wheat, rye, oats, potatoes and every description of roots. Broad undulating prairies and what are called "burr oak openings," with ranges of hills covered with a sparse growth of stunted trees, make up the features of the landscape. It is the middle of June, and the thermometer stands at 92 deg. in the shade. Things have fairly begun to grow, and the long hot days press vegetation onward with surprising rapidity. What nature does here she must do quickly. There are but three growing months—cold spring, chilly autumn and freezing winter embrace the balance of the year. The ice thaws and begins its southward journey in the last of April, and by the first or middle of November the rivers and lakes are frozen. The atmosphere in summer and winter has the dryness, electricity and high salubrity of the Mexican table lands. You can sleep with open windows or even in the open air with impunity. The winters are long and very cold, but dry and uniform. Snow falls to the depth of twelve or eighteen inches, and remains six months without drift or thaw. It rarely rains in winter, and the people enjoy their sleigh-riding without let or hindrance. Invalids with pulmonary diseases spend the winter here and are benefitted. Some instances of apparent cure came under my observation. I have been informed that owing to some atmospheric peculiarity, and to a constitutional change which it induces, persons are almost insensible of the cold, and that people sometimes nearly freeze to death without knowing it. The winter etiquette of the Esquimeaux is observed, and travelers meeting describe each others noses, and volunteer the friendly salutation of a rub of snow!—Minnesota is called the "New England of the West" and the climate, soil and population justify the name. The inhabitants are of every State, nation, kindred, tongue and people. Germans and New Englanders are probably most numerous.

St. Paul is of course named for the Apostle of the Gentiles—population about ten thousand, and growing so fast that the statistics must be changed daily. It is the capitol and has a new State-House, which looks rather stately at a distance, but is poorly built, and kept in wretched condition. From its cupola we have a very full view of the city. Like nearly all the Upper Mississippi towns it is built very irregularly, on an irregular surface of bluffs, knobs and hills, and is spread over a vast extent. The appearance of the place from the river, from the near elevations, or from the capitol, with the accessions which position, water, hills and heavens bring to the scene, is moderately good, but nothing capable of exciting the faintest rapture of poetic feeling. The near and detailed view is wonderfully commonplace. In general it may be said that the town is not yet fenced in. It seems to be out of doors, and in the nakedness of infancy. Most of the houses are new—none of them are old, and few of them make any pretension to completeness or elegance.—Large droves of cattle, driven here for sale, are herded in the most central localities. There are pig styes and a stock market in a stone's throw of the best hotel. The theatre is over the butchers and market house, and judging from the things pouring into it, it is well attended. The churches are doing well for so young a town. Methodism is perhaps in the ascendancy, and is in a healthy, growing condition. This denomination has but one church, and small at present, but a new one is in course of erection which is to surpass every other in the city. The present edifice is the first brick and the first religious structure erected in Minnesota. The society of St. Paul is good for so young a place and business is characteristic of "the great west." Real estate is held enormously high, speculation is rife, and money is worth from two to five per cent. per month. Peoples' heads are almost turned with fortune seeking and with the speculating mania.

Our first excursion is to White Bear Lake, twelve miles from St. Paul.—Fine horses but a slow and perverse driver, bring us to it in time for a dinner of fish and game—the best dinner that we found in the Territory. The lake is twelve or fifteen miles in circumference, a large island of several hundred acres is in the center, and both island and mainland are covered with a munificent growth of sugar-maple and oak. The water is clear as light, is the best in the world to drink, and deep enough to look blue. We are rowed over its surface and circumnavigate the island. The water sparkles like wine twenty feet below the surface; we see fish, and shells, and every sort of submarine thing. Each passenger has hook, spoon and line, and dancing over the waves, trolls for such fish as he has just eaten for dinner. Divers pike, bass, and others of the finny tribe are cruelly drawn from their limpid home and given over to the tender mercies of the sporting epicure. On the pebbly shore of the island our little fleet is moored, and all fall to work seeking for cameleons and other curious and precious stones. Of these many fine specimens are found which jewellers would prize and turn to profitable account. Once more aboard with hook and line and bate, we linger in the shadow of the island till the sun gets low and then return to port. This lake is supplied by a spring which bursts up from the center and bottom, and as it keeps the lake at a uniform height. White Bear is the largest lake we saw, but there are many others, smaller and not less beautiful, which we passed and saw at a distance. They are supplied by gushing powerful springs, and their outlets are the sources of several large rivers. The Red river of the North and the Mississippi take their rise in these spring lakes. Minnesota has been styled with with truth, the artesian fountain of the continent. There is no country in the world which equals it in the number, beauty and purity of its lakes.

Our next excursion, and the one of greatest distance and interest, is the Falls of St. Anthony, and other noticeable places. The falls are, by the river, twenty miles above St. Paul. The river however makes a long bend, and we drive across the country on the east side, and shorten the distance to ten or twelve miles. The country around the falls is beautiful and in unison with them. Rolling prairies dotted with islands of wood are on both banks, and before civilisation marred it the scene must have been surpassingly fine.—There is an observatory below the falls and near the bank of the river called "Cheevers Tower," as high as the tower of St. Patrick's, and built like the fine tower on Washington Avenue. Over the entrance somebody has perpetrated the following distitch:

Pay your dime
Before you climb.

After fulfilling the truth of this poetry (?)—we ascended to the dizzy, buzzy top, and luxuriated in the magnificent coup d'oeil. We look upon the Mississippi at least two thousand miles from its mouth. It is here in greatly reduced circumstances, shallow, clear and half the width it is at New Orleans. The channel is visible in its windings for miles above and below St. Anthony. The prairies with their varied woods, grasses and grains stretch away like dead swells from the mast of a ship.—The town of St. Anthony is on the east bank, contains from two to three thousand souls, and looks across the river on a line with the falls. On the opposite side is the village of Minnopolis, which looks as if it had been built the day before. The fall of water is only seventeen feet, and from this height and distance it appears much less. The falls are divided by an island which lies midway between banks, and on which is a flouring mill and a saw mill. From the head of the island and extending nearly to either shore, the falls are choked and vexed by immense rafts of logs, which have been floated from extensive pineries above and have lodged amongst the rocks. Just in the thickets lodgment of them and at the head of the island, a shingle mill whizzes and puffs sublimely. In such a place it can never want for water power, nor materials to work on. The widest fall is on the west side, and extends about one or two hundred feet from the bank to a huge drift of logs and rocky projections. As we stand and contemplate we are filled with regret that we could not have looked upon the falls before the utilitarian pale faces came and haggled and ruined what must have been one of the loveliest scenes on the continent. I envy the privilege of the first explorers who saw this place in all its native beauty, before the saw, hammer and axe came. Half a mile above the falls is a suspension bridge, built like the bridge at Niagara, but not of equal size and cost. It is however a great work and useful.

Crossing on this bridge we drive to the falls of Minnehaha, six miles below Minneopolis. The outlet of Lake Minnetonka here makes a perpendicular leap of eighty feet. It is a small stream, between a brook and a creek, twenty or thirty feet wide and half knee deep. Crossing it above we wind around, and in a deep gorge or dell, shut in by precipitous banks, and overhung with trees and vines, we see the "laughing water" face to face. It is a thing of beauty, or rather of marvelous prettiness. With the trees and shrubs, which from some points partially hide it, and with the sparkling, dimpling, cachinating look and sound of the water, we feel that Minnehaha alone expresses what is heard and seen. Some wretch has attempted to change the name to perpetuate his own, "Brown's Falls!" Shades of the Dacotahs! The man that would be guilty of such an impious thing ought to be scalped.

Drinking of the laughing water, and casting more than one "longing lingering look behind," we proceed to Fort Snelling, and thence across the river home again. The Fort is three miles from Minnehaha, and stands at the junction of Minnesota and Mississippi. It contains extensive stone barracks and is surrounded by stone walls. The situation is pleasant. One side looks out on the Minnesota, another on the Mississippi, and the others toward the prairies. A more delightful spot I have not seen. But surely it is time to bring this letter to a close, and to bid the sky-tinted water farewell. WOODSMAN.

AN ANNUAL GIFT.

One "Old Solomon" appears once a year by his offerings to the editor of the Richmond Christian Advocate. The editor introduces this Ethiopian prince: "Our old friend appears in our columns once more. He greets us annually with a contribution. Last year he told us his donation was the fruit of his savings in the sale of "fish and oysters," and was governed by the fluctuations of the trade; as God prospers him; as he gives of his earnings to the cause of Christ.—Who does not wish that Old Solomon's net may be always on "the right side of the ship." Providence has been more propitious we suppose, the past season, and as a thank offering the contribution is enlarged."

And here is the "appearance," unvarnished:

"Bro. L. M'Lee: Inclosed is mi superipsion this ear to the miscionery. trak and biblo cociety, twenty dolers to miscionary, five to trak, five to bible cociety —makes thirty-altogether.—I wish i was able to cen mor. I read your paper sometime when I can get. mi brothers lend it me sonie times. I hop this will go saf to you and the Lord send whar it is most nerded. mi best christian love to you from one of brothers in christ Jesus our lord." Your friend,

June 7, 1856. OLD SOLLOMAN.

THEIR INFLUENCE.

Bishop Andrew's articles, which appeared in our columns, in several numbers, on the "Religious Instruction of Negroes" have awakened attention, beyond our own church; and properly, for others have a work to do, in that field which has been as yet hardly begun. The Presbyterian Herald says, in quoting:

"Bishop Andrew, is now publishing in the Southern Methodist papers an admirable series of letters to Southern masters, on their responsibilities and duties to their servants and especially their obligation to give them religious instruction. His style is easy and naturally, and occasionally touchingly eloquent. The letters breathe the spirit of the gospel, and cannot fail to be highly useful."

RIGHT KIND OF PREACHING.—It was a beautiful criticism made by Longinus upon the effect of the speaking of Cicero and Demosthenes. He said the people would go from one of Cicero's orations exclaiming, "What a beautiful speaker! What a rich, fine voice! What an eloquent man Cicero is!" They talked of Cicero; but when they left Demosthenes, they said, "Let us fight Philip!" Losing sight of the speaker, they were all absorbed in the subject; they thought not of Demosthenes, but of their country. So, my brethern, let us endeavor to send away from our ministrations the christian, with his mouth full of the praise not of "our preacher," but of God; and the sinner not descanting upon the beautiful figures and well turned periods of this discourse, but inquiring with the brokenness of a penitent. "What shall I do to be saved?"

He that is not against his sin, in a lively resistance, is for it in his affections.

Afflictions are God's whetstones—they put a new edge upon old principles.

LETTER FROM BISHOP ANDREW.

Centenary Institute — Commencement — Weather — Degrees — Preaching — Addresses — The Wreath — A Horrible Article — Music, Modern and Scientific — A Good Class-meeting — As it ought to be.

SPRINGFIELD, Ala., July 5, 1856.

Dear Brother:—We have just finished the usual exercises of our annual commencement, and our quiet village is almost as still as the Sabbath. I suppose that both you and your readers would like to hear some account of the commencement of the Centenary Institute, and as I don't know whether any one else has performed the task I have undertaken it myself.

The commencement sermon was preached on last Sabbath to a large assembly, by Rev. Mr. Harrison, of Macon, Mississippi, on "Seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you." A plain, scriptural, earnest and appropriate discourse. May it never be forgotten, especially by the interesting crowd of young people to whom it was particularly addressed. There was also preaching in the afternoon and night.

On Monday and Tuesday the examination was carried on, and I am told the classes acquitted themselves very creditably. I did not hear many of them, the reason why, is I strive to avoid large crowds, especially when the thermometer is over 90 degrees in the shade, and the dust shoe deep in the streets. I was present however on Tuesday and heard three young ladies of the graduating class read a number of the Centenary Wreath. The Wreath is a paper which has been periodically published during the term of the Senior class, who alternately edit it, and at regular periods read it for the amusement and edification of the school and as many of the citizens as choose to attend. It is designed to improve them in thinking, writing and composition, and is, I doubt not, happily calculated to promote these ends.

The reading on Tuesday spoke well for the paper and its correspondents, but like all other important journals, it has to change its editors, or rather editresses, and the old incumbents must be regarded as having given the public their valedictory on Tuesday. What effect the inauguration of a new dynasty may produce upon its fortunes time alone will show.

There was one article in the late number which struck me with great force. It was an able and earnest appeal from daughters and sisters to their fathers and brothers to endow Centenary Institute. It seemed to produce some sensation, but I am told that a similar appeal was made last year, and that an effort at that time would probably have resulted in a favorable beginning towards that desirable object, but the Trustees were not just ready, nor were they ready on Tuesday, when there was a good state of feeling on the subject. I believe, however, they have appointed a committee to attend to getting the ball in motion.

Success to them. The Centenary Institute ought to be handsomely endowed. It is Alabama's oldest Institute—I mean under the care of the Conference—has been diligently and successfully engaged in training the daughters of this proud State, and preparing them for usefulness in the various walks embraced in woman's glorious sphere.—Many of its daughters are now the happy wives and mothers of the land—not a few have passed triumphantly to that haven of glorious rest toward which they received the decisive impulse while pursuing their studies here.

But rival institutions are springing up all over the land, and the number of students will of course fluctuate. We must have an able faculty, notwithstanding any casual fluctuations in the patronage of the school. But of this enough.

Wednesday was a great day. We had reading of original compositions by the graduating class, seven in number. The conferring of degrees, and an address by the President—all very good. Then we had the annual Literary Address, by Rev. Mr. Baldwin, of Mobile. A very sensible, practical address, on the proper course to be observed in order to success in life.—Would that all the youth who heard it may remember and follow its teachings, then would their success and usefulness and happiness be secured beyond contingency. In a word the address was a capital one and well delivered.

But perhaps some of your readers are ready to say "We have been listening for the music." Oh, sure enough; well, we had music interspersed all the way through, at proper intervals, and I reckon it was very fine: every body said so. For my part, not being at all proficient in modern scientific music, I can't decide. All I can say is that it sounded very well.

Before I close I must say something about what was to me the most interesting portion of the exercises. We had our Sabbath morning a general class-meeting. Quite a large turn-out. Brother Joshua Heard conducted the services, and I tell you we had a real good, warm, old-fashioned class-meeting. The brethren and sisters spoke, several of them strongly and clearly, on the subject of "perfect love," and we had a most precious season. Now I am glad to see that all our schools make religion the prominent feature, and I rejoice too to see our Methodist schools honoring and making prominent the peculiar institutions of Methodism.

Anecdotes of Early Western Preachers.

ASBURY AND AXLEY.

Rev. Mr. Millburn will do a good service, and what no other popular lecturer seems to have the taste, courage, judgment or sentiment of justice to undertake, in setting forth the heroic and exalted worth of certain pioneer preachers. It is for the world's welfare that they be put in such a light as to be known and admired. The following is from one of Mr. M's lectures:

To my mind with all due to the great divines of New England—to Edwards and Dwight, and Channing—Francis Asbury is the most notable name, in the ecclesiastical history of this continent. He had the care of all the churches of his order; he traveled for forty years from Maine to Georgia; from the Atlantic to the limits of population in the West and Southwest; here upon his shoulders the weight of the affairs of what is now the most numerous of the Protestant bodies in the country, was instant in season, and out of season, warning and encouraging, and stimulating; and yet his name is not recorded by a single historian of the United States, and many well-read men are not even aware of his existence.

Asbury had some striking peculiarities. Among other things he was never married. Indeed, like many of the early Methodist pioneers he was a decided advocate of the celibacy of the clergy. One of the three rules laid down for the guidance of the young preachers was to the effect that they must be very sparing in their conversation to women. Considering the itinerant life they were to lead, and the scanty amount of their salary, which, in those days, was fixed at a maximum of forty-four dollars a year, all presents they might receive included, celibacy, seemed in a manner forced upon them. Indeed, it was generally understood, that when a young brother was so unfortunate as to link himself with a female companion, he must leave the ranks of the itinerants and beate; preaching when he could, but deriving no support from the church. Asbury himself said that he could form no ties that would interfere with the prosecution of his duties, and he had found no women who would be content with the society of her husband for but a single week in a year; and if he should find such a one he would not marry her. Still, he maintained it to be the duty of every man to support a woman; and he, accordingly devoted a large share of his scanty income to the maintenance of a kinswoman in England; and when she died, he bestowed it upon another.

These early Methodist preachers were not learned men. Their libraries, not seldom, consisted of but two books, the Bible and Hymn Book; but the contents of these they mastered, as well as the great book of human nature. Far out upon the lonely prairie, where they had passed the night, with the earth for a mattress and the broad sky for a covering, and their saddle for a pillow, when they awoke early in the morning cold and hungry, their first duty was to read, upon their knees, a few chapters from the little pocket Bible, often bedewing the pages with their tears; and, then, commend themselves to their heavenly Father, they would saddle their horses and proceed on their solitary way. Their Hymn Book was their great armory; furnished, they believed with every needful spiritual weapon. They were almost to a man, great singers, and this accomplishment often stood them in good stead, as the following anecdote of one of them will show; besides illustrating some other points in their character.

Among the most notable of these early preachers was James, or, as he was usually called, Jimmy Axley. In 1806 or 1807, he was sent as a missionary to Attakapas country, in Louisiana, a region chiefly inhabited by Roman Catholics. He had little comfort to expect from unpaid kindness, and he had no money with which to purchase it. At one time he was reduced to the very verge of starvation. He had passed the previous night in the open swamp.—Toward evening, cold, wet and hungry, for he had eaten nothing for thirty-six hours, he reached a plantation. He catered the house and petitioned for food and lodging. The mistress of the house, a widow with sundry daughters, and several negro children playing about, recognized his call, and refused his request. "She would have no such cattle about her." The most he could gain was permission to warm himself by the fire, before he set out in the cold and darkness. As he sat warming himself he thought of his sad plight and of his empty stomach. He thought of another night in the swamp. He thought that it might be his last night upon earth. He thought of the dark rolling river, and of the celestial city beyond. His heart swelled with gludness, and his emotion found vent in one of his favorite hymns:

"Peace, my soul thou need'st not fear,
The great Provider still is near."

He sang the whole hymn, then another, and still another. Looking round at the close he saw mother, and daughters, and negroes, all in tears. "Here, Sally, get the preacher a good supper; and Pete, you put up his horse, he shall stay a week, if he pleases," said the widow. So Jimmy paid for his supper with a song.

Many years after, Father Axley attended General Conference at Baltimore, and on Sunday was appointed to preach at the oldest church. He rose and lined the first verse of the hymn. When the choir rose to sing all the audience turn round to them presenting their backs to the preacher. Jimmy was astonished. He had never seen such a proceeding, and it appeared to him a breach of good manners that deserved rebuke. When he was about to give out the second stanza, the audience turned round again to him, and then faced the choir as they sang. The preacher, therefore, turned his back to them. He heard them turning back to hear the dialog of the next stanza.—Still he kept his back toward them. "Do you think this looks well?" he at length asked. "Is this good manners? and yet my back looks as well as any of yours?" From that day to the present, that congregation has never again turned their backs to the preacher, during singing.

Mr. James Gibson, the oldest member of the Philadelphia bar, died in that city on the 9th instant, at the age of 87 years.

LATER FROM NICARAGUA.

Flight of President Rivas and his Cabinet.

Dissolution of the Provisional Government

By the arrival of the steamship Daniel Webster, we have files of the Nicaraguense to the 21st ult., which contain highly important information.

The following, which we copy entire from that paper, gives a full history of the recent revolution:

Patricio Rivas and his Cabinet have deserted—bag and baggage! Last week we published from the pen of his Excellency a proclamation of the most inflexibly patriotic description. Three days afterwards he fled, frightened at his own guilty conscience! We breathe freer! The treason which all expected has transpired, and the Government has no further necessity to divide its counsels with those in whom it has no confidence!

On Wednesday, the 11th day of June, Gen. Walker left Leon, after a most affecting parting with his Excellency at the barrier. At this time Leon was guarded by native soldiers. The Americans interfered with nothing, that the city might feel perfectly safe under the guardianship of troops drawn from its own vicinity. The day after Gen. Walker left, Col. Escobar, commander of the native garrison, informed Col. Bruno Natzmer that the native force was not sufficient to keep guard, and requested a detail of Americans. Compliance was signified, and an American soldier stationed at the entrance of the Principal or government house. Senor Salzar, Minister of War, thereupon mounted his horse and rode down to the barriers bare-headed, where he informed the rabble, in an official harangue, that the Americans had seized the Principal, and were about to murder the President and his Cabinet. In his speech he also took occasion to advise the people that the Americans were going to burn down the churches and destroy the religion of the country. A great excitement was the result, during which the President and his advisors took flight for Chinandega. The Americans in the meantime were innocent in knowledge of what was proceeding; and although they knew there was a hubbub about something, they very naturally thought it was some public day among the people, when they had a right to be excited.

Don Patricio Rivas, President of the Republic; Don Sebastian Salinas, Secretary of State; Don Maximo Jerez, Secretary of War, and Don Francisco Baca, Minister of Public Credit, all fled to Chinandega, leaving Don Fermin Ferrer, the only true and loyal Democrat connected with the late Administration, in this city.

From Chinandega, Don Maximo Jerez, in his capacity as Minister of War, sent word to Realejo to suspend the public work at fortifying that place, and directed that the place be dismantled of its present armament. Orders were also sent to Col. Natzmer, in command at Leon, to withdraw his sentry from the Principal, and allow each of the two towers of the Cathedral to be garrisoned by fifty soldiers of the country. The frontier pickets were all called in and a very general order carried out to leave the State open to the army of invasion which was known to be advancing on Leon. The President expressed great fear of his life, and stated that the above regulations were necessary for his safety.

The order sent to Col. Natzmer was not obeyed until it was submitted to Gen. Walker, who immediately ordered the American commander in Leon to comply with the mandates of the Minister of War; and further, to withdraw with his whole force from that city.

At the time Gen. Walker gave the above command he was in Nagarote, at the head of 250 troops, marching on Leon; but after giving the order, he stopped at Managua until the Rifle Battalion, under Lt. Col. Anderson, arrived, when he left for Granada, accompanied by the Rangers.

President Rivas and his cabinet, with the exception of Don Fermin Ferrer, are now in Leon; but the Commander will have no further communication with them. They are known to have made propositions to the enemies of the country, inviting them to invade Nicaragua, and Gen. Walker intends to leave them with their new friends.

The above is a succinct account of one of the strangest revolutions on record, and we leave the world to draw its own conclusions as to the motives that probably controlled the President in his conduct. We can only account for it on the ground of fear, both from the external enemies of the State and from the fact of an approaching election. It is well known that whenever an election has taken place in this Republic, the defeated candidate either fled or was summarily executed. It is probable his Excellency remembered this failing of the State, and knowing that an election was about to transpire in the country, he accordingly concluded to follow the example of his predecessors and save himself by flight. It is also known that while the Costa Ricans were in Rivas, and third men doubted the result, Senor Rivas attempted to make his peace with President Mora, by submitting propositions to that gentleman.

This circumstance convinces us that the approach of an election and an invading army at the same time so frightened President Rivas, that he hardly knew what he was doing; and in a moment of partial insanity and chronic deceitfulness, he left the Presidency, and thus lost all hope for the future.

After the flight of the President from Leon, the people of that city became uneasy at the speech of Senor Salizar, and anxiously inquired of the Fathers of the Church if there was any truth in the statement that the Americans intended to destroy the religion of the land. The Vicar of Leon, a good and faithful man, instantly denied the calumny, and ordered all the priests to declare on Sunday that the report was untrue. The people again became reconciled, and the revulsion sets strongly against President Rivas and his advisers.

ELECTION FOR PRESIDENT.—The election for President of Nicaragua took place on the 24th of June. So far as heard from Gen. Walker had a large majority of the popular vote. An official return from Virgin Bay was: Walker, 70; Jerez, 8; Salazar, 1. From San Juan del Sur: Walker, 80; Jerez, 4. In Rivas and St. George the vote was unanimous for Walker. There can be no doubt of the election of Gen. Walker by a large majority.

President Rivas and Minister of War Jerez left Leon on the 12th June, and made their appearance at Chinandega, where they collected 600 natives, calling in all the outposts of the country. From that place Gen. Jerez ordered the American troops to evacuate Leon, which order was obeyed by Walker's men, and the President and Jerez returned to Leon. Out of the 600 men only 120 arrived at Leon, the rest deserted on the march. On their arrival at Leon the patriots were called by the alarm bells and guns, but out of 1500 only 40 made their appearance. Gen. Walker declared Rivas and his party traitors.

The following distinguished persons, and many more, have proved true to Gen. Walker, with renewed assurances of their preferences and attachment to the General and his government: Ministers Scoto and Salinas, Escobar, Governor of Leon; Gen. Bullstero, Gen. Pineda, Gen. Carrascasa, Gen. Chilon, Col. Mendez and Col. Olivo. The Chamorista party is said to have deposited the entire vote for General Walker.

THE ARMY OF INVASION.—The Nicaraguan, in connection with the invasion of Nicaragua by the army of Guatemala, says:

By the Gazette of San Salvador, we learn that the advance guard of the army of invasion, from Guatemala, had advanced as far as San Miguel, in San Salvador, on the road to this Republic. The advance guard is commanded by Gen. Paredes, who makes it convenient to stop two or three days in each town, and at last accounts he had finally hung up his hat at San Miguel.

CAPTURE OF A PRIZE.—The same paper says:

The schooner San Jose, Capt. Morton, arrived at San Juan del Sur on Thursday last, loaded with provisions, etc. We learn that this vessel was purchased by citizens of Costa Rica, although built in the United States, and sailed under the Costa Rica flag for a time. She has since been purchased by Mariano Salizar, a native and citizen of Nicaragua, now in arms against the supreme authority of this Government, Salizar, a native and citizen of Nicaragua, now in arms and Gilbert Morton, a citizen of Nicaragua, according to the laws. The vessel has been embargoed by the authorities of the port of San Juan, and claimed as a prize, having forfeited her original nationality to the United States, by a sale to Costa Rica citizens, who are at war with Nicaragua.

The Panama Star and Herald has some additional news from Costa Rica and Nicaragua. It says:

By an arrival from Punta Arenas yesterday, we have dates from Costa Rica to the 12th June.

The cholera was fast disappearing from the country.

A very strong revolution had broken out against the government, and there appeared a probability that President Mora would be taken out and shot by the insurgents. The revolution has been brought about by a party of the Costa Ricans who were opposed to the invasion of Nicaragua by the Mora army.

Business was entirely at a stand still in Punta Arenas, provisions scarce and high, and the prospects very poor.

By the same arrival we learn that the 2000 troops which left Guatemala to invade Walker, had been prevented from crossing the territory of Salvador, the latter State being opposed to the invasion. The impression of our informant is, that Walker purposes making an early attack on Costa Rica, and that he will succeed, having a very strong force at present. His head quarters now is Virgin Bay.

Reconstruction of the Government.

It will be seen by the following decrees and addresses, that Don Fermin Ferrer, formerly Minister of Hacienda, has been appointed Provisional President of the Republic, during the interregnum between the flight of Rivas and the election of a new President by the people. The power of the State is thus happily conferred upon the only reliable member of the late Government, and we may add, the only Minister who ever had the confidence of General Walker. A most fortunate chain of events invests this appointment with all the forms of legality; as under the treaty executed by the Democrats and Servitas in Granada, on the formation of the late Provisional Government, it was expressly stipulated that General Walker should be invested with the power to appoint a new Government in the event of a dissolution of the old one. That treaty, which is the basis of all legitimate operations in this Republic, placed the power to provide for the State in the hands of the Commander of the Army, and in the appointment of Don Fermin Ferrer, Gen. Walker not only preserves the Republic but follows out the line of his duties.

In the second place, when President Rivas left this city some time since for Leon, he delegated all the powers to Gen. Walker, and placed the State on a martial law. Thus the defaulting Executive cast away the very authority which was necessary to declare even him a traitor, should he desert the State.

In the reconstruction of the Provisional Government, therefore, the most complete authority reconciles the action of the Commander-in-Chief, according to the only law known since the treaty of Granada, between General Walker on the one side, and General Corral on the other, the existing Government of Nicaragua, under President Ferrer, is entitled to the utmost respect due to any legalized Government. An election takes place soon, however, when the people will choose their own President; and when that is done, the present Provisional Government will dissolve as peaceably as it has been formed, and the State will move on under the direction of the popular will.

DECREE.

WILLIAM WALKER, General-in-Chief of the Army of Nicaragua, considering:

That, by the treaty of the 23d of October last, Don Patricio Rivas was named as the Provisional President of the Republic, and that the power with which he was invested was an emenation of the powers conferred upon me by the Supreme Government as Plenipotentiary General;

That, on the Provisional President removing from the city of Granada to Leon, in March last, he delegated to me all the powers which had been entrusted to him to maintain order in the Eastern and Southern Departments of the Republic, and to guard in each against foreign invasion, proclaiming from that time martial law:

That the Provisional President appointed as Minister of Hacienda Licenciato, Don Fermin Ferrer, Commissioner in the Departments referred to, with all proper powers to aid me in my administration on suitable occasions:

That the Provisional President, Don Patricio Rivas, betraying his duties to the prejudice of the rights and well-being of the Government, has absconded to Chinandega, with the object to disarm all the frontier of the west and deliver the country in the forces of Carrera, who have invaded it; for which object he has commissioned Mr. Mariano Salizar;

That, on the 14th of this month, Mr. Rivas has issued a decree which repeals a decree which was issued four days previous, by which the people of Nicaragua are to choose a successor to him in office;

That by the treaty of the 23d of October, it was explicitly guaranteed by the two contending Generals that the Provisional President should maintain peace and order in the Republic, and that Don Patricio Rivas nat only has endeavored to excite anarchy within, but has called the enemies without to invade the same.

In order to preserve the integrity of the Republic and the sacred duty to save the country from anarchy and from the enemies foreign and domestic, I have deemed it proper to decree, and do

DECREE:

1. The Commissioner of the Government and Minister of the Hacienda, Don Fermin Ferrer, is appointed Provisional President of this Republic, until the people shall elect a President, in obedience to the orders of the decree of the 10th inst., which is in full force and virtue.

2. In consequence, all the acts and decrees issued by order of Don Patricio Rivas, since the 12th inst., are null and void, in consequence of his desertion of all the trusts vonfided to him by virtue of the treaty of the 23d of October aforesaid.

3. The civil or military authorities of the Republic who lend obedience to Mr. Rivas in these matters, natives or foreigners who may render to him any kind of aid, by loans or mercantile contracts, shall be considered as traitors to the country, and punished according to martial laws.

4. Let this be communicated to whom it may concern, and published in all the towns of this Republic.

Deno at Granada, on the 20th day of June, 1856.

WILLIAM WALKER.

Address of General Walker!

TO THE PEOPLE OF NICARAGUA:

I came to Nicaragua to secure its peace and prosperity. With this view I signed the treaty of the 23d October last, and assisted to uphold the Government organized under its provisions.

But the Government, far from aiding me to carry out the agreement of that treaty, has thrown obstacles in the way, and has ended by endeavoring to stir up civil strife within the Republic. Strange as it may appear, the late Rivas Administration has attempted to create troubles, and difficulties, and war, between the people and the Americans they have invited hither.

It was not enough that the Americans should endure the pestilence at Granada for the purpose of consolidating the late Provisional Government, and receive no compensation for the services they rendered at the expense of so much suffering and so much death. It was not enough that they should pour out their blood at Rivas, in order to maintain the power and honor of the State, and then have the Government refuse to provide them with the bare necessities of life. Ingratitude was not sufficient to satisfy the craving for infamy which consumed the vitals of Government, and treason became necessary in order to furnish fresh food to the appetite for obloquy and contempt. They seek to repay their debt to the Americans, by exciting the people against their benefactors.

It is thus manifest that the late Provisional Government has not only failed to fulfil its promises to the Americans and its duties to the people, but is guilty of the enormous crime of instigating its citizens to civil war. And to aid it in these objects, it has coalesced with the armed and declared enemies of the Republic—with the forces an illiterate mayor attempts to pour over the plains of Nicaragua.

In addition, the Government has attempted to prolong its existence by taking from the people the privilege of electing their own rulers; and as if farther to mark its hatred for freedom, it has banished from the State a Cuban patriot, who, despairing for the present of his own country, has sought in this land the honor of using his sword in defence of liberty and progress.

With such accumulated crimes—consuming against the very people it was bound to protect—the late Provisional Government is no longer worthy of existence. In the name of the people I have, therefore, decreed its dissolution, and have organized a Provisional Government, until the nation exercises its natural right of electing its own rulers. WILLIAM WALKER.

GRANADA, June 20, 1856.

Address of Gen. Walker to the Army.

Soldiers! Since you have been in Nicaragua you have endured privations and passed through dangers not only without murmurs, but even with cheerfulness. Veterans might be proud of the prowess you have exhibited; and patriots fighting for homes and firesides have seldom shown more self denial than you have in the service of a foreign government; and you have done all without having as yet received any compensation for what you have undergone.

It is true that the country has just emerged from a disastrous civil war, and therefore we did not expect it to pay promptly the obligations it contracted; but we had a right to expect, at least, gratitude for our services. Far from receiving even this reward, the late Provisional Government has attempted to excite the prejudices of the people against their benefactors.

A government thus bankrupt in credit, faith and honor has no title to the confidence or respect of its soldiers. Duty to ourselves, as well as to the nation, requires us to construct a new administration, which will more faithfully execute the objects of its creation. I have, therefore, organized a new Provisional Government, until the people can select their own rulers, when it is to be hoped we will have an administration more mindful of its duties and more jealous of the honor of the State. WILLIAM WALKER.

SOMETHING OBSERVABLE.

The "Methodist Protestant," of Baltimore, is a paper we like to read.—There is talent engaged there worthy of a better cause than systematic agitation against "the older form of Methodism." Now here is something honest from its columns—it is an editorial:

It is observable that in those places where Methodist Protestantism is newly introduced, a more rapid increase of membership results than where it has been long established. This may be attributed to the novelty which challenges inquiry. In places where it has been long struggling it is looked upon by the people as a church not differing essentially from the mother church, and rather as a refractory child, separated from the great family, than as an ... member of the household, deserving approval ... encouragement. In such places, it is little known ... the circle in which for years it has been ... and there is not sufficient novelty about the ... to cause any special inquiry. But when introduced into new territory, and particularly where ... Episcopacy has the sway, it has a fresh-... which attracts attention, stimulates inquiry, and results in an examination of its principles, a comparison of its system of ... with the older form of Methodism, and ... approval by men of unbiased minds of its superior adaptation to the enlightenment of the age in which we live. These reflections should have their weight upon our various Conferences in leading to energetic action in the establishment of home missions. Methodism is aggressive—Methodist Protestantism must not forget this essential feature of its continued existence and its ultimate success.

"Methodism is aggressive." The older form is—makes aggressions upon the world and sin—changing, restraining, converting them. This new form, "Methodist Protestantism," is aggressive also, but in how different a sense! Its Conferences are exhorted to energetic action against Methodist Episcopacy. Its members are urged to keep the strife warm about, justification?—No. Sanctification? No. But about comparative systems of church government! This is necessary for "its continued existence." The "rapid increase" upon a new introduction anywhere is easily accounted for. The discontented, ambitious, unsettled elements are ready to move off at once. But the flow stops there. The chaff blows away briskly; but all are not chaff. This promising beginning should not therefore lead to such large expectations. They are sure to be disappointed.

And no wonder that Christian people get tired of working a system that finds its antagonism, not in a sinful world, but in another denomination, honored of Christ! They must be very cranky not to get tired of the bootless agitation. It don't pay. Their souls want rest. Their hearts long for godly communion and the sincere milk of the word. They want religion for themselves and their children and their neighbors and servants. And yon offer them a dispute about church govern-...

Reasonably enough they ask, "Is this the entertainment we were invited to?" And the system, that depended upon novelty and worrying agitation for existence, languishes.

UNION OF CHURCH AND STATE.

WHERE IS THE DANGER.

"Church and State should be separate and distinct." The United States people believe that.

Occasionally, however, the bearings of ecclesiastical organizations and movements on this subject must be discussed. The Roman Catholic Church has shown an instinct for union with secular power; which once effected, by the very nature of the case, the latter sinks below equality. The old Pope put it plainly when he spiritualized the work of creation—"God made two great lights, the sun to rule by day, and the moon to rule by night. The church is the sun; the state, the moon; therefore, the state should be subject to the church."

With our constitutional guards, strong popular sentiment, and vigilant press, we entertain no fears, of a papal or other establishment. The press is awake, but very generally it is on the wrong scent, or trying to put the public on it.

It is getting popular now, to deny the tendency, instincts and traditions of Romanism; and to charge them upon Protestants! The sly priest is praised for not being seen on the stump. He is not in the legislature and Congress; not he. But Protestant bigots and "political parsons" are held up to view! There is danger; all the danger!

From one of our city papers, which has character for able writing and independent views, we take the following as a specimen; abstracted entirely, from any of its original party meaning:

No religious community in this country is so free from the charge of intermeddling in political questions—so clear as a body from all the stains and dust-prints of the political arena. From the day on which the Maryland colony declared for religious liberty to the present time, the stole of the Catholic priest has never been dabbled by "drops of onset" of the battle-grounds of politics, nor has his alb been dragged through the mire of party. It is true, Archbishop Hughes, of New York, has sometimes played the demagogue; but he has been rebuked by his own people for his rashness and arrogance. True, the "Catholic press," at the head of which is Mr. Orestes Brownson, has been violently ultramontane, but it never represented the real opinions of a tithe of the Catholic community. * * * * * *

Can the same be asserted of the sectarians who fill the various churches of the Union? We all remember the peculiar organization of the Massachusetts Legislature which passed the Convent Inspection Bill, and insulted a body of innocent ladies for the glory of God of the renown of Massachusetts.—We see preachers of different religious creeds—none of them Catholics—in the Congress of the United States to-day, bowling against the South and its institutions. We find the pulpits of the North and East resonant with fiery denunciations of the Constitution, and furious appeals to the vilest passions of the congregations. Sharpe's rifles are laid beside the Eucharistic bread, and the bowie-knife and bible are associated in the sanctuaries of the Lord. Even in our State, during the last Gubernatorial election, we beheld preachers on the stump, animated by the spirit of incendiarism, and raving with the rabies of party. Was there a Catholic priest amongst them? In simple justice, we must say—no.

Now that is changing the issue, most decidedly. Without apologising for the abuse of the sacred desk here charged or the howlings in Congress or elsewhere, or the rifle-bible preachers, or the "political parsons"—all against our judgment and taste—we consider the bearings of all this upon the union of church and state—for the article we quote from was headed "Church and State"—and their union deprecated.

It is as a citizen that any preacher takes part in politics. As a citizen, whose rights and existence have not been lost, he canvasses and is voted for. He leads no sect to the polls, bodily.—His bishop and his church are never consulted on his nomination, or committed to his support. Often his sharpest opponents are of his own spiritual household. The church may suffer by this subtraction of a consecrated man from her altars—but that is another matter.

Preachers so elected to legislatures or to Congress, vote yea and nay on the same questions.

If "we see preachers of different religions creeds, howling against the South and its institutions," we see some also in the South who, if not in howls, at least in arguments, give as good as they send.

Rev. S. edits an able Democratic paper in Alabama. Rev. H. the American organ in Louisiana. Rev. Dr. L. writes a scathing rebuke of Know Nothings. Rev. Dr. W. answers him in scathing style. These all belong to one church. They are free citizens and they so assert it. Now a church must be united in itself, politically, before uniting with the state.

But how is it with Archbishop Hughes, and all the archbishops, bishops priests and Catholic presses that ever showed their hand in politics? They are all on one side. The citizen has been sunk in the ecclesiastic; for with personal judgment acting independently on the ideas and measures that divide parties, this unanimity is impossible.—Natural checks, that make the union of Church and State elsewhere impracticable, mysteriously disappear here.—This silent fact is not to be lost sight of. "Preachers on the stump" do not touch it, in significance.

It would be a relief to see the Boston Pilot combatting the leaders of the Freeman's Journal; to see Archbishop Purcell, of Cincinnati, "play the demagogue," against Archbishop Hughes, of New York; or to see father Mullen pitch into father Monaghan.

Their appearance upon the political arena, on opposite sides, would do much towards removing an unpleasant suspicion of "intermeddling in political questions." Then they could not scheme deeper than their fellow-citizens; and their community would be dissolved into healthful, even though demonstrative, civil elements.

Give Roman Catholics a fair showing and credit for all their dues; but this disparaging comparison is not true in fact or theory.

THEOLOGICAL TRAINING.

HOW SHALL IT BE DONE?

This subject is growing upon our Methodist brethren, beyond the line.—We are glad to see their papers so much occupied with it—pro and con.—The writers are of first rate ability; and discussion might be on a less profitable subject.

There seems to be two opinions. One of these is self-education in the midst of the pressing labors and high responsibilities of our ministerial work. The other is an institutional education prior to entire devotion to that work. The advocates of the latter are not agreed. Some hold that the university will meet all the wants of the church, and in a much better way than any seminary can; others hold that the theological seminary is a seperate necessity, both for present and future wants. In the educational convention, lately held in Indianapolis, Dr. Curry advocated the former opinion, and Dr. Dempster the latter.

As against the merely academic or university theologian Dr. Ryle is quoted who charges his church with great neglect of ministerial training, conceding "that there are, probably, no Protestant ministers on earth so badly trained for the work of preaching as the clergy of the church of England." The church of England knows no such thing as a theological seminary? All the provision she makes for her clergy is in the university, which embraces divinity lectures.

Dr. Dempster, who has led the movement, is publishing a series, in the Chicago Christian Advocate. He says:

The intrinsic merits of the question should secure to its discussion the best minds of the age—the most richly replenished men of the connection. The class of talent arrayed on opposing sides, indicates the deep importance of the inquiry. The manner in which the present generation shall adjudicate the question, must exert an agency on its distant successors. It must fix its impress deep on our Methodist history.—On the weakness or wisdom of our decision, posterity will sit in judgment.

We give an extract from this argument the calculations of which some of our readers will perhaps question:

But we will proceed to no other topic before taking a glance at our prescribed "course of study." Supposing that were sufficiently broad in its range and ample in its demands, still, would it on another account be anadapted to our candidates. Though no one adequately conceiving of the demands of our pulpit, can imagine that the limited outline appended to our Discipline, is commensurate to those demands, yet that course itself is unattainable by the itinerant. One of our most practical ministers has, with great care, classified the pastor's duties, computing the hours of each day which they absorb, and thereby ascertaining the time remaining for his reading.—From the preacher's reading days he has subtracted fifty-two Sabbaths, which must be devoted to the pulpit; the class-room, to traveling to appointments, going to and from conference, etc., twenty days; protracted meetings with what they involve, thirty days; quarterly meetings, ten; two week-day appointments, ninety-six half days, forty-eight days; visiting two families per day one hour each, five hundred and seventy-six hours, ten hours per day, fifty-seven days; two hours per week for letter-writing, ten days; an hour each day for forty-eight weeks, twenty-nine days; administering the Discipline, visiting the sick, funerals one day per week, forty-days. Then add twenty days for personal and family sickness, and but forty-one days of the three hundred and sixty-five will remain for reading. But let only seven eights of these periods be appropriated to these purposes—without which pastorial and domestic fidelity is impossible—than eighty-two days will remain for all the preacher's reading. What then, sir, does our course require him to read during his first year?—Glance at the prescribed volumes; the Bible, 1,200 pages; first part of Watson, 335 pages; Wesley C. Parfection, 175; English grammar, 300; geography, 336; 2,246 pages of these, merely his text books, then must be added, Wesley's sermons, 1,104, notes 734; Watson's Wes., 323; Watson's Apol, 220; the books he must read in his course, 2,381 pages. Then if we include merely our own periodicals we shall find an aggregate of more than 12,000 pages which he is required to read in these eighty-two days, amounting to more than two hundred pages per day, a portion of which he must commit to memory. Now, sir, who, with a particle of candor, will pronounce this practicable? In his dilemma, which alternative shall the pastor choose? The neglect of his pastoral work, or his prescribed course of study? It is from absolute necessity that one or the other he must withdraw attention. Human power cannot achieve what is thus imperatively required. The very attempt has opened a premature grave before the choicest spirits of our junior ministry. Can the plainest deduction of logic, then, be more palpable than that the pastorial work, and the studies required by our system are utterly out of harmony,—that they can never coexist? Hence the practical nullity to which our course of study amounts. The workings of our system have swept aside the more efficient means of culture to the junior preachers, by removing them from the supervision of their seniors on the same circuit, and leaving them alone on isolated charges. What requisition can be more crushing than that made of most of our young preachers? Without mental discipline; without acquired thought or language; without facilities; without a guiding hand; without a taste, or tact for study, fresh from the shop, the plow, the store—loaded with the unwonted duties of the pastor, is it amazing that he is appalled and overwhelmed?—that he retires utterly disheartened or resigns himself to the tide of events to glide on in tame mediocrity till death frees the church from an uninstructing minister?

THE TRUE MOTIVE.—A good heading for a subscription list may be got here. A large and elegant Baptist Church edifice was recently dedicated in Hartford, Connecticut. A writer in the Christian Secretary giving an account of the services, adds:

"The whole has been accomplished in the spirit of the first subscription headed, "For the love I bear to the Lord Jesus Christ, who hath redeemed my soul from death." So that we feel that it is consecrated not the glory of man but to the glory of God."

OTHER CHURCHES.

The Northwestern University, near Chicago, Ill., is claimed to be the university for the republic of Methodism on this continent. We have heretofore regretted, says the editor of the Chicago Advocate and do still regret, that the true character of this institution is not adequately appreciated in many sections of our Zion in the West and Northwest. This university is not to be local or sectional in its character.—It is to be the university of the entire West. Deservedly, it will sink to the grade of a mere conference university or college, should it fail to occupy that position to which it aspires, and which it has promised the public it will occupy. No preparatory department is ever to be connected with it—it is in no sense, to be an elementary school.—Educated young men alone can enter here. It cannot, therefore, conflict with any of the interests of those schools, no matter how high their grade, or what their name, now in existence. This school takes the pupil from them, after they are done with him. On 25th June Rev. Randolph S. Foster, D. D., was elected President. The contest lay between him and Prof. E. O. Haven, of the Michigan University.

In same neighborhood, Evanston, is the Garret Biblical Institute, in which Rev. John McClintock, D. D., late editor of the Quarterly Review, was elected to the chair of Oriental History; Rev. Dr. Kidder late Secretary of the Sunday School Union, was elected to the chair of Practical Theology, and Homiletics, and Rev. Dr. Bannister, of Cazenovia Seminary was elected to the chair of Biblical Exegesis and Literature.

Rev. Ralph Pierce, of the Black River Conference, has been recently appointed missionary to India. He was present at the late session at Syracuse, and addressed the conference in a very affecting manner.

As fusion is the order of the day, we have something here od temporá from the Louisville Presbyterian Herald:

It is pretty generally understood now, though it was bitterly denied two or three years since, that the leading spirits of the two denominations in Kentucky, are shaping events to finally bring about a fusion between the Baptists and Campbellites or Reformers, as they are sometimes called. The main instrumentality relied upon by them to effect this object is the new version of the Bible, which they are unitedly engaged in making. During the recent visit of Mr. Campbell to our city, by invitation, he occupied on the Sabbath, the First Baptist Church, though his own denomination had a house of their own on the opposite side of the street. The congregations were united into one, and the pastor of the Baptist church was one of his hearers. As both parties contend that baptize is an incorrect rendering of baptizo, it would seem to follow, as a necessary sequence that the name Baptist must be repudiated or thrown over board along with the word baptize, as they both belong to the same family. There has been some curiosity to know what name the united parties will assume after their new version has been inaugurated. We learn from a friend who heard Mr. Campbell, on the occasion, referred to, that he anticipated the matter a little and gave them a name. The members of the new Church, which the pure version is to introduce, and which is to swallow up all the sects, he proposed shall be called Christoorats. We suppose then, that in a short time we shall have on one corner of Walnut and Fourth streets, the First Christocratic Church and on the opposite one the Second Christocratic Church, of Louisville, and so on, to the end of the chapter. It has been said, that a rose, by any other name, would smell as sweet, and we suppose that no onion, with a new name, would have as strong a scent as ever. So we suppose that Campbellism, under the new name of Christocracy, will be the same effete heresy which it always has been, and that neither its new name nor its being taken into fellowship by those, who, a few short years since, repudiated it as deadly heresy, will save it from the doom which awaits it.

The Recorder gives the chronology and type of the several Protestant Episcopal papers as follows: and as the press is both a power and an index we append it. The allusion to the "high" of our poor little Mississippi neighbor, sounds mournful:

The Episcopal Recorder was started in 1823, at the beginning of the great evangelical revival; the Churchman in 1830 as the harbinger of Anglo-Catholicism; the Southern Churchman in 1831 as the peculiar diocesan representative of Virginia; the Christian Witness in 1834, and the Western Episcopalian in 1842 to perform the same office in the Eastern and the Western dioceses; the Banner of the Cross in 1839 as the organ of the conservative high churchmanship as distinguished from the remorseless progressivism of the Churchman; the Protestant Churchman in 1842 as the spokesman of Evangelical and orthodox churchmen in New York in the great theological and social controversies opened by the Carey ordination and the Oaderdonk excesses; the Calendar in 1844 as the channel through which Connecticut more moderately, though unfortunately, less consistently and energetically expressed her disgust at the same outrage; the Church Herald in 1851 as the mouth-piece of Bishop Green and the Southwestern high Anglican dioceses; and the Church Journal in 1852 as the exponent of Anglo-Catholicism.

THE NAKED EDGE.—I am tormented with the desire of preaching better than I can. But I have no wish to make me pretty sermons; prettiness is well enough when prettiness is in its place. I like to see a pretty child, a pretty flower, but in a sermon prettiness is out of place. To my ear it would be anything but commendation, should it be said to me, "You have given us a pretty sermon." If I were upon trial for my life, and my advocate should amuse the jury with his tropes and figures, burying his argument beneath a profusion of the flowers of rhetoric, I would say to him: "Tut, man, you care more for your vanity than for my hanging. Put yourself in my place—speak in view of the gallows, and you will tell your story plainly and earnestly." I have no objection to a lady's winding a sword with ribbons and studding it with roses, when she presents it to her brave lover; but in the day of battle he will tear away the ornaments, and use the naked edge to the enemy.—Robert Hall.

A MISSISSIPPI PATRIARCH.

Of all the celebrations of the "Fourth" the following is not the least, though the last in its way. Our correspondent, one of the sons-in-law, writes from Leake County:

Mr. Editor: Here is something of a short journey. On July 2d I left home, with my wife and 7 children and brother-in-law E. W. B. with his wife and 4 children. We passed by J. Y. B's and he was ready to start on the journey, with his wife and 7 children, and W. N. G. with his wife and 6 children, and G. W. B. with his wife and 3 children, and Joseph and Caroline M. with 3 children. The company, composed of six families, numbering 42 in all, we travelled towards the old home, near Thomastown. Staid at night with W. H. B. He has 6 children. Part of our crowd staid at Micajah B's. He has 6 children.

By previous arrangement all of Michael Blocker's children and grand children were to spend the 4th of July with him.

Thursday, 3d July, we took up our journey, and about 1 o'clock arrived at at the old man's—found him in fine health and spirits. On the morning of the 4th three sons and one step son, with their families, arrived; making in all present, including the old man's family, 78. There were 49 grand-children.

Just before dinner, prayer was offered up to God, suitable to the occasion by B. W. and then all sat down.

After supper the father took the family Bible and after giving his children and grand children a talk, he read aloud a chapter and knelt to offer up prayer and thanksgiving, with them, one more time, in this life. He continued in prayer a short time and was so filled with joy and gladness he could not say any more. He then called on his son Micajah, who continued in prayer. A shout was raised by the sons and daughters, and sons-in-law and daughters-in-law and grand children.—O, such a happy scene, I never witnessed! The meeting continued until 11 o'clock—with singing and prayer and praise.

July 5th, in the morning, we all started back, to our several abodes, full of love and joy and sorrow. Love to God, the giver of all good; joyful in this blessing; and sorrowful as never expecting all to meet again in this life. But hope springs up that we may meet in the haven of eternal rest—without a wanderer lost. J. B. S.

[NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—Without marring the pleasantness of the impression created by that picture, we would suggest that it would be an object to get the Advocate circulating in that family. A commission, (though it is not the rule) would be given to any one of them for getting the rest to subscribe and forwarding the subscriptions annually, so as to keep the accounts square up. He should have the paper free. Yes, and another copy shall be sent free to the old gentleman. Let us have a response.]

M. E. Church, South, in Washington.

The National Intelligencer gives a notice of services held in the Southern Methodist Church a few Sabbaths past. Bishop Pierce preaching twice and Rev. Mr. Hamill, of Alabama, once during the day. After appreciative remarks upon the sermon, the Intelligencer adds:

"But one prominent object of the entire day's effort was to raise by donations a sufficient sum of money as would be necessary to relieve this small society not only from a debt on the original purchase of their church edifice, but to complete their design of enlargement and improvement of both the interior and exterior of their house of worship. They have already reconstructed the interior, making a new pulpit, new, convenient and cushioned seats, adding many more to the former number. They have given a very pleasant finish by new gaslight fixtures, fresco painting, and other ornamental works which furnish convenient seats in a room presenting an air of neatness and good taste which it will be difficult to surpass. Although the subscription fell far short of the sum proposed to be raised, yet the amount actually donated was decidedly liberal, extending to about $1,500. Southern members of Congress gave (as if they were determined that there should be a Methodist Church, South, as far north as Washington) from ten to fifty dollars each. The church membership, worshiping here is small, but they have a faithful pastor in Rev. Dr. Doggett, and on this occasion the crowded house presented rather an imposing accession—with one of the most able and eloquent divines in the country in the pulpit, and an appreciating audience, embracing persons of a high order of intelligence, as well as those high in office, from our Chief Magistrate and many members of the National Legislature, and to the single-minded inquirer after truth. Thus a new era has been made in this church—in this lone representative in Washington of that body of the great Methodist denomination who in 1844 eparated from the Methodist Episcopal Church proper, in order, as they say, that they may by more sympathies and affinities with the institutions of the South than those which their Northern brethren appear to possess, labor more successfully among their brethren of the Southern States than they could do if they were on terms of co-operation with those who know less of Southern institutions.

THE DOUAY BIBLE.—From the "History of the Douay Bible," by Dr. Cotton, of Archdeacon Cashel, it appears that there is no English translation of the Bible authorized by the Church of Rome; that the Douay translation, as it now stands, is the fruit of "private judgment;" and that the notes in the Douay Bible have nothing to rest on but the private judgment of their authors, who, according to Dr. Doyle's testimony before the House of Lords, are often unknown.

"I have noticed that money is the fool's wisdom, the knave's reputation, the wise man's jewel, the rich man's trouble, the poor man's desire, the covetous man's ambition, and the idol of all.

CHILDREN AND THE CHURCH.

Something has been lacking in the practice of the church on this subject.—The practical inconsistency or incompleteness is a main cause why her faith has not more extensively prevailed, and in some cases has died out. We commend to thoughtful consideration the following, from the Northern Christian Advocate:

The last General Conference took an advanced position in regard to baptized children and their relation to the Church. No new doctrine was asserted or set forth, but the disciplinary provisions of the Church were adjusted more perfectly than ever heretofore, to meet the doctrinal faith and moral sense of the Church and the teachings of Scripture in regard to children and the duty of the Church to them. We call attention of all ministers and of parents to this subject. It is of the first importance to the Church, and supplies a link that has hitherto been wanting in the chain of our Church instrumentalities and provisions for children. If we were to venture an opinion of the comparative importance of the several changes and improvements effected in our Discipline at the last General Conference, we should not hesitate to range this act first in the category. We have not space this week to say more than may suffice to call attention to the subject. We shall simply promise a few remarks, and then subjoin a re-publication of the new section which is to be inserted in our Discipline in relation to baptized children. In the passage of the Report, a few verbal alterations were made to it as herein below given.

1. In the said new section the Church assumes that all children are in a state of favor with God, not by virtue of natural generation or natural innocence, but by virtue of the unconditional benefits of the atonement." Avoiding all technical use of terms in regard to the condition of infants, not committing herself to any peculiar theological dogma, or any psychological, metaphysical or ethical theory in the premises, the Church has simply affirmed the scriptural fact in scriptural phrase, that children, as a fruit of the atonement are "in a state of grace" or favor with God.

2. The right of a child to receive Christian baptism is a right vested in the child as a moral being, not in consequence of its relation to the parent, nor of the faith of the parent, nor of any natural innocence of the child, but purely and solely in consequence of the child's relation to the kingdom or family of God, as a true and lawful member in consequence of the grace of God through the atonement. "Of such is the kingdom of heaven."

3. Baptism has the effect, not to regenerate the child, but to recognize it as a legitimate member of the family of God, "placing it in visible covenant relation to God, and under the special care and supervision of the Church."—In this definition all technical disputes are avoided, and all reasonable and scriptural precision is attained. All practical ends are hereby reached.

4. Infant baptism pledges the church, in its corporate capacity and through its proper spiritual leader—the pastor—to secure to the child a religious education. It also makes it the duty of the pastor to place the child under that Church care and discipline which its age, development and the circumstances of the case may require.

The great idea which underlies, comprehends and pervades all specific duties of the Church to the child, is this: the child belongs to the family of God, and should be recognized, treated and brought up as such. To bring up our children with the idea and belief that they have no connection with the visible Church—that the spiritual family of God is one thing, and the visible Church, by the decree and purpose of God, another; that although they may belong to the spiritual family of God, "or the kingdom of heaven," yet they stand in no relationship to the visible Church; to bring them up, we say, under this impression and belief, under this outside, anti-church influence, isolating and separating them from Church obligations and discipline, has, and must necessarily have an alienating tendency and must remove many salutary restraints and weaken many motives to early piety, and in its natural tendency, operate against the good effects of religious education and discipline.

5. As to the relation which baptism gives the child to any particular denomination of the Christian Church, we remark that neither adult nor infant baptism is sufficient for admission to membership in any Christian denomination. The Baptist Church, no less than any and all others, requires aside from baptism and over and above it, that the candidate give satisfactory evidence of experience of religion, a confession of faith, and a promise of conformity to covenant rules and Church authority. Baptism, then, is not of itself sufficient, but baptism places children under the care of the Church for nurture and discipline, and as they increase in years and understanding and give evidence of piety, they should be advanced to the full enjoyment of Church rights, under those prudential guards which the Church has always thrown around its membership.

6. As to the relation of baptism to communion, we have here room only to state the general doctrine of our Church on this point, viz: that each ordinance stands upon its own distinct basis of authority and evidence, presenting its own distinct claims, and is to be received only in accordance with its original design, and in the manner indicative in Holy Scripture. Baptism being the outward sign of inward, regenerating grace, may be applied to all who are in the actual possession of that grace, while the holy Supper being a memorial of Christ's death, can be lawfully received only by such as can by faith "discern the Lord's body," who receive him as their only Savior, and also, as often as they thus eat and drink, do it in remembrance of Christ." Our own doctrine and usage are fitly set forth in the section in question. We earnestly commend this whole subject to the candid, prayerful and mature consideration of the Church, and hope that a new and more wholesome admiuistration will obtain in regard to the oversight of children. The following was the report adopted, with a few verbal alterations:

OF BAPTIZED CHILDREN.

Question 1st. Are all young children entitled to Baptism?

Answer. We hold that all children by virtue of the unconditional benefits of the atonement, are placed in a state of grace, and are therefore morally entitled to the benefits of baptism; but as infant baptism contemplates a course of religious instruction and discipline, it is expected of all parents or guardians who present their children for baptism that they use all diligence in bringing them up in conformity to the word of God, and they should be solemnly admonished of this obligation, and earnestly exhorted to faithfulness therein.

Ques. 2d. What is the relation of baptized children to the Church?

Ans. We regard all children who have been baptized as placed in visible covenant relation to God, and under the special care and supervision of the Church.

Ques. 3d. What shall be done for the baptized children of our Church?

Ans. 1st. The preacher in charge shall preserve a full and accurate register of the names of all the baptized children within his pastoral care, with dates of their birth and baptism, and parentage and places of residence.

2d. As early as they shall be able to understand, let them be taught the nature, design and obligations of baptism, and the truths of religion necessary to make them wise unto salvation; let them be encouraged to attend class, and to give regular attendance upon all the means of grace according to their age, capacity and religious experience.

3d. Whenever they shall have obtained age sufficient to understand the obligation, and shall give evidence of a desire to flee the wrath to come, their names shall be enrolled in the list of probationers, and if they shall continue to give evidence of a principle and habit of piety, they may be admitted into full membership in our Church by the recommendation of a leader in whose class, by publicly assenting, before the Church, to the baptismal covenant, and also to the usual questions on doctrine and discipline.

4th. Whenever a baptized child is left by orphanage or otherwise, becomes deprived of Christian guardianship, the preacher in charge shall ascertain and report to the society or the leader's meeting, the facts in the case, and such provision shall be made for the Christian training of the child as the circumstances of the case admit and require.

RANDOLPH MACON COLLEGE.—The Richmond Advocate, gives a full account of the late Commencement. Rev. L. M. D. addressed the Societies. The College is highly landed. Dr. Smith tendered his resignation as President, but the Board received an earnest and respectful protest against its being received from a committee appointed in a meeting of Students so to urge. The latter declared, "that in their judgment the interests of the college, require the continued Presidency of Dr. Smith, and therefore they earnestly and respectfully request of him to withdraw his resignation." Dr. S. complied with this request. The Advocate says: "The condition of the College is promising. There are some drawbacks to its complete success; but time and Providence will, we devoutly pray, bring out for Randolph Macon College a glorious summation worthy of its character and history; and equal to the expectations of those who laid its foundations in hope, and have watched the progress with fervent prayers and growing interest."

ADMINISTRATION OF DISCIPLINE.—The Pittsburg Advocate says Bishop Simpson is about to issue a new edition of the Discipline, a very excellent work on the Discipline, a work that should be in the hands of all whose duty it is to administer Discipline. To young ministers especially it will afford invaluable aid.

MARRIAGES.

On the 19th June, in Ringgold, La., by Rev. James L. Wright, WM. H. COTTER to MISS E. A. FARESS, all of Ringgold, La.

DEATHS.

Died—On the 1st July, 1856, in Sumter county, Alabama, sister A. HALL, wife of Brother Archibald Hall.

It is painful to me to record this. She was more than a mother to me than a stranger. She embraced religion in North Carolina and attached herself to the M. E. Church, and when she came to this place with her husband and children, they all joined the church, and have stood as pillars of Coko's Chapel. Her age was 61 years. Forty-two years of that time was spent in the service of God, and as a faithful member of the Church she prayed much for her children and grandchildren, all of whom are members of the M. E. Church. I visited her several times during her last illness, and I found her confidence strong in the Saviour. I went to see her on the evening of the last day of June and found her worse, and remained with her until she breathed her last. Though sister Hall was a timid woman yet I have never seen such perfect composure. At one time she said, "Now Lord, lettest thou thy servant depart in peace." Looking at me she said "Brother Armstrong, Jesus can make a dying bed feel soft as downy pillows are." She said "My dear children don't weep for me, all is well." I never witnessed more triumphant death before in my life. May God give the aged companion and pious children grace to bring all to meet her in glory.

T. Y. ARMSTRONG.

Died—On the 11th June, 1856, in Franklin county, Miss., MRS. CLARISSA QUINCE.

The deceased leaves an affectionate husband and nine children to mourn her loss. The deceased was born in Franklin County in 1813, and in 1845 she joined the Methodist church, and about two weeks afterwards was soundly converted to God. Although she was burthened with the care of a large family, and constantly underwent an amount of physical suffering which it falls to the lot of few to experience, yet she was ever a consistent christian, and religion was her solace in death.

G. C. A.

Died—On the 14th of June, in Carroll County, Miss., MICAJAH T. PURNELL, infant son of John G. Purnell, aged 2 years 8 months and 4 days.

Suffer little children to come unto me and forbid them not for of such is the kingdom of heaven."

Fine New Wheat in Maryland.—The Baltimore Patriot, Saturday, July 5th, says: "The first of a crop of blue-stem white wheat, grown at 'Rose Hill,' near Cambridge, the beautiful residence of William Wilson Hyrn, Esq., late of this city, was sold on change to-day at $1 80, weighing 61 lbs per bushel, showing it had been handled in farmer like manner."

The Pensacola Gazette learns, from a reliable source, that the Montgomery and Pensacola Railroad Company propose to build the entire length of the Pensacola and Georgia road to the Chattahoochee for $500,000, with the portion of the Internal Improvement Fund to which the road is entitled, and the lands lately granted to the road by Congress.

We learn from a letter written on board the U. S. practice ship Plymouth, lying in Hampton Roads, under date of 2d inst., that she was to have sailed on a cruise on the next day. All were well on board, and all well pleased with the ship; she seems to be just the vessel for the purpose; works like a pilot boat and is a very fair sailer.

Catharine Albertie, a beggar and fortune teller, died in Raleigh, N. C., last week. On examining her effects, $2600 in gold, silver, and notes was found, together with evidences of her owning a plantation in Kentucky, and twenty shares of railroad stock. Around her body was found a belt full of gold coin.

At New Canaan, Connecticut, on the 4th July, while some persons were preparing to fire a salute, a boy threw a fire cracker among a pile of cartridges, exploding the whole, by which twenty bystanders were badly burned—one was killed outright, and five others are not expected to recover.

Mr. John Raynor, a well-known citizen of Boston, died in that city on the 5th inst., As a member of the Legislature, a director of the city institutions, a member of the City Council, and an officer of the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanic Association, the deceased evinced great fidelity and public spirit.

Destructive Fire in Philadelphia.—The five story brick flour mill of Mr. Penrose Warner, corner of Broad and Coates streets, Philadelphia, was destroyed by fire on Sunday the 6th inst. Loss estimated at $50,000.

Inauguration of the Statue of Washington.

The national birth day was celebrated with much spirit in New York. Besides the grand displays of fire works provided by the city government, bands of music were stationed in the squares, and H. K. Brown's statue of Washington, at Union Square, was inaugurated with imposing ceremonies.

The statue is a bronze equestrian figure. It has been for years in course of construction, weighs four tons, and is placed upon a plain granite pedestral weighing one hundred tons. The whole is forty feet high, the statue being fourteen and a half feet high. It cost $30,000, and was cast in Chicopee, Mass.

The costume of the figure is the Continental, the head being bare, and the hair gathered up and tied behind. When the shouts which arose on the unveiling of the statue had in some measure subsided, says the Tribune, the Rev. George W. Bethune delivered a discourse from the stand.

Dr. Bethune commenced by a eulogy on Washington as a soldier, a statesman, a citizen, and a father. It was thus, he said, that the consummate portraiture of our artist had revealed him to-day. He had not put off the Continental uniform, whose quaint rigidness was more graceful to our eyes than any classic drapery; nor had he dismounted from the charger that bore him through the vala fires of adverse batteries; but he had ridden from out the horrors of war, his heart inured only for its ends of justice, calmly restraining his proud steed amid the acclamations of victorious peace and assured liberty; his sword, ever wielded with strength, tempered by mercy, was firmly sheathed not to be drawn again, for his country's foes were vanquished and he knew no other; his broad, benign brow was bare in acknowledgment of our unanimous love; and, as he passed on from the great past of his glorious deeds into the great future which would develope the stupendous destines of the nation whose life he inaugurated, his hand was stretched forth with grave gestnre, not more in promise to national loyalty than in deprecation of the atrocious treason that would imperil our vital unity by goading the silliness of sectional jealousy into the blind fury of fratricidal hate.

Dr. Bethune diverged to the goodness of God in the gift of Washington, and after contrasting his character with that of Cromwell and Napoleon, proceeded to speak of his physical perfection. The effects of sin, he said, had been so deforming that we were often disappointed in the physical accidents of those we loved or venerated. But it was not so with Washington. His outward form was worthy of his magnanimous soul. No ideal of Phidias or Angelo equaled his reality. Gaze upon him there, his stature reaching the extreme height of our kind; his long, sinewy limbs compacted with graceful vigor; his chest round and full that his mighty heart might feel no constriction; his proportions harmonious as those of his soul; but above all, his head—the calm, massive brow, august in goodness; his firm, straight lips, eloquent, though closed, of truth and justice; the countenance, too, conscious of cares for a smile, of kindness for a frown—his whole presence the impersonation of himself. After paying a tribute of honor to the munificent citizens whose generosity had given New York this morning her noblest decoration, and to the artist, whom he introduced amid the heartiest applause, Dr. Bethune closed in these words:

"And now, fellow-citizens, not of this State, exult as we may at other times, and exult more we who were born on its imperial soil—in that designation—it is not equal to this occasion—citizens of the UNION, hear me and bear witness, that in the name and by the authority of those who have erected this statue, I give it, before God and our country, to the PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES!—From the St. Croix to the Rio Grande, from the Atlantic to the Pacific shores, it is theirs! And you, people of New York, individually and collectively, and not by any degradation of the trust, but as a democracy, shall be its guardians: "GOD SAVE THE REPUBLIC!"

New Cotton.—The steamship Perseverance, Capt. Sheppard, arrived this morning from Indianola and Galveston, brought one bale cotton of the new crop, consigned to Messrs. John Williams & Co. It is from the plantation of R. B. Wofford, Esq., and was shipped from Lavaca.

Meeting of the Bar.—There was a meeting of the Bar on Saturday in the Supreme Court Chamber, the object of which was to pay tributes of respect to the memory of the late Thomas R. Wolfe, Esq., a distinguished member of the New Orleans Bar. Christian Roselius acted as chairman, and T. L. Bayne as secretary. Resolutions expressive of the merits of the deceased, and of regrets for his untimely death, were adopted, with a resolution for wearing the usual badge of mourning for thirty days.

The trial of Hon. P. T. Herbert, for the murder of Thomas Keating, commenced in Washington on the morning of the 9th inst. He plead not guilty to the indictment. The court did not succeed in empanneling but five jurors on that day.

The counsel obtained in his case, are Messrs. J. H. Bradley, D. Ratcliffe and Hon. Percy Walker, of Alabama.

An interesting peculiarity connected with Mr. Hughes' recent telegraphic invention—is, that it will work perfectly in long circuits, and with unerring accuracy in all states of the atmosphere—neither mist, rain, nor snow having any perceptible effect. Therefore at seasons when instruments differently constructed are utterly powerless, even in circuits of fifty miles, this newly devised instrument will work reliably in circuits of one thousand or two thousand miles. This is certainly a great advantage.

Treasure Trove.—A vine-dresser of Albaye, near Romer is said to have found in a vineyard the celebrated ring of Polycratee. This treasure, the history of which is familiar to all readers of Schiller's ballads, was brought to Rome after the death of Polycrates, 522 years before the birth of Christ; it was seen also by Pliny, and mentioned by him. The Emperor Augustus placed it in a golden case, and deposited it for safety in the Temple of Concord. The stone of the ring is of considerable size, and oblong in form. The engraving on it by Theodore, of Samos, the son of Talikles, is of extraordinary fineness and beauty. It represents a lyre with three bees flying about; below, on the right, a dolphin; on the left, the head of a bull. The name of the engraver is inscribed in Greek characters. The upper surface of the stone is slightly concave, not highly polished, and one corner broken. It is asserted that the possessor of this ring has been offered $50,000 for it by an Englishman, but has declined it, expecting to make a more profitable bargain with the Emperor Alexander.

We give here a few practical hints on health, for the old and the young: The best remedy for eyes, weakened by night use, is a fine stream of water frequently put into them. Young people and others cannot study much by lamp-light with impunity. Sleeping rooms should have a fire-place, or some mode of ventilation besides the windows. The more clothing we wear, other things being equal, the less food we need. Reading aloud is conducive to health. Young ladies should be prevented from bandaging the chest; cases of insanity, terminating in death, have been known to begin in this practice. The best beds for children are of hair, and in winter of hair and cotton. Children and young persons must be made to hold their heads up, and their shoulders back, while sitting or walking. Children under seven years of age should not be confined over six or seven hours in the house, and that should be broken by frequent recesses. Coarse bread is much better for children than fine.

The machines now employed to manufacture envelopes are very curiously constructed. Each piece of paper, upon being cut into the proper shape, is placed on a kind of artificial hand, which conveys it over an aperture of the size of an ordinary letter, when a plunger drives it through, gumming and folding it. It then falls into a box, which, by revolving at intervals, is gradually filled up with packages of twenty-five, ready for use. These machines are capable of turning out eighteen envelopes per minute.

More Camels for Texas.—We learn from the Philadelphia Sun, that the United States storeship Supply, now at the Brooklyn Navy Yard, is to be sent in a few weeks, for a reinforcement to the stock of camels brought in by her on her last trip, and landed in Texas for the United States Government uses. It has been found that the experiment succeeds admirably, and that for the transfer of the United States stores across the plains of Texas, the camel is perfectly fitted, and withstands the soil and climate of the country without any difficulty. Thus far only thirty-five have been brought. It is intended in the next trip to bring fifty.

Magnolia Telegraph.

THREE DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

ARRIVAL OF THE AFRICA.

New York, July 11.—The Royal Mail steamship Africa, from Liverpool on the afternoon of Saturday, June 28, has arrived at this port.

Her advices are three days later than brought by the Baltic.

Commercial Intelligence.

The Cotton market was firm, with an active speculative demand. Lower qualities have advanced 4d.

The sales of the week amounted to 56,000 bales, of which 12,000 bales were taken on speculation, and 2000 for export.

The sales of Friday, the 27th, amounted to 1,200 bales, the market closing firm at the following quotations:

Orleans Fair, 6¼; Orleans Middling, 6¼; Uplands Fair, 6¼; Uplands Middling, 6 1-16.

The sales of Saturday were estimated at 10,000 bales, the market closing firm.

The whole stock in port amounts to 750,000 bales, of which 600,000 are American.

Havre, June 25.—Cotton.—The market is not so active, and prices are a little lower, the decline being mostly on lower qualities. Orleans tres ordinaire is quoted at 91. The whole stock in port is 130,000 bales.

Liverpool, June 28.—Flour is firmer, and better qualities is higher. Wheat 2d. higher. Corn is a trifle lower. Breadstuffs generally closed less firm to-day. Provisions are without change.

Money Market.

Consols for money are quoted at 95¼ to 95¾.

General News.

Palmerston, in the House, declined to assume responsibility, direct or indirect, in American affairs, as discussion would not conduce to a sooner settlement of them.

The papers contain a letter from Clarendon to Dallas in relation to the enlistment question and Central American affairs, expressing his (Clarendon's) satisfaction that Dallas had been authorized to negotiate a settlement of the latter question.

Markets.

New York, July 11.—Cotton has advanced, with sales to-day of 2,500 bales. Orleans Middling 11¼c., Upland 11¼c. Flour is easier. Ohio is quoted at $6 80. Wheat is lower, and the market is unsettled. Corn—the market is unsettled. Spirits Turpentine dull. Rice is active. Freights dull. Whisky 36c. Sterling Exchange 10c.

Cincinnati, July 11.—Flour $5 25. Mess Pork $19. Whisky 20½c.

THE SUMNER ASSAULT CASE.

Washington, July 12.—House.—In the Sumner case Mr. English wished to offer an amendment expressing disapproval of the assault, and disapprobation of the use of personally offensive language in debate.

This amendment being objected to, Mr. Campbell of Ohio moved the previous question with a view to a vote on Monday, with the understanding that the motion will be withdrawn if the members implicated desire to speak.

The Vote.

Washington, July 14.—In the House to-day, a vote was taken on the resolution to expel Mr. Brooks, of South Carolina, for the assault on Senator Sumner, of Massachusetts, with the following result: Yeas 121, nays 95. It requiring a two-thirds vote to expel a member, the motion was lost.

Mr. Brooks resigned his seat after the vote was declared.

Domestic Markets.

New York, July 14.—Flour is lower; Southern $7 to $8 75. Wheat is two cents higher. Mess Pork, $20. Whisky, 38 cents.

Cincinnati, July 14.—Flour, $6. Whisky, 30 to 30½ cents. Molasses, 52 to 53 cents.

ARRIVAL OF THE NIAGARA AT HALIFAX.

ADVANCE IN COTTON.

New York, July 15.—The Royal Mail Steamship Niagara, from Liverpool on the afternoon of the 5th has arrived at Halifax en route for Boston. Her advices are three days later then by the Canadian at Quebec.

Commercial Intelligence.

Cotton—The market had been active throughout the week, and we quote an advance of 1-16 to ¼d.

The sales of the week amounted to 80,000 bales, of which 15,000 bales were taken on speculation and 13,000 for export. The sales of Friday amounted to 4500 bales, the market closing quiet.

Our advices from Manchester report the weather favorable.

Breadstuffs are a shade lower, and the market shows very little speculative demand. Wheat had declined 2d. Flour was 1s. lower, the decline being chiefly on the lower grades. Corn had declined 1s.

Provisions remained dull and unchanged. Consols for money are quoted at 95¼ to 95¾.

American stocks are generally higher. U. S. stocks have advanced.

New York Market.

New York, July 15.—Cotton.—The market is firm, with sales to-day of 4,000 bales.

Flour has declined, and prices are irregular.

Wheat is 9cts. lower. Corn—prices are irregular. Spirits of Turpentine firm.

Rice—The market is dull, and there is no change in prices.

Freights are easier and active.

Affairs in Washington.

Washington, July 15.—Herbert's trial recommences to-morrow.

The Comptroller of the Treasury has decided in favor of Glover & Mathers' claim of $20,000 for contract for carrying the mails between Louisville and New Orleans.

The Senate passed the House bill appropriating $50,000 for the construction of roads in Minnesota and Nebraska.

Also, passed the bill amending the Naval Board act.

The House passed a resolution censuring Keitli for participating in the assault upon Senator Sumner, and exhonorating Mr. Edmonson of any participation.

Keith gave notice that he would speak to-morrow on that subject.

From the Picayune of Sunday we copy the following:

GENERAL NEWS.

The Central American Question.

Lord Clarendon, in his reply to the letter of Mr. Marcy, announcing the dismissal of Mr. Crampton and the British Consuls from this country, expresses the conviction that the British Government are right in every assertion which they have made.

Court Etiquette Difficulty.

Mr. Dallas had declined to appear at the Queen's levee, because an attache of the legation had been refused admission in consequence of his dress being pronounced objectionable.

Collections for Sufferers by Inundations.

The handsome sum of one hundred thousand [whether pounds, dollars, or francs, our dispatch does not specify, but we understand it to mean the first say £100,000.] has been collected in London on behalf of the sufferers by the late disastrous inundations in France.

Outbreak in Spain.

Disturbances had taken place at Valladolid, ostensibly caused by the dearness of provisions. Many houses were burned down during the riots, which, however, were subsequently quelled, and most of the ringleaders were arrested.

Secret Societies in Paris.

It is reported that numerous secret political societies had been discovered in Paris.

Russia.

Russia is reported to be busily engaged in making her defences at Nicolaieff and Sebastopol stronger than ever.

Italy.

Placards and addresses, exciting the people to pillage and assassination, are being circulated throughout Italy.

It is rumored that the King of Naples still remains disposed to reject the counsels of the Western Powers.

Interview between Francis Joseph and Napoleon.

It is rumored that the Emperor of Austria and Louis Napoleon contemplate a private interview.

France, Spain and Mexico.

The Spanish Government deny that France has offered to mediate between Spain and Mexico with reference to their existing difficulties. France, they say, has merely proffered her good offices in the matter; and Spain will reserve to herself the right to fix conditions and the nature of the reparation she will demand from Mexico.

Ship Destroyed by Fire.

The ship Golden Gate, bound from New York to Bombay, has been destroyed by fire and sunk.

FOUR DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMSHIP BALTIC.

The U. S. mail steamship Baltic from Liverpool, arrived at New York on the 6th inst., bringing dates from Liverpool to the 25th ult.

The Cunard steamer Africa arrived at Liverpool on the 22d ult.

A London paper thus condenses the news of the week as regards American relations:

Judging from the country newspapers, we should say that the whole country is delighted with the turn the American question has taken, and it is surprising how much the public has become enlightened on the subject by the cheap newspaper press, every paper of first-class having devoted itself to the national exposition of our American difficulties. The country also appears pleased with the nomination of Mr. Buchanan.

Our Liverpool correspondent adds that the feeling on American affairs has now subsided so much as to have no longer any unsettled effect on the markets, although several leading presses yet keep up their grumbling.

The London times advises that Great Britain hurry up the settlement of the Central American difficulty before Mr. Buchanan is elected President.

Nothing important has occurred in Parliament. The Parliamentary committee on the Danish Sound Dues had met.

A gentleman named Gainsborough, who uses only the initial "D," but who has enclosed his card to the editor of the London Star, writes that he is a near relative of Mr. Crampton, and thus terminates his letter:

"I have most strongly felt and most firmly believe, that the public interests have been overlooked for private considerations. Sir Philip Crampton, Baronet, of whom the late American Minister is the only son, and the Earl of Clarendon, during the Earl's Vice Royalty in Ireland, as well as in former times, when his lordship (then Mr. Villiers) occupied a situation in the customs in Dublin, were on terms of the most cordial and intimate friendship. Through his lordship's interest Mr. Crampton first entered the diplomatic service—through his lordship's interest Mr. Crampton was promoted to that exalted position he has recently filled, and in which, through his lordship's exertions, he has been retained until the President of the United States has been compelled to dismiss him, though the voice of the country and the honorable feelings of the majority of our countrymen felt that Lord Clarendon ought at once to have recalled him. I repeat, sir, and I fully believe that the public good has been sacrificed to Lord Clarendon's private friendship, and therefore, although personally I shall feel inclined to spare Mr. Crampton on the ground of our relationship, I put you in possession of these facts."

General Intelligence.—France continues interested on the subject of the Empress' regency.

The loss of the ship Ocean Queen, from London to New York, is recorded at Lloyd's.

The ship Moro Castle, of Windsor, has been found abandoned, and was towed into Crookhaven. Her masts were gone. She was timber laden.

The Emperor of Russia has constructed a new Cabinet, including Gortschakoff, Lanskol, Ostensacken and Orloff.

Advices from Parma state that the Grand Duchess, while attempting to leave her dominions, was arrested by the Austrian military authorities, and obliged to return to her capital. On remonstrating, she was told that as the government of Parma had called on the Austrian troops, it was necessary that the Sovereign should remain to countenance their acts.

Dismissal of Mr. Crampton.—We extract the following from the London correspondence of the New York Evening Post, under date of 17th June:

We are all in high spirits to day at the break down of Lord Palmerston on Crampton's dismissal. It was a bad thing for him to do, and both he and Clarendon were in favor of dismissing Dallas. They became convinced that a large majority of the House of Commons would oppose the measure, and that public opinion, including that of the Court, was strongly against them. There is no doubt that the Queen, advised by Prince Albert and the Duke of Cambridge, refused to sustain the dismissal.

I was at the House last evening, and it was a most interesting scene. The House was crowded by members and the galleries by strangers.

Lord John Russell spoke with great seriousness, and everybody felt that it was a most important crisis in the career of the Anglo-Saxon race. When Palmerston rose to announce the determination of the Ministry the silence was profound and the anxiety intense. At the announcement that they had determined not to suspend relations with the American Minister, there was a perfect thrill of emotion and satisfaction. So close the Cabinet kept the matter, that when I arrived at Mr. Dallas' to congratulate him, he had not received the slightest intimation as to his fate, and I had the very great satisfaction of announcing it to him and his family.

LATER FROM CALIFORNIA.

EXCITEMENT STILL CONTINUES!

THE VIGILANCE COMMITTEE UNDER ARMS!

By the steamship Daniel Webster, which arrived Saturday, we have full files from California up to the 20th ult. The following, which we compile from the summary of the Alta California of the 20th, will be found to contain all the intelligence of the fortnight before the sailing of the steamer:

Throughout the State the people have endorsed the various actions of the San Francisco Vigilance Committee, and in most parts there has been, and is now, more excitement than has existed in this city since the shooting of Mr. King and the execution of his murderer.

Reports from the mining region are remarkably favorable, and the prospect of immense yields are constantly looking fairer. No extraordinary discoveries have been made, but wherever the gold is being taken from the known diggings, the fact is made more evident that it is inexhaustible almost everywhere in California.

Agricultural pursuits are in a prosperous condition. The crops of wheat and other grains promise well, and all other products are as abundant as the farmer could desire. Farm labor is in demand, and the markets are over full of all the luxuries native to this productive soil.

The interior towns are active, the various routes of travel are thronged, and there are frequent accessions to the leaving districts.

Crimes and casualties have been numerous, but nothing of a very aggravated nature has occurred. Murranges and births transpire uninterruptedly, and quadruply surpass the instances of dangerous diseases and death.

Probably there never was a period when our people, even leading politicians, said less about political matters than now. No interest is manifested in the Presidential election; no special organization of parties for the canvass has taken place; the party presses are apathetic, and all the other wires seem to be rusty and otherwise out of repair.

In Sacramento, Stockton and other prominent cities, large meetings have been held to endorse the proceedings of, and sympathise with, the people's reform organization of San Francisco; and in the mines and mountain villages the same enthusiasm prevails.

The City.

On the 4th of June Gov. Johnson issued a proclamation declaring the city of San Francisco in a state of insurrection, and calling upon all persons subject to military duty in the third, fourth and fifth military districts, to hold themselves in readiness to do warlike service, under orders of the commander-in-chief and his generals of lesser rank.

This, and the accompanying documents, was received by the whole State with indignation. To those who had correctly estimated the objects, past and future, of the Committee, gubernatorial interference seemed uncalled for, especially inasmuch as Gov. Johnson withheld his proclamation until long after there appeared any necessity for its issuance.

Some proceeded to enroll themselves as directed, but nearly all such were friends and associates of the wretches impeached by the Committee.

Many of the organized military companies disbanded, surrendered their arms, and positively refused to engage in any attack on the people. Meanwhile the Committee opened their doors for recruits, and thousands hurried to join the organization.

Large quantities of arms kept coming, until five thousand muskets, thirty pieces of cannon, many small arms, and abundant ammunition and provisions and implements were gathered to the rooms in the Committee.

A regular system of military discipline was established, strong guards were mounted, and the whole force divided into ten regiments—each composed of the best men in the city.

A strong breast-work of sand bags was built in the night time, in front of the Committee rooms; a large bell was suspended on the roof of their buildings, to give instant alarm on the approach of danger, and several pieces of cannon were planted on the adjacent roofs, so as to command each street leading to the fortification.

While these formidable preparations were going forward, the Governor's officers and the public journals in favor of annihilating the Committee, labored excessively to obtain warrants, and succeeded in securing a ragged few hundred additional to the fierce desperadoes who flocked around the constitution and the Executive immediately on the appearance of his proclamation.

The Governor was now made to believe, by his personal advisers, that he could at once suppress the "insurrection." Accordingly, he went to Benicia to obtain arms and the various projectiles of war from the United States Arsenal; but Gen. Wool positively refused to accommodate "his Excellency" to his great annoyance and chegrin.

While at Benicia, a committee of gentlemen from San Francisco, but not members of the Vigilance Committee, waited on the Governor to endeavor to induce him to withdraw his proclamation. This he would not do, and in his reception of the committee forgot that gentlemanly deportment is asserted to be the public officer as the private citizen. He returned to Sacramento, much annoyed at General Wool, and convinced of the mysterious fact that "a mob" had possession of six thousand stand of arms and thirty pieces of cannon, which they had obtained without bloodshed, disturbance or objection on the part of the owners.

On the 6th instant it was deemed best by the Vigilance Committee to dispose of their stock of captured finery, consisting of six notorious individuals. Banishment was the sentence, and the culprits were marched to the dock and shipped to other lands.

On the 9th instant the Vigilance Committee issued an address to the people of the State, and their constitution.

Since the first shipment of rogues, the Committee have instructed John Crowe, J. W. Bagley, James Hennessey, William Hamilton, William, alias Jack McGuire, James Cusick, Terrence Kelly, and John Lawler, to leave the State of California, never to return, on or before the 20th of June. They must go!

Several additional arrests have been made, and before the work of the Committee is completed, the exports of knavery will have far surpassed the imports.

At noon on the 15th, an immense mass meeting was held of the friends of the Vigilance Committee. The Government forces have, as yet, made no hostile movement, though they have gone into camp near the city.

Thos. B. Cunningham, well known in New Orleans as being one of the principal persons engaged in the Theatre Alley murder a year or two since, has been arrested by the Vigilance Committee. He made a desperate resistance, slightly wounding one of the Vigilants, but was finally overpowered.

Mrs. Julia Deane Hayne and Mr. Chas. Pope had arrived in San Francisco, and were announced to make their first appearance on the 23d ult.

LATER FROM CENTRAL AMERICA.

ARRIVAL OF STEAMSHIP DANIEL WEBSTER.

The steamship Daniel Webster, from San Juan and Aspinwall, arrived here on Saturday morning, at an early hour.

From memoranda politely furnished us by purser Hart, we learn that the Daniel Webster arrived at San Juan on the 27th ult. There were at that port on her arrival, U. S. sloop of war Cyane and H. B. M. ship Eurydice.

The Daniel Webster only stopped at San Juan a few hours, and arrived at Aspinwall on the 30th.—The Isaac Law, from New York, arrived there early the next morning with 300 passengers, who, together with the passengers brought by the Daniel Webster, took the 9 o'clock train for Panama, and sailed the same evening on the steamer Golden Age for San Francisco. There were in harbor at Aspinwall, besides Golden Land and Free States and schooners Emily P. Russell and Triesta.

On the upward trip, the Daniel Webster arrived at San Juan on the 6th inst., and left the same day. Among the passenger from that port is Gen. Goicaria, Nicaraguan Minister to Great Britain and France, and a special Commissioner to the United States Government.

We have, by this arrival, dates from Panama to the 4th inst. From the Panama Star we learn that the U. S. Commissioner, A. H. Corwine, Esq., was almost through with his labors, having by great exertions placed himself in possession of evidence which fully proves that the natives and authorities of that place are alone to blame for the horrid massacre of the 15th April last.

Trains were making trips between Panama and Aspinwall in three hours.

The Panama Star says:

We learn from Commodore Watkins, of the P. M. S. Co.'s steamship Golden Age, that several of the officers of the revolutionary party, who were kept as prisoners in the Castle of Acapulco, were discovered in an attempt to escape from their confinement, plunder the city and get up a revolution, on the 10th of June. They had been tried for the offence prior to the sailing of the Golden Age from that port, and were all (some fifteen in number) sentenced to be shot on the 13th ult.

The Aspinwall Courier states that Gen. Mosquera has warmly urged upon the Government of Bogota the necessity of suitable reparation for the outrages committed on Americans at Panama on the 15th April last.

Later From Oregon.

Our California Exchanges have some intelligence from Oregon, received by the steamer Columbia, arrived at San Francisco on the 12th June.

We learn from the True Californian that the election, which took place in Oregon on the 2d ult., passed off quietly. Of the result little is to be learned, as the full returns were not known.

From the Indian war in the northern part of the Territory, we have the following, which we copy from the Portland Times, of the 7th ult.:

Expresses arrived at the Dalles on Saturday last—one from Col Wright, and one from Col. Shaw, of the volunteers at Steilacoom. It appears that Col. Shaw had sent an express through Na-chez Pass to Col. Wright, and when within ten miles of his camp they were met by about thirty Indians, and were forced to leave their horses, and run to the brush. They afterwards joined the regular express from Col. Wright's camp, in charge of A. J. Price, and arrived at the Dalles, as before stated, on Saturday last. They report the streams much swollen, and that the snow through Na-chez Pass, is from eight to ten feet deep—and that there is a well-beaten trail through.

The regulars, under Col. Wright, were encamped on Na-chez river. The main body of the Indians have moved their camp up the river, and but few of them remained near Col. Wright's camp.

Kamiakin has gone to see Looking Glass. He says that Looking Glass is the Chief who first recommended war on the whites.

Garry, Chief of the Spokans, has been to Col. Wright's camp in disguise. It is reported that the Spokans have entered into arrangements with Kamiakin to join in the war.

Col. Wm. Craig writes from the Nez Perce country that he is fearful the Nez Perce tribe are on the eve of breaking out into open hostilities against the whites.

Last Sunday some pack trains left the Dalles for Col. Wright's camp, taking sixty days supplies for the troops; and on the same day another train returned from Col. Wright's camp to the Dalles.

Rumors are rife that the Indians intend to get in the rear of Col. Wright, and cut off his communication with the Dalles, and then come in and take that point. The people at the Dalles are making deo arrangements for defence, in case of an attack.

There are hostile Indians in the vicinity of the mouth of Wind river, near Wind mountains on the Columbia river, between the Dalles and Cascades. The Indians had shot attack, while the settlers were taking their stock from a boat. Moccasin tracks, as well as fresh horse tracks, were discovered near by. The steamer Mary was to take a force of volunteers and regulars up to that point.

The Crops in Europe.—The Philadelphia Evening Bulletin, of the 7th inst., has the following interesting remarks upon this subject:

Next to our own crops, those of Europe have the closest claim to our attention. Every year the interests of the two continents become more nearly identified, since it has been ascertained that a deficiency in either can now, owing to recent improvements in transport, be readily supplied from the other. Such being the case, the present condition of several parts of Europe cannot fail to be of the utmost importance to our farmers and corn merchants. The vast inundations in France will, it is feared, have the effect of greatly raising the price of provisions and of limiting the crops, while we hear from more than one source that the export from Russia will be comparatively trifling. The entire north-west coast of Europe has suffered since early spring from an incredible drought. This absence of all rain has prevailed not only on the West coast of the Scottish Highlands and the Northern Islands, but has also afflicted the entire West coast of Norway. A dispatch in the Allgemine Zeitung from Stockholm, dated June 6th, states that from the 8th of March to the 16th of May, or for seventy-three days, there were but four wet days, and on these there only fell a slight drizzle. The late frosts and cold north-westers of spring were succeeded by unprecedented heat in the second week of May. This was in the vicinity of Bergen, which is usually so damp a neighborhood that "common as rain in Bergen," is a familiar proverb. As for Scotland, it is said that such a long continued "dry term" has not been known there for many years, especially in the western portion. Even the Crinan canal, which has hitherto been—copiously supplied by innumerable brooks and ponds, is nearly dried up, and has been closed to navigation.

A deficiency of breadstuffs in any part of Europe always causes a correspondding demand, and the threat of a serious diminution of supplies from so important a quarter as Southern Russia, is at least a promising sign for our farmers. Certainly the late increase in agricultural energy has not been in vain.

Manufacture of Musical Instruments.—The "Statistics of the Industry of Massachusetts for the year ending June 1, 1855, prepared from official returns by Francis DeWitt, Secretary of the Commonwealth," report the number of pianoforte manufactories in Boston to be 20, pianos manufactured in the year, 6,122; capital employed $941,600; all other musical instrument manufactories, 10; value of instruments manufactured, $1,984,700; capital $102,100; persons employed, 1,248. The value of the musical instruments manufactured in the year in the whole state, is set down at $2,295,680. Of this, Boston alone claims $2,004,700.

Machinery has reached a great state of perfection. We saw some wheat peas put into the hopper of a coffee mill, the other day, and in less than two minutes it was occupying a place in a grocery window, labeled "Old Government Java."

Later from South America and Australia.

The British mail steamship New Granada, from Callao, arrived at Panama on the 21st June. The dates received are: from Valparaiso, 31st May; Callao, 12th June, and Australia 28th March.

Among the passengers from Valparaiso was Mr. Green, bearer of dispatches to Washington from Mr. Blackwether, United States Minister to Chili. These dispatches, we learn, include the Treaty of Friendship, Navigation, Commerce and Extradition between Chili and the United States, and which is likely to meet with full approbation from both governments.

The intelligence from Valparaiso is of little or no importance. Business was dull, and the stock of merchandise of foreign manufacture largely exceeded the demand.

Mining industry continues prosperous, particularly the copper department, which is daily increasing.

The River Plata Provinces are still in difficulties and continue to be troubled by revolutions. Buenos Ayres was devising means against the inroads of the savages. Paraguay was preparing for a war against Brazil. This latter Province had got into difficulty with the new French settlers who had established a colony there under the name of New Bordeaux.

Peru and Bolivia were enjoying a momentary repast of peace, although the former was in daily expectation of an invasion from Echinique.

The yellow fever at Callao and Lima was diminishing.

From Australia we learn that the colony was in a most prosperous condition. The exportation of gold had increased largely. Precious stones, such as topazes, corundum, pyrites and serene, have recently been found in considerable quantities. Labor was in demand and commanded the highest prices.

Later From Texas.

ARRIVAL OF THE CHARLES MORGAN.

The steamship Charles Morgan, from Galveston and Indianola, July 10th, arrived here on Saturday morning.

By this steamer we have full files from all portions of the State, but they contain no intelligence of importance.

The Galveston News of the 10th complains of the drought, gardens are ruined and the cisterns getting empty. The same paper says:

This excessive drought seems to have prevailed generally in Western Texas, though they have fortunately been more favored in the East.

We learn from the Houston papers that Miss Mary Major, a young lady of that city, aged thirteen years, died very suddenly on the 5th instant. Upon a post-mortem examination of the body, it was found that she came to her death by taking strychnine.

The family of a Mr. Hogan was poisoned with arsenic at the same place a few days since; it was not known whether it was an accidental case or not.

We find the following letter from Madison, Orange cannty, dated July 1st, in the Galveston Civilian of the 8th instant:

In the last Weekly Civilian were some exaggerated accounts of our difficulties. There has been no regularly fortified

The Angel Barque.

BY L. VIRGINIA SMITH.

Little Cathleen, three-eyed, fair-haired child of six summers, was dying, and he bade his father and mother come near that he might tell them something. "Mother," said he, "will you not go with me?" "Where are you going, my child?" asked his mother. "With you, dear," was the fond answer, "to the land of the free, and the home of the brave." "Yes," and in a moment was in the arms of his father, who said: "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven."

From the ruby western bowers,
Through the fleecy fields of even
Up the purple ocean of twilight
Slowly sailed a snowy cloud,
Coming to meet the green sky-lands,
Coming to meet the starry islands,
Sailing, sailing until the zenith
Was encompassed in its shroud.

Never sun had come and parted,
Never moon that sea anchored,
Over before came seraphs sailing
On a skyward tending track.
Each a host, of God's evangel
Each had left—a tiny angel
On my bosom, gentle mother—
Now they come to call it back.

All his earthly mission ended,
On his little couch extended,
Lay he, watching with the spirit,
As its wave upon it flew dim;
Though by others all unnoted,
Watching where that vessel floated,
Among the waiting angels waited;
For he knew they came for him.

Many a sweet "good bye" he told ye,
Close his little arms enfold ye—
Signed the passing spirit, Even
Closed to the cadence of the chorus
As the angel-barque swept on;
Out on the ocean of the sunset,
Over the ocean of the morning's first beam,
Now alone on the waste of waters,
Now among the hosts of the free, and the home of the brave.

Ever on the ocean of the sunset,
Ever on the ocean of the morning,
Ever on the waste of waters,
Ever among the hosts of the free,
Ever among the hosts of the brave,
Ever on the haven of rest and the battle's confusion,
Ever on the haven of rest and the battle's confusion,
Ever among the hosts of the free, and the home of the brave.

Eighty Years Ago.

BY CHARLES SPRAGUE.

Eighty years have rolled away,
Since that high, heroic day,
When our fathers, in the fray,
Struck the conquering blow!
Praise to them—the bold who spoke;
Praise to them—the brave who broke
Stern oppression's galling yoke,
Eighty years ago!

Rear the wine of sacrifice,
Let the grateful anthem rise—
Shall we e'er resign the prize?
Never—never—no!
Hand to hand shall guard those rights,
Bought on Freedom's battle heights,
Where he fixed his signal lights
Eighty years ago!

Those who fell by the mighty dead—
Those who counselled, those who led;
By the tears your fathers shed;
By your mothers' woe!
By the living few—
By the wounds were scarred for you,
Make they flew
Eighty years ago!

The Star-Spangled Banner.

On the Fourth of July we visited, in company with some other gentlemen, nearly every music store in the city in search of a copy of our National Anthem. The search was unsuccessful until we got into a small music concern, where we procured a "song book"—the only copy on hand—in which, in happy juxtaposition with all the fashionable negro melodies of the day, we found the words of the anthem. Subsequently, at a dinner party, there was assembled seven gentlemen of intelligence and education, no one of whom could give the words entire of that glorious hymn. For the benefit of the gentlemen refered to above, our readers and the "rest of mankind," we append a brief history, and the words of the Star Spangled Banner.

The song was originally procured from Mr. Key by the late lamented John S. Skinner, who handed it to the editor of the Baltimore Patriot, Col. Isaac Munroe, who published it in his paper on the 20th September, 1814, with the following introduction.

[Crescent.

The following beatiful and animating effusion, which is destined long to outlast the occasion, and outlive the impulse which produced it, has been extensively circulated. In our first renewal of publication, we rejoice in an opportunity to enliven the attack of an exploit so illustrious with strains which so fitly celebrate it. This incomparable song was composed under the following circumstances: A gentleman [Francis S. Key, Esq.,] had left Baltimore with a flag of truce for the purpose of getting release from the British fleet a friend of his, who had been captured at Marlborough. He went as far as the mouth of the Patuxent, and was not permitted to return, lest the intended attack on Baltimore should be divulged. He was therefore brought up the Bay to the mouth of the Patapsco, where the flag vessel was detained under the guns of a frigate, and he was compelled to witness the bombardment of Fort McHenry, which the Admiral had boasted that he would carry in a few hours, and that the city must fall. He watched all day the flag at the Fort through the whole day with great anxiety that can be better felt than described, and the night prevented him from seeing it. In the night he watched the bomb-shells, and at early dawn his eye was again greeted by the proudly waving flag

STAR-SPANGLED BANNER.

O say can you see, by the dawn's early light,
What so proudly we hailed at the twilight's last gleaming,
Whose broad stripes and bright stars, through the perilous fight,
O'er the ramparts we watched were so gallantly streaming?
And the rocket's red glare, the bombs bursting in air,
Gave proof through the night that our flag was still there:
O say does that star-spangled banner yet wave
O'er the land of the free, and the home of the brave?

On the shore dimly seen through the mists of the deep,
Where the foe's haughty host in dread silence reposes,
What is that which the breeze, o'er the tow'ring steep
As it fitfully blows, half discloses?
Now it catches the gleam of the morning's first beam,
In full glory reflected now shines on the stream:
'Tis the star-spangled banner! O long may it wave
O'er the land of the free, and the home of the brave.

And where is that band who so vauntingly swore
That the havoc of war and the battle's confusion
A home and a country shall leave us no more?
Their blood has washed out their foul footsteps' pollution:
No refuge could save the hireling and slave
From the terror of flight, or the gloom of the grave,
And the star-spangled banner in triumph doth wave
O'er the land of the free, and the home of the brave.

O thus be it ever when freemen shall stand
Between their loved homes and the war's desolation
Blest with victory and peace, may the heav'n-rescued land
Praise the power that hath made and preserved us a nation!
Then conquer we must, when our cause it is just,
And this be our motto: "In God is our trust."
And the star-spangled banner in triumph shall wave
O'er the land of the free, and the home of the brave!

FLOUNCES.—Flounces are all the rage this season with the gentle sex. You can hardly be able to distinguish the embonpoint of one of your lady friends from a flounce of the other. The wilderness of flounces covers both will cover all physical defects, as silk seem to roll up from the floor like the head threatening to engulf the deluge.

We see in the streets, since hoops are gone, nothing but huge oceans of dry goods, from the vast circumference of which protrude at most two tiny gaiter boots, and on the top of which, at the top is suspended a bonquet in a flower pot, and between it a human face, the interval between the two appearances, like the huge continents of Africa and Australia, a terra incognita.

A man can be really known by his flounces, which are the true exponents of his own instincts, think of that, ye dandies. The stupid-looking fellow with cold-like bonnet, the man who can wink at the first time; when-ever you see a man with a flounce, you may know at once that he is a man of taste, and that he is in his way, a genius. Flounces are the optics that were given, from Heaven to Scott.

TO THE PEOPLE OF CALIFORNIA.

The Committee of Vigilance, placed in the position they now occupy by the voice and countenance of the vast majority of their fellow-citizens, as executors of their will, desire to define the necessity which has forced this people into their present organization.

Great public emergencies demand prompt and vigorous remedies. The people—long suffering under an organized despotism which has invaded their liberties—squandered their property—usurped their offices of trust and emolument—endangered their lives—prevented the expression of their will through the ballot-box, and corrupted the channels of justice, have now arisen in virtue of their inherent right and power. All political, religious and sectional differences and issues have given way to the paramount necessity of a thorough and fundamental reform and purification of the social and political body. The voice of a whole people has demanded union and organization as the only means of making our laws effective, and regaining the rights of free speech, free vote and public safety.

For years they have patiently waited and striven, in a peaceable manner, and in accordance with the forms of law, to reform the abuses which have made our city a bye-word; fraud and violence have foiled every effort, and the laws to which the people looked for protection, while distorted and rendered effete in practice, so as to shield the vile, have been used as a powerful engine to fasten upon us tyranny and misrule.

As republicans, we looked to the ballot-box as our safeguard and sure remedy. But so effectually and so long was its voice smothered, the votes deposited in it by freemen so entirely outnumbered by ballots thrust in through fraud at midnight, or nullified by the false counts of judges and inspectors of elections at noonday, that many doubted whether the majority of the people were not utterly corrupt.

Organized gangs of bad men, of all political parties, or who assumed any particular creed from mercenary and corrupt motives, have parceled out our offices among themselves, or sold them to the highest bidders;

Have provided themselves with convenient tools to obey their nod, as Clerks, Inspectors and Judges of election;

Have employed bullies and professional fighters to destroy tally lists by force, and prevent peaceable citizens from ascertaining, in a lawful manner, the true state of votes polled at our elections;

And have used cunningly contrived ballot-boxes, with false sides and bottoms, so prepared that by means of a spring or slide, spurious tickets, concealed there previous to the election, could be mingled with genuine votes.

Of all this we have the most irrefragable proofs. Felons from other lands and States, and unconvicted criminals equally as bad, have thus controlled public funds and property, and have often amassed sudden fortunes without having done an honest day's work with head or hands. Thus the fair inheritance of our city has been embezzled and squandered—our streets and wharves are in ruins, and the miserable entailment of an enormous debt will bequeath sorrow and poverty to another generation.

The jury-box has been tampered with, and our jury trials have been made to shield the hundreds of murderers whose red hands have cemented this tyranny, and silenced with the bowie-knife and the pistol not only the free voice of an indignant press, but the shuddering rebuke of the outraged citizen.

To our shame be it said, that the inhabitants of distant lands already know that corrupt men in office, as well as gamblers, shoulder-strikers, and other vile tools of unscrupulous leaders, beat, maim, and shoot down with impunity, as well peaceable and unoffending citizens, as those earnest reformers who, at the known hazard of their lives, and with singleness of heart have sought in a lawful manner to thwart schemes of public plunder or to awaken investigation.

Embodied in the principles of republican governments are the truths that the majority should rule, and when corrupt officials, who have fraudulently seized the reins of authority, designedly thwart the execution of the laws and avert punishment from the notoriously guilty, the power they usurp reverts back to the people from whom it was wrested. Realizing these truths, and confident that they were carrying out the will of the vast majority of the citizens of this county, the Committee of Vigilance, under a solemn sense of the responsibility that rested upon them, have calmly and dispassionately weighed the evidences, before them, and decreed the death of some and banishment of others, who by their crimes and villainies had stained our fair land. With those that were banished, this comparatively moderate punishment was chosen, not because ignominous death was not deserved, but that the error, if any, might surely be upon the side of mercy to the criminal. There are others scarcely less guilty, against whom the same punishment has been decreed, but they have been allowed further time to arrange for their final departure, and with the hope that permission to depart voluntarily might induce repentance, and repentance amendment, they have been suffered to choose, within limits, their own time and mode of going.

Thus far, and throughout their arduous duties, they have been, and will be guided by the most conscientious convictions of imperative duty; and they earnestly hope that in endeavoring to mete out merciful justice to the guilty, their counsels may be so guided by that Power before whose tribunal we shall all stand, that in the vicissitudes of after life, amid the calm reflections of old age and in the clear view of dying conscience, there may be found nothing we would regret or wish to change.

We have no friends to reward, no enemies to punish, no private ends to accomplish.

Our single, heartfelt aim is the public good; the purging from our community of those abandoned characters whose actions have been evil continually, and have finally forced upon us the efforts we are now making. We have no favoritism as a body, nor shall there be evinced in any of our acts either partiality for, or prejudice against any race, sect or party.

While thus far we have not discovered on the part of our constituents any indications of lack of confidence, and have no reason to doubt that the great majority of the inhabitants of the county endorse our acts and desire us to continue the work of weeding out irreclaimable characters from the community, we have, with deep regret, seen that some of the State authorities have felt it their duty to organize a force to resist us. It is not impossible for us to realize, that not only those who have sought place with a view to public plunder, but also those gentlemen who, in accepting offices to which they were honestly elected, have sworn to support the laws of the State of California, find it difficult to reconcile their supposed duties with acquiescence in the acts of the Committee of Vigilance, since they do not reflect that perhaps more than three-fourths of the people of the entire State sympathize with and endorse our efforts, and that as all law emanates from the people, so that, when the laws thus enacted are not executed, the power returns to the people and is theirs whenever they may choose to exercise it. These gentlemen would not have hesitated to acknowledge this self-evident truth had the people chosen to make their present movement a complete revocatoin, recalled all the power they had delegated, and reissued it to new agents under new forms.

Now, because the people have not seen fit to resume all the powers they have confided to executive or legislative officers, it certainly does not follow that they cannot, in the exercise of their inherent sovereign power, withdraw from corrupt and unfaithful servants the authority they have used to thwart the ends of justice.

Those officers whose mistaken sense of duty leads them to array themselves against the determined action of the people, whose servants they have become, may be respected, while their errors may be regretted, but none can envy the future reflections of that man who, whether in the heat of malignant passion, or with the vain hope of preserving by violence a position obtained through fraud and bribery, seeks under the color of law, to enlist the outcasts of society, as a hireling soldiery in the service of the State, or urges criminals, by hope of plunder, to continue at the cost of civil war, the reign of ballot-box stuffers, suborners of witnesses, and tamperers with the jury box.

The Committee of Vigilance believe that the people have entrusted to them the duty of gathering evidence, and after due trial, expelling from the community those ruffians and assassins who have so long outraged the peace and good order of society, violated the ballot-box, overridden law, and thwarted justice.

Beyond the duties incident to this, we do not desire to interfere with the details of government.

We have spared and shall spare no effort to avoid bloodshed or civil war, but undeterred by threats or opposing organizations, shall continue, peaceably if we can, forcibly if we must, this work of reform, to which we have pledged our lives, our fortunes and our sacred honor.

Our labors have been arduous, our deliberations have been cautious, our determinations firm, our counsels prudent, our motives pure; and while regretting the imperious necessity which called us into action, we are anxious that this necessity should exist no longer; and when our labors shall have been accomplished; when the community shall be freed from the evils it has so long endured; when we have instilled to our citizens an honest and vigorous protection of their rights, then the Committee of Vigilance will find great pleasure in resigning their power into the hands of the people, from whom it was received.

Published by order of the Committee.

[Seal of the Committee.] SECRETARY.

Constitution of the Committee of Vigilance of San Francisco.

Adopted May 15th, 1856.

Whereas, It has become apparent to the citizens of San Francisco, that there is no security for life and property, either under the regulations of society as it at present exists, or under the laws as now administered, and that by the association together of bad characters, our ballot-boxes have been stolen, and others substituted or stuffed with votes that were never polled, and thereby our elections nullified—our dearest rights violated, and no other method left by which the will of the people can be manifested:

Therefore, The citizens whose names are hereunto attached, do unite themselves into an association for maintenance of the peace and good order of society—the prevention and punishment of crime—the preservation of our lives and property, and to insure that our ballot-boxes shall hereafter express the actual and unforged will of the majority of our citizens; and we do bind ourselves each unto the other, by a solemn oath, to do and perform every just and lawful act for the maintenance of law and order, and to sustain the laws when faithfully and properly administered. But we are determined that no thief, burglar, incendiary, assasin, ballot-box stuffer, or other disturber of the peace, shall escape punishment, either by the quibbles of the law—the insecurity of prisons—the carelessness or corruption of the police, or a laxity of those who pretend to administer justice; and to secure the objects of this association we do hereby agree:

1st. That the name and style of this Association shall be the Committee of Vigilance, for the protection of the ballot-box, the lives, liberty and property of the citizens and residents of the city of San Francisco.

2d. That there shall be rooms for the deliberations of the committee, at which there shall be some one or more members of the committee, appointed for that purpose, in constant attendance at all hours of the day and night, to receive the report of any member of the Association, or of any other person or persons whatever, of any act of violence done to the person or property of any citizen of San Francisco; and if, in the judgment of the member or members of the committee present, it be such an act as justifies or demands the interference of this committee, either in aiding in the execution of the laws, or the prompt and summary punishment of the offender, the committee shall be at once assembled for the purpose of taking such action as a majority of them when assembled, shall determine upon.

3d. That it shall be the duty of any member or members of the committee on duty at the Committee Rooms, whenever a general assemblage of the committee is deemed necessary, to cause a call to be made in such a manner as shall be found advisable.

4th. That whereas, an Executive Committee has been chosen by the General Committee, it shall be the duty of the said Executive Committee to deliberate and act upon all important questions, and decide upon the measures necessary to carry out the objects for which this association was formed.

5th. That whereas, this Committee has been organized into sub-divisions, the Executive Committee shall have power to call, when they shall so determine, upon a Board of Delegates, to consist of three representatives from each division, to confer with them upon matters of vital importance.

6th. That all matters of detail and government shall be embraced in a code of by-laws.

7th. That the action of this body shall be entirely and rigorously free from all considerations of, or participation in, the merits or demerits, or opinion or acts, of any and all sects, political parties, or sectional divisions in the community; and every class of orderly citizens of whatever sect, party or nativity, may become members of this body. No discussion of political, sectional or sectarian subjects shall be allowed in the rooms of the association.

8th. That no person accused before this body shall be punished until after fair and impartial trial and conviction.

9th. That whenever the General Committee have assembled for deliberation, the decision of the majority upon any question that may be submitted to them by the Executive Committee, shall be binding upon the whole: Provided nevertheless, that when the delegates are deliberating upon the punishment to be awarded to any criminals, no vote inflicting the death penalty shall be binding, unless passed by two-thirds of those present and entitled to vote.

10th. That all good citizens shall be eligible for admission to this body, under such regulations as may be prescribed by a Committee on Qualifications; and if any unworthy persons gain admission, they shall, on due proof, be expelled: And believing ourselves to be executors of the will of the majority of our citizens, we do pledge our sacred honor to defend and sustain each other in carrying out the determined action of this Committee at the hazard of our lives and our fortunes.

ARREST AND RESISTANCE OF MORMONS AT BEAVER ISLAND.—The Detroit Advertiser, June 30, gives an account of the arrest, by the Deputy Sheriff of Machinaw county and his posse, of a number of Mormons at Beaver Island, who were accused of setting fire to some houses, committing thefts, and other depredations on other portions of the Island. At Beaver Harbor five men were arrested, and taken on board the steamer, charged with theft, etc. We were able to learn but two of their names. They are Field and Briggs. Considerable resistance was offered, and it was not until the armed posse with the Sheriff leveled their weapons to fire upon them that they submitted. While making these arrests, another man, whose name is Samuel Wright, interfered to prevent the arrests being made. He drew a pistol at one of the officers, but it was immediately taken from him, and he was taken on board with the other prisoners. The six were brought to Mackinaw, and are now confined at that place. It was thought that Strang, who was recently shot by some of his own sect, could not possibly survive. His lower limbs, from his hips down, were entirely paralyzed. The report that he would recover is thought to have been put afloat by the Mormons to intimidate people from coming there to make arrests. The two men who shot Strang also went up on the Michigan, and returned again to Mackinaw. Considerable excitement prevails at Mackinaw and Washington Harbor against Strang and his followers, and armed forces are fitting out at both places for the purpose of going to Beaver Harbor to make arrests. A company of one hundred men was already formed at Washington Harbor, and a company of fifty at Mackinaw. They would proceed to the Island with sail vessels. While the steamer Michigan was at the Island, A. R. Williams, of DeTour, was at Strang's house, and identified property which had been stolen from him some time previously. Strang had issued an edict, stating that he had a revelation from God; and that the United States steamer Michigan must never be allowed to enter the port of St. James again.

Thirty-Fourth Congress—First Session.

WASHINGTON, July 7, 1856.

Senate.—A message was received from the House announcing the passage by that body of the bill admitting the Territory of Kansas as a State into the Union, which message was referred to the Committee on Territories.

A joint resolution was reported from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to extend the mail route between the ports of Charleston and Havana.

A joint resolution was passed, authorizing payment to Wm. Carey Jones for services in settling private land claims in California.

A resolution was adopted in relation to certain Post Offices in the State of Iowa.

Several private bills on the calendar were taken up and disposed of.

The Senate then proceeded to the discussion of the veto message on the bill to remove obstructions from the mouth of the Mississippi river. The bill was discussed by Messrs. Slidell and Cass, the latter of whom was speaking when our report was closed.

House.—The Speaker stated the question to be on the motion heretofore made by Mr. A. K. Marshall, of Kentucky, to suspend the rules to enable him to offer a resolution directing the Clerk of the House to furnish and deliver to each member and delegate of the House, who have not already received them, such numbers and editions of such books of a public character as were furnished to the new members and delegates of the last Congress.

The motion to suspend the rules was agreed to, and the question being on the resolution of Mr. Slidell—

Mr. Sherman, of Ohio, moved a resolution for the same, providing that the members of the House who have not already received them, shall be entitled to the same books, or others of equal value, as were furnished to the members of the House of the 33d Congress, etc.

Mr. Jones, of Tennessee, moved to lay the whole subject on the table; which motion was disagreed to.

The substitute of Mr. Sherman was then disagreed to—yeas 84, nays 116.

Mr. Watson, of Ohio, moved that the resolution be laid on the table; which motion was negatived—yeas 73, nays 96.

The yeas and nays were being taken on the passage of the resolution when our report closed.

WASHINGTON, July 8.—In the Senate, the Committee on Territories reported back the House Kansas-Topeka bill, amended by substituting the Senate bill. The amendment was adopted, and the bill passed.

The House postponed the consideration of the Brooks affair, in consequence of its being before court to-day. Mr. Orr moved the previous question on bills passed by Senate for improvement of the mouth of the Mississippi, St. Clair's and St. Mary's rivers, all of which were passed in the House by a constitutional majority. Mr. Washburn, of Illinois, gave notice that he would move to pass over the bills now before the Committee of the Whole, and ask the passage of all other laternal improvement bills heretofore reported. The House then adjourned.

WASHINGTON, July 9, 1856.—Senate.—A message was received from the House, informing the Senate that they had passed, by a two-third vote, certain bills for river and harbor improvements, vetoed by the President.

Immediately after which, a resolution was offered by Mr. Benjamin, instructing the Secretary of the Senate to place the same in the hands of the Secretary of State for file; which was passed.

A report was made by the Committee on Printing, in favor of printing 20,000 copies of Senate bill for the admission of Kansas into the Union, which gave rise to debate. The discussion was going on when our report closed.

House.—Mr. Campbell, of Ohio, asked leave to submit a resolution to change the daily hour of meeting from 12 to 11 o'clock, A. M.

Mr. Wheeler, of New York, objected.

Mr. Cragin, of New Hampshire, from the Committee on Printing, reported a resolution for printing 100,000 extra copies of the majority and minority reports of the select committee appointed to investigate the assault upon Senator Sumner.

Mr. Cubb, of Georgia, moved to limit the number of copies to 10,000.

Mr. Sneed, of Tennessee, moved that the whole subject be laid on the table—which motion did not prevail.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays on the amendment of Mr. Cobb, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 98, nays 89.

The resolution as amended was then agreed to—yeas 129, nays 68.

Mr. Ball of Ohio, then asked leave to offer a resolution in regard to frauds by certain officers connected with the Treasury Department, and for the appointment of a special committee on the subject.

The net earnings of the Michigan Central Railroad, for the past year to June 1, were $1,228,625—do. for 1855, $673,408—increase $553,157.

An American Belle in Paris.

The Paris orrespondent of the Boston Post gives the following as a correct translation which Eugene Guinot gives in the Pays of the engagement of Miss Ray, of New York, to the Baron de Courval, of Paris:

They have announced this week the approaching denouement of a little comedy played on the theater of the Parisian world, which is not without some piquancy. At the commencement of the winter one of the most noticeable persons in the elegant saloons of the Faubourg of St. Germain, was a young demoiselle recently arrived from the United States, who after obtaining considerable success by her personal charms, became a character of the utmost importance when it was rumored about that she possessed a dowry of a million of dollars—five millions of francs! Such facts always make themselves known in detail, and it was soon generally understood that the young lady held her fortune by an heritage paternal and maternal, that is to say, she was an orphan, and as such perfectly independent, and mistress of her hand—a thing scarcely comprehended in France—to dispose of it in marriage, or withhold it, according to her own sovereign will and pleasure. Such a prize operated like magic upon all the young men about town. They left their clubs and places of resort, their horses, cigars and ecarte, to appear in society, in hopes of meeting the young stranger, and obtaining such an influence over her that ultimately they might more freely resume their habits by the aid of the million which composed her dot. Observing ones derived infinite amusement from this steeple chaise after an heiress, numby gentlemen habituated to galloping over a different turf, and but little familar with the precincts of the salons. Many among them, nevertheless, displayed considerable grace and address, but all the crowd of brilliant and aristocratic cavaliers were distanced by Monsieur the Baron de C——, a young man, well born and well placed, who from the commencement seemed to have the advantage over his rivals. He was favorably received, showed himself attentive and assiduous, and the world waited the celebration of the nuptials, when, all of a sudden, the heiress left Paris, and embarked from Havre for the United States! This extraordinary move created a great sensation. No body could comprehend this caprice, this flight, and consequent defeat of a pretendant who seemed to have only a day previous such prospects of success in his aspirations to her hand and fortune. It appeared subsequently that he had offered himself, his name, chateau, etc., and the young miss had replied with a sang froi! truly American—I must have three months' reflection! And she had departed for the purpose of reflecting in America, though universally it was believed that she had simply meant a considerate refusal, and that the marriage would never take place. Three months rolled by, and at the expiration of that time, the youthful baron received a letter from the United States containing only these three words—

"Venez me chercer!"

Delicious lacouicism! Of what use long-thy phrases when everything may be expressed in three words? While his parents and friends had lamented the apparent rupture, the Baron alone had preserved a hope. He only had comprehended the delay demanded by the lady and the natural desire which she felt to visit once more her native land, to say toathe scenes and souvenirs of her infancy one brief adieu before leaving them forever. The sequel proved the correctness of his impressions and the worthiness of his confidence, and, as may be imagined, he hastened joyfully to obey her summons. The day following the arrival of her letter the Baron started with his mother and a young brother for Liverpool, there to embark on the first steamer for the United States, and next winter the Parisian beau monde will count among its members one pretty woman and elegant establishment the more.

WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE.

OF all the pernicious humbugs that ignorance ever preached, the quackish idea that internal worms are not injurious, is the most cruel. They engender incurable diseases of the stomach and bowels, and are the fruitful causes of Chronic Diarrhœa and Chronic Dysentery, Inflammation of the Mesentery, Epileptic Fits, Insanity, Imbecility, Consumption and Apoplexy. In fact the disease says the very foundation of vitality, and lends with absolute certainty, unless arrested in time, to an early death. Let parents reflect—Indigestion, Fever, Headache, and every disease in time with that infallible preparation, which the faculty have pronounced a specific, WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE.

IMPROVED EAGLE COTTON-GINS.

Warranted to separate the Seeds, Dirt and Trash from the Cotton, without injury to the Staple.

DEPOT NO. 57 ST. CHARLES STREET,
Touro Buildings, four doors from St. Charles Hotel, New Orleans.

THE Proprietors of the EAGLE COTTON-GIN MANUFACTORY furnish Saw Cotton Gins of every description, adapted to every variety of cotton, and warranted superior in every respect, viz:

POWER GINS, of from 25 to 80 or 100 Saws each, for horse, steam or water power—will turn out from two to ten bales per day of clean Cotton, of 450 pounds each.

HAND GINS, of from 10 to 20 Saws each, so constructed as to be driven by cranks upon the Saw-Cylinder shaft, or at a much greater speed by an extra driving pulley—will clean from 150 to 450 pounds per day.

These Cotton Gins combine all the late improvements in machinery, and are warranted of the best materials and workmanship.

A MEDAL was awarded to the Manufacturers of the Eagle Cotton-Gin by a Jury of the Royal Commissioners connected with the Exhibition of the Works of All Nations, at London, in the year 1851, as will be seen by the subjoined copy of a letter received by them.

Executive Mansion, Washington, January 31st, 1853.

To the Proprietors Eagle Cotton-Gin Co.

GENTLEMEN: I have the pleasure to inform you that a Jury of the Royal Commissioners connected with the Exhibition of the Works of all Nations, at London, in the year 1851, in consideration of your having exhibited a specimen of a Cotton-Gin, has awarded you an Exhibitor's Medal, Certificate, and a Copy of the Reports of the Juries.

These articles are in the possession of Col. Peter Force, of the city, Chairman of the American Executive Committee, and will be forwarded to you by such mode of conveyance as you shall suggest.

Very respectfully, your obedient Servant,
MILLARD FILLMORE,
Chairman of the Central Committee, U. S.

PETER FORCE,
Chairman of the Executive Committee.

A Prize of $1250, and a Gold Medal

Was awarded to the Eagle Cotton-Gin Co., by the Agricultural and Horticultural Society of India, for a Gin-Stand for making fine Cotton, as will be noticed by the following copy of a letter dated—

Agricultural and Horticultural Society of India,
Calcutta, September 24, 1853.

GENTLEMEN—I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 14th July, 1851, advising the despatch of a Cotton-Gin to compete for the prize of Rupees, 5000, offered by the Government of India in 1849, through the Agricultural and Horticultural Society of India.

In reply thereto, I have now the honor to enclose two Bank of England Post Bills, being the equivalent of the sum of Rupees, 2500, which has been granted to your machine.

I have further the pleasure to inform you that the Society has been pleased to award you its Gold Medal on the same account, and which will be forwarded you by another opportunity as soon as the inscription has been placed on it.

I am, Gentlemen, yours faithfully,
H. BLECHYNDEN,
Secretary A. and H. Society of India.

A medal was also awarded them at the Crystal Palace, New York.

Some of the peculiarities of the Eagle-Cotton-Gin are the following:

The "Retached-Grates," EXCLUSIVELY used by us and PATENTED, are so formed that when set in the frame or breast, the top is entirely detached from the breast, as well as from the other grates; and when the Gin is in operation, the fibres of the cotton, which are partly separated from the roll by the saw-teeth, are permitted to pass freely between and underneath them, and to clear themselves from the tops of the grates. The tendency to choke and clog, and the consequent increase of friction and injury to the staple, which attends the use of the other various forms of grates, is thereby avoided, and the power with which the cotton is detached from the seed and carried through by the saw-teeth, is peculiar to this form of grate. They are clothed or hardened at the point where the saw-teeth pass, and the strictest attention is paid to their finish and setting.

The "Improved Brush" is also peculiar in its construction and mode of operation, the object of the invention having been to combine the advantages of the Cylinder, or close, and the winged or open Brushes, and to avoid the objectionable features of each of these forms. The supply of air for the Gin-Stand (the regulation and control of which is one of the most important functions of the Brush) is admitted through openings in the Brush heads, and it is forced out, when the Brush is in motion, through long narrow slits or opening at the circumference of the Brush and between the rows of bristles. The several thin sheets or currents of air act alternately with the rows of bristles to detach the fibres of cotton from the saw-teeth in numerous portions, and, with the aid of the "Patent Meter," give to the cotton, when delivered into the lint-room, that peculiar combed or carded appearance so well known and so much desired by purchasers.

This Brush may be made to blow through a flue of twenty or thirty feet in length, or may be used with a short line, as may be preferred. The varying eddies and counter currents of air which attend the use of the common open or winged Brushes are entirely avoided, and a uniform and steady draft, of any desired strength, may at all times be secured by varying the speed, the depths of the wings, or the area of the space through which the air is supplied.

The "Sliding Butts or Hinges," by which the Breast or Grate-Fall is attached to the frame of the Stand, were invented and applied to the Eagle Gin Stand, in order to adapt it more fully to the different views and wishes of planters, to the varieties of cotton, and to the various states of the cotton of different pickings. A peculiar curve is given to the front surface of the grate, at the point where the saw-teeth pass, and the front of the saw-teeth may be made to assume any desired angle with this curved surface of the grate, at the pleasure of the ginner, thus enabling him, to adapt the machine to the different varieties of cotton, or to the different states of it, and to gin fast or slow at pleasure. This invention, although it may not be of value, so as to be one of the most useful ever attached to the Cotton-Gin, and, when properly understood and adjusted, it gives to the ginner almost perfect control over the product of the gin, determining, in a great measure both the quantity and quality of that product.

In making the saw teeth, to ensure the greatest accuracy possible, an instrument invented especially for the purpose is made use of, called the "Dentometer," or tooth-measurer. By this instrument, the exact angle of every saw is measured when the tooth is cut; so that the various angles described above can always be determined with great precision, and the range of grinding angles may be varied to any desired extent.

Startling and Interesting Facts

CONCERNING

CHOLERA, DIARRHŒA, DYSENTERY, COLIC,

Summer Complaints, etc.

A fact that should startle us this; One feels a slight uneasiness in the bowels, a slight diarrhœa comes on, which is little thought of in a short time, in a few hours, perhaps, seldom days. It is attended with sickness of the stomach, a most sinking weakness, rapid discharges, colduess, cramps, agonies, blackness, collapse, DEATH—and yet all this fatal result from a disregard of the warning, premonitory Diarrhœa, and neglect of a wise provision of a safe and sure remedy that kind Providence has made easy to all.

This remedy is made public from the strongest desire to rescue the exposed, under the best substantial conviction that it is certain in its good effects, and with it on hand, no one heeding the warning and using the remedy, need be a victim to the Cholera.

DR. BILLINGS'

CARMINATIVE and ASTRINGENT SYRUP

IS THIS SURE REMEDY.

By the advice and urgent request of hundreds, whose lives have been saved—of many even when apparently in the very last struggles of death—he has been induced to make still more efforts to give a wider publicity to a remedy so greatly successful.

The perfection which he and others ascribe to this remedy may appear beyond the power of medicine to possess; yet the truthfulness of the claim is most thoroughly established, and will be fully confirmed by calling on the individuals who have witnessed its effects, and used it with complete success, some of whose names we are authorized to give.

For Cholera; Colic, Cholera Morbus, Dysentery, Diarrhœa, Bloody Flux, Summer Complaint and Weakness of the Bowels, this medicine is offered as a certain remedy. This is the medicine that arrested that horrible disease so prevalent among the Mexican soldiers. The officers first commenced its use, after which they gave it their soldiers, and cured in every case without an exception. I would refer to the officers and others who served in the war with Mexico. Sold by

CORRESPONDENCE UP THE RIVER.

Chicago—Its Streets—Bridges and Progress—View and Temperature—Excursion in Harvest Time Southward—Janesville and the Country—North Western University—Biblical Institute—Abolitionism.

Wan Bun, and travelers, and the winds have said and whistled as much about Chicago as any other place of the "Great West." Its rapid growth in men, brick and commerce excites the remark and wonder of every body. It has made most giant strides the last ten years, and now nimbees nearly one hundred thousands people. An increase of ten thousand a year is the present estimate, and to come at the true figure, this must be reckoned with the census of eighty thousand taken sometime ago. There are other towns in the West whose progress is astonishing, but none that equal Chicago in this respect. It has all the indications of growth, so many indeed, that the impression is almost painful to a quiet loving spectator. While in the city you feel like one in a half-finished house, before the carpenter and upholsterer have done with it. Nearly everything is new and unfinished, and there is a bedlam of mechanical sounds issuing from every house, and filling the streets with its din. The side walks are so obstructed with building materials, and with half finished improvements, that the pedestrian is in constant danger of breaking his neck. Five years hence a visitor will find it far pleasanter than at this time. By that time the broken streets, and elegant buildings in course of erection, will be completed, and the city will wear a more settled and substantial aspect.

From the top of the Tremont House the physical geography is finely mapped. The area covered is one third less than that of New Orleans, and surface appearance is much like the Crescent, flat and low. The green prairies are spread out in the rear, and extending quite to the horizon. In front is the blue and placid expanse of Lake Michigan, dotted with numerous sail, coming into port and departing from it. Right in the midst is the Chicago river which is the commercial artery through which the life blood of trade circulates. The wharves, and channel are so thronged with shipping that you can see nothing of the water except a narrow passage just wide enough for the passage of boats. About one mile from the mouth the river is divided into two branches, which turn to the right and left; and intersect the main trunk at right angles: The whole looks like an artificial canal, having the shape of the letter T. This is the skelton upon which the city is filled out and almost equally on all sides. The lake affords no harbor, and there are no wharves on its shore. All the shipping enters the river, and receives and discharges freight in the very heart of the city. Localities are designated by their position on the river. There are two sides to most things, but Chicago has three, north side, south side and west side. Eleven years ago the town was mostly on the north side, and filling the angular nook between the north branch and main river. Now the south side is most prosperous, and contains the principal hotels and business marts. The west side which skirts the prairie, answers to our Fourth District, and is the Garden City proper.

One of the most amusing annoyances is the crossing of the river from one side to the other. The boats have the right of way in all cases and the bridge must open when they approach. The dense procession of men, women, children and vehicles, is parted asunder in a moment, and as the bridge swings around the throng sometime find itself in full retreat, and going off the way they come on. The hurry, bustle and striding of the foot people as the bridge is opening is most exeitingly ludicrous, such dodging and such perilous jumping is amusing to one who is out of practice. To find yourself at the extremity of a line two squares long and waiting for your turn is vexatious, and if the matter is aggravated by the circumstance you have but an evening to see the city in and that you are paying a dollar an hour for your ride, the trial of patience becomes sublime! Some remedy is demanded, but nothing feasible has yet been suggested. It remains therefore that the good people of Chicago keep their legs and their patience in lively exercise until the advent of the "good time coming," for which beyond a peradventure they must "wait a little longer." The temperature here is fickle. When there is no wind it is stewing hot, the breeze from the south and west prairie is like the breath of the Lybian desert. The North and East winds which come over the lake are salubrious and bracing. The wind often changes in an hour, and your apparel must change with it.

An excursion through Central Illinois takes us through the grain regions where the fields are white to the harvest, and the yellow cereals wave in the breeze of the prairie. God made this country for the farmer, no forests are to be felled and cleared, and no marsh and swamps are to be reclaimed. The virgin soil lies open to the hand of culture, and the primal sward kindly invites the ploughman's coulter. The implements of improved agriculture attract our attention; ploughs which turn wide furrows go without holding; and reapers with their airy reels, which mow the wheat fields and lay the sheaves ready for the binder. Here the sweet, new mown hay scented with clover blossoms is spread to dry and there the harvestmen are stacking wheat for the thrashing time. The whole country is filled with fragrance, and the smell of it "is as the smell of a field that the Lord hath blessed." What manifold and healthful industry have we here, and what scenes of rural beauty and pastoral delight! The agricultural resources of this country are beyond computation. With a soil whose fertile depths are unfathomed, and with a climate favorable to the most valued products, no effort of prophetic exageration can ever estimate them.

If we go in another direction the same surprising beauty and fertility are found. Taking boat or car, we are in Milwaukie in a few hours; a city which has attained the growth of thirty thousand inhabitants in fifteen years. From thence, by rail, we penetrate Southern Wisconsin to Janesville, on Rock river. This is a ten year old town, of nine thousands souls, and the center of the most beautiful of this all beautiful land. Some of the heterodox citizens stontly contend that this was the location of Eden; and apart from history, we think, probabilities favor the conclusion. With soil equally good, it is more undulating and pictureque than Central and Southern Illinois, and the productions are nearly the same. The winters are said to be longer, by one month, and much colder. These July days are not unlike the pleasant October weather of Louisiana. You have heard much and published considerable, concerning the North Western University. Rather more than two weeks since, in company with some of the trustees, I visited this site of the institution. It is eleven miles from Chicago, and but a few minutes ride on the cars. They have about five hundred acres lying between the railroad and the lake, and well adapted to the purpose. Groves of noble forests trees cover the most of it, and already quite a village has been built up, in the vicinity. The town is named for the President of the Board of Trustees. This is a sin against euphony, but Evanston, will doubtless hand the name of Dr. Evans down to future generations. We were present at the annual meeting of the Board, during the first day of its session, and were entertained with the usual routine of business in such bodies. There were ministerial representatives from several Conferences, and a number of lay trustees; I suppose thirty in all.—From the report of the financial agent it appeared that affairs were progressing satisfactorily; scholarships to the amount of eighty or ninety thousand dollars have been sold and the sales are going on briskly. The present assets of the corporation, in scholarships, real estate and money, at a low estimate, and above all indebtedness are put at two hundred and fifty seven thousand dollars. The ground cost them about twenty-five thousand, and they have already received fifty thousand from the sale of lots. The University buildings are not erected and will not be for some time, probably not until the five hundred thousand dollar endowment is reached. Temporary buildings have been put up at a cost of five thousand dollars, and the literary department is organized, and under way with a dozen students. At present they seek to accommodate only the holders of scholarships who may insist on sending students before the complete organization of the university. The election of President was interesting, and debate exciting. Dr. R. S. Foster, of New York, received a majority of votes, and the chairman declared him duly elected. Mr. Watson, Editor of the North Western, and Dr. Dempster, of the Biblical Institute, were present and participated in the proceedings.

You have heard of the Garrett Biblical Institute, with its splendid endowment of three hundred thousand dollars, and with Dr. Dempster at its head.—This is at Evanston, but is entirely independent of the University. Curiosity led me to the building which is a good three story house and designed for temporary use. The institution is on the lake shore and the students are practical successionists, following literally in the footsteps of the apostles.—Their seins are hanging along the bluffs, and under it their fishing boats are moored. This is vacation and all is quiet and the rooms are mostly deserted. Thirty students were here last session or nearly that number. The course of study embraces three years; and the classes are arrayed in Junior, Middle and Senior. Notwithstanding opposition from some quarters, the Northern Church will give the policy of Theological institutions a fair trial. I wish we had an opportunity of making the experiment in the South. The course of study which I append may be interesting and suggestive to our ministerial brethren. But this too long letter must come to an end with another paragraph.

This country is filled with eastern people and eastern influence, and Black Republicans are thick as blackberries. A cool, conservative, sensible man is a most refreshing rarity. Abolition fanaticism was never higher, it taints every class, and nearly every social organization. Last Sabbath morning I occupied the pulpit of a circuit preacher in Wisconsin. He was a native of South Carolina, a man of noble heart and conservated principles; and this man is actually persecuted in certain quarters because he will not desecrate the pulpit and the Sabbath with sermons on slavery. In the evening, after preaching in a congregational church, the good pastor in his prayer made special mention of the bondmen. After the benediction, a woman delivered a lecture on Slavery, which self respect, and respect for the time and place did not permit me to hear. These are only straws which show the drift of things.

Have Mercy on the Children.

The Independent, in an article on the physical degeneracy of the American people, speaks as follows: "The child's will governs too much. If they do not choose to go to bed they sit up; if they choose certain articles of food they must have them, parents forgetting that instinct is no safe guide in a child, whatever it may be in an animal. So we see them in their delicate organization, keeping late hours when they should go to bed with the birds; sleeping often in warm and lighted rooms, when the sleeping room should be cool and dark; and eating hot bread, pudding and cake, and drinking tea and coffee to the infinite detriment of nerves and stomach. The injury thus early done can never be repaired; as a machine imperfectly constructed at first can never be made to run faultlessly. This is the secret. Parents should know that instinct is no safe guide to a child, particularly when the child is surrounded on all sides with poisonous delicacies. To ask a child at a modern table what it will have, and give what it asks for, merely because it asks for it, is a very common practice. But it is as cruel as it is common. Have mercy on the children.

OUR NASHVILLE CORRESPONDENCE.

NASHVILLE, July 15, 1856.

Mr. Editor:—We have an occasional excitement in our usually quiet city, and as I think of nothing better to tell your readers, here is the last one.

A little after high noon of Wednesday, the 9th inst., every body was called out to look at a fire then raging in the heart of the city. It proved to be a very extensive affair; beginning at the corner of Cherry and Church streets, and consuming every building on both sides of Church street for a square, excepting one brick dwelling house and the First Presbyterian Church. The flames also spread half a square each way from their starting point on Cherry street, burning up with resistless fury every thing before them. McKendree Church, on the square above, was on fire several times, as were also many other buildings in the immediate vicinity. Mr. McComb's furniture manufactory, in which the fire originated, several dwelling houses, various offices, the Masonic Hall, and a lumber yard were all entirely consumed, and the scene of ruins now presented to the eye is dreary enough.

This fire had the good manners finally to stop of its own accord, for I grieve to say that in the midst of many other and valuable improvements, we have not even the ghost of a respectable fire company. I hear that some of our more energetic citizens are forming a new company, to be composed only of steady, reliable men, who will feel some responsibility in such emergencies. This is cheering, for we have had several severe warnings within a year or eighteen months past, and under the present state of affairs, there is not even an ordinary chance of relief in cases of fire.

There is, of course, but little to be said of business at this season, excepting that it is very dull. The river is too low for freight boats, and none are running but some little crafts, which, as a funny friend says, can make good time on a profuse perspiration. The Publishing House is not much affected by the present dullness, excepting of course where shipments are to be made by the river. The manufacturing of books goes on as briskly as ever, seeing that the demand for them is not regulated by the weather or the season.

Our new book agent is making himself felt everywhere in the establishment, and winning good words and good wishes from all. He has purchased a pleasant house in the city, and is now settled in it with his family. I am glad of this, because it looks as if he was disposed to make himself at home among us, and cannot help wishing that the other officials connected with the Publishing House would go and do likewise.

There has been some gossip about a new Methodist Church in the city. Some one says the pews are to be sold and rented, and somebody else says "No, not a pewed church, only family sittings." What will Bishop Pierce say to this, here at the headquarters of Methodism on our side of the line?

Our German missionary has succeeded in getting together a pretty good congregation. They have had considerable difficulty in obtaining the necessary funds to finish their church, but when I heard from them last, were still going on with it.

The churches generally seem to be resting on their oars, excepting Andrew Chapel, which is now under the pastoral care of Brother Davis, and has been enjoying for several weeks past an interesting revival of religion. The building has been neatly fitted up, and the congregations are large and attentive.

No sickness here yet of general prevalence. A few cases of cholera morbus, terminating fatally in one or two instances, gave rise to a report that the cholera had made its appearance, but there is nothing of it. A great many of our citizens have gone, or are preparing to go to places having the reputation of being more pleasant than their homes. I have a fancy that this is a mistake. The less restraint we are under, both of body and mind, during the sultry months of summer, the more comfortable we must be of course.

We have heard with surprise and regret of Dr. Kelley's return from China, which unexpected step was taken, as we learn, in consequence of his wife's failing health. It seems that we are to have nothing but disappointment from that quarter, and perhaps it would be as well for the Missionary Board, in their next annual appropriations, to follow the plain indications of Providence elsewhere.

The weather is intensely hot, the thermometer indicating eighty seven degrees above zero at night, and for some days past at ninety in the shade. I suppose it will take a good share of heat to balance the excessive and protracted cold of last winter, but whatever it may do for the vegetable world, it is most destructive to letter writing. In such a crucible as this, one's ideas, (if they can have any at all,) melt away and evaporate, before the pen can imprision them on the blank sheet, which is a fitting index to a mind as blank as itself. Like a prudent general who wins by retreating, what would be lost in a pitched battle, I hasten to save my own credit as well as the patience of your readers, by a timely good night.

Very warmly yours,

CROTCHET.

An Interesting Scene.

Our readers are aware that Wesleyan missionaries are allowed to return to the domestic work after a given period of foreign service. A meeting of extraordinary interest, for the reception of several veterans of the foreign work, was held lately in London. The venerable Dr. Bunting presided. After an affecting introductory address, he called the chivalric list, amid the applause of the assembly: William Shaw, (loud applause,) the apostle of Caffraria, who had traveled thirty-six years with high honor and singular success; John Corlett who was truly an "itinerant," having labored in Newfoundland, in the West Indies, and in Demerara, for thirty-two years; Frederic Lewis, from Australia, where he had labored twenty-two years; James Calvert, from the Feejee Islands, (loud applause,) the companion of the ever-memorable John Hunt, and who had been in those parts eighteen years, exposed to not a few dangers and difficulties, but preserved by the special Providence of God, to return once more to his native land; Benjamin Ridesdale, from the Cape of Good Hope, who traveled three years at home before he went out, and spent thirteen years in that country, (applause;) and George Meadows, from the Gambia, where he had spent nine years, and whom it was indeed a marvel to see there alive and well. The chairman said he hoped to have had the pleasure of meeting other missionary brethren, recently returned: Mr. West, from the Friendly Islands; Mr. Jenkins, from India; Mr. Reay, from Sierra Leone, and others; but they were unable to attend.

Mr. Hoole then read the names of the missionaries, who respectively rose, each amid loud applause. He also said he was sorry that the decorum of the meeting did not allow him to call on the heroic wife of Mr. Calvert, (applause,) who had more than once exposed her own life in order to save the lives of others, and who had labored hard for the benefit of dark and benighted Feejee. (Continued applause.)

The missionaries then stood up, while Dr. Bunting shook hands with each of them, and the scene was so affecting that nearly all present were in tears.—They had had, he said, remarkable perils, and toils, and privations; but a day was coming when they would not think that they had suffered too much, or labored too zealously, in the blessed service of their Lord. His prayer was, that God would ever have them and theirs in his most holy keeping, and that he would especially bless their devoted wives.

The missionaries then proceeded to give narratives of their respective fields and labors. We may insert hereafter some extracts from them. The meeting was one of thrilling interest.—[C. A. and Journal.

The Good are Beautiful.

"Oh! what an ugly little creature."

"She will be beautiful in heaven, ma'am," replied a lady.

"Will she, indeed!" returned the individual who spoke so lightly of the homely child. "I should like to know how you can tell that?"

"In the other life," replied the woman, "the good are all beautiful, and the evil, deformed and ugly. No matter how fair a face a person may have had in this life, it will, in the next world, be changed into beauty or ugliness, according as he has been good or evil."

"How do you know this?" inquired the first speaker.

"Any one who opens his eyes may see and know that this will be true," was replied. "Is not the most beautiful face rendered disagreeable when any bad passion is felt and exhibited? And does not the homeliest face become pleasant to look upon, when good affections are in the heart? In the other life, we shall appear as we really are, and of course, evil passions will deform the face and good affections make it beautiful. And she will be beautiful in heaven, for she is a good little girl, homely as her face now is."

SEVEN DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

ARRIVAL OF THE CANADIAN AND NIAGARA.

[BY THE CANADIAN AT QUEBEC.]

The screw steamship Canadian, from Liverpool on Wednesday, July 2d, arrived at Quebec on the morning of the 15th inst. She brings intelligence four days later than that received by the Africa at New York.

The steamship Indian, from Quebec, arrived at Liverpool on the 2d inst.

In France the appearance of the harvest is splendid, and has dissipated all fears of scarcity.

A letter from Athens says that during the present month a conference of the three protecting Powers will be held in London, to settle the affairs of Greece.

Great Britain.

The American question has been before Parliament. Mr. Moore moved in the House of Commons that the conduct of her Majesty's Government in the differences that have arisen between them and the United States, on the question of enlistment, has not entitled them to the approbation of the House.

Messrs. Brown and Ewart of Liverpool, and Chenthnm and Spooner of Birmingham, appealed to Mr. Moore to postpone his motion, but he refused, and therefore the debated proceeded.

The Attorney General defended the Government, and said the United States dispatches had not been such as might have been expected from a nation anxious to preserve friendly relations with England.

Sir N. Thesinger supported the motion, and contended that the British agents had violated equally the law of the United States and of nations.

Mr. Phillimore supported the Government.

Mr. Baillie declared that England was dishonored by her attempt to seduce the citizens of the United States from their allegiance.

Sir George Grey asked if they could venture to condemn the Government after they had stopped the enlistment even on British grounds rather than give offence to the United States?

Here the House divided on a motion for adjournment.

Sir J. Walsh said that by not dismissing Mr. Dallas, the British Government confessed that they had done wrong, and their defence rested upon special pleading.

The debate was here adjourned, and the next evening was resumed by Mr. Milner Gibson, who complained that Lord Clarendon's conduct was insulting toward the United States, and the people of America should be made aware that the British people did not support their Minister therein.

Mr. Baxter believed there was nothing for a vote of censure, although there were points in Lord Clarendon's conduct that no one could defend.

Mr. Peacock supported the motion for censure.

Mr. Spooner would express no opinion.

Mr. Gladstone contended that the good will of the United States had been conciliated.

The most blamable feature in the matter was, he said, the concealment observed toward the United States Government, and for this Lord Clarendon and Mr. Crampton were equally to blame.

The Solicitor-General attacked Mr. Gladstone, and thought the United States Government ought to have arrived at a different conclusion than they did.

Sir J. Packington eulogized Mr. Gladstone, and said the House dare not shrink from the discussion, in this, a crisis of no ordinary magnitude.

Lord Palmerston replied at length, defending his conduct and denying that deception had been practiced toward the United States, or that their laws had been violated.

Mr. McGregor here attempted to address the House, but was coughed down.

The House then divided on the motion for censure and the Government was sustained by 194 majority.

The Royal mail steamship Niagara, Capt. Leitch, from Liverpool on Saturday the 5th inst., arrived at Halifax on the evening of Tuesday the 15th instant. The Niagara brings intelligence three days later than brought by the Canadian.

The steamship Ericsson, of the Collins line, had not arrived out.

The steamship Fulton sailed from Southampton for New York on the evening of the 2d inst.

The London papers contain the following paragraph:

Negotiations between England and the United States, with a view to the settlement of existing differences, were resumed on Monday the 30th, under circumstances which justify the belief that matters are already in a fair train toward an amicable adjustment of the points at issue.

Great Britain.

It is believed that Parliament will be prorogued on the 31st instant, and that no further party motions will be made this session.

The following is the only reference that has been made to America since the sailing of the steamship Fulton:

Mr. Baillie asked Lord Palmerston whether Mr. Dallas, as United States Representative to Her Majesty's Government, had full power to settle the Central American dispute, or whether he had any other powers than those of his predecessor Mr. Buchanan.

Lord Palmerston said it was understood that Mr. Dallas had full power to discuss with Her Majesty's Government the Central American question. Mr. Buchannan had no instructions whatever to enter on this subject.

The Directors of the Bank of England, at their weekly meeting on Thursday, the 3d inst., did not alter the rate of discount. The general impression has been that the rate would be lowered. It was thought that the rate would be reduced on the following Thursday, or not later than the week after. The Directors, however, do not generally like to lower it in dividend week. The Bank returns show a considerable increase in bullion.

The India mail takes out an unusually large amount of silver for the East, and the shipment of gold to the Continent increases with augmented inquiry for export. There is also further reason for shipment in the shape of investment in French securities on account of England.

Reports have been for some time current that unpleasantness existed between the Courts of France and Russia, and that Count Morny's departure for St. Petersburg was delayed in consequence. As Morny was about ready to embark, the difference is probably arranged.

The report of the Committee of the Corps Legislatif refusing to accord to the Emperor the power of granting pensions, is published. It is respectful but firm, and is considered the severest check Napoleon has yet met from his Government.

The bill granting pensions to the Orleans Princesses was voted unanimously, although Count Montalembert wrote a strong letter against it, and the Duchess of Saxe-Coburg indignantly refuses the money.

The juvenile Count of Paris has written a letter to M. Roger repudiating the fusion, and saying that himself, his mother and brother do not recognize the interference of the other members of the Orleans family, and that he reserves himself for the future. The letter has made considerable sensation in Orleanist circles, and the Orleans princes have written angry letters respecting the juvenile's interference. At the close of the Legislative session on the 2d inst., it was announced that the bill for the repeal of Prohibitory Customs Duties is deferred till the next session.

The measure for consolidating decrees relative to Customs duties into laws is also postponed.

Spain.

The papers give accounts of the recent riots at Badajos, Valladolid and other cities. They seem to have been of serious magnitude, and of an insurrectionary character. The high price of food was the ostensible cause of the riots, but the people really were excited by political emissaries. Numerous arrests were made and many of the prisoners shot. The rioters set fire to the corn stores and to the growing crops. Tranquility was finally restored, when the Government announced that the crops presented a good prospect, and that there was ample supply in store until the harvest set in. The export of breadstuffs was prohibited.

It was announced that a second squadron of ships of war, with troops for disembarkation in Mexico, was ready to sail from Havana, should Mexico refuse to satisfy the demands of Spain.

Later from Texas.

The steamship Louisiana, Capt. W. H. Talbot, from Indianola and Galveston, arrived at this port on Saturday morning.

By the Louisiana we have Galveston papers to the 17th inst.

The following is all the intelligence which we could glean from our exchanges regarding the crops in this State:

The Columbia Planter, of July 8th, says: The weather is still, as a general thing, dry, though some planters are complaining of too much rain. The rains have been exceedingly partial. Nothing has suffered for want of rain but corn. The cotton prospects are very fine.

The Lavaca Herald, of the 12th, notices the arrival at that town, on the day previous, of the first bale of new cotton of the season. It was from the plantation of R. B. Wafford, of Dewitt county. The weather, says the Herald, continues extremely hot and dry, the mercury in the thermometer rising to 95 during the middle of the day. The health of the citizens, however, remains good.

The San Antonio Texan, of the 10th, says:

In many parts of Western Texas there will not be raised over half a crop of corn on account of the dry weather. The cotton crop will be about an average yield.

The same paper has the following news from the frontier:

Maj. R. S. Neighbors, our Indian Agent, arrived in San Antonio a few days since.

The Indians under his charge on the "Reserve lands" at the present number 1,540, and are all quiet in their houses and doing well.

The Comanches under his control number 109, and they have 200 acres of corn, and they will raise their crops. The other Indians, numbering about 1,400, have 800 acres of corn; they will have an average yield.

Many of our surrounding Indians are extremely anxious to join those on the reserve, and efforts are being made to receive them soon.

We learn that negotiations have been made with the Choctaws to procure of them a reserve of land East of Red River, for the Northern Comanches, and other Indians.

Maj. Neighbors is well satisfied that an extension of the system will soon give quiet and safety on the whole frontier.

We learn from the Austin State Times that the disturbances on the Sabine, are assuming an alarming aspect. The state of affairs as related by the correspondent of the Times, is as follows: A large body of lawless characters have associated themselves together under the name of "Regulators," for the purpose of killing some of the good citizens of Orange county, and compelling others to leave, acquiring all citizens of the county to join them under penalty of death. They have already killed Mr. Mages, Burwell Alexander, Charles Sexton, John Fielden and —— Baxter, and some five or six others. The Sheriff of the county has been forced to leave, his deputy, Burwell Alexander having been killed. Among those who were killed was two travelers, strangers in the county. About thirty of the most respectable citizens of the county had left it from these causes, and every thing was in a state of anarchy. The last outrage which had been committed by these regulators, was the attempt to assassinate Mr. Hugh Ochiltree, a quiet and most respectable citizen, living at Gree's Bluff, for refusing to join them in their violent career. He had saved himself up to the last accounts, by taking a bold stand and barricading himself in his own premises.

The Governor has been appealed to by the citizens of Orange county for aid, and it is expected that he will send a body of men to the scene of the disturbances, to put an end to them.

The San Antonio Texan relates the following:

During the past week a Mormon missionary has been holding forth in Gonzales. At his last meeting there, he "pulled off his coat and rolled up his sleeves"—which, alas! caused a stampede of the holy part of his audience. Soon after he was escorted around the town to the music of tin horns, cow bells, etc., and told to leave ere the dews of night were kissed by early dawn, and he did nothin' shorten.

The New Orleans Christian Advocate.

The N. O. Christian Advocate.

TERMS—$2 50 per annum, in advance.

NEW ORLEANS:

SATURDAY, JULY 26, 1856.

Agents and Accounts.—Those for Alabama have all been sent out. Those for Mississippi and Louisiana and other Conferences nearly. The agents will please give them a good reception and a good showing. If any of them have not received lists of subscribers at all the Post Offices in their circuits, they will oblige us by letting us know it early. To all the traveling preachers the New Orleans Christian Advocate goes free. We hope ever to continue it so. In return, we ask their friendly diligence in collecting and remitting its dues and presenting its claims to their congregations for additional subscribers. It is a church paper and aims to cooperate with them in building up the church.

Health.—The interments officially made up, of the week ending on Sabbath morning amount to 134. The city is healthy. We have inquired both of the hospital and general practice and can find no case of yellow fever.

A Good Meeting.—Such we call a series of meetings held by the Deacons and congregation for two weeks past in the Colyseum Place Baptist Church, of this city. Though the pastor is absent the Lord has visited his people. Fifteen have joined the church, and others are inquiring what they must do to be saved. Six of them are from the Sabbath-School—four teachers and two of the Female Bible Class.

Centenary College of Louisiana.—Under the head of "Special Notices" our readers have been advised of the unusually interesting items of the approaching commencement and troops of them, before this, are ready to go.—We had the satisfaction of seeing the Corner Stone before any of them; though with them we may not see it laid. It was shipped last Tuesday—done to the square at Strond's. The new Catalogue before us gives 19 Seniors, 20 Juniors, 37 Sophomores 41 Freshmen. In the preparatory Department 113—Alumni 120. This is a gratifying showing. Read and consider well, the Appeal in another column.

Port Gibson Female Academy.—The Reveille, 17th inst., says, the commencement closed on the 16th with much satisfaction. Dr. Thos. H. Capers is the popular head of this Institution.—The Reveille says:—"On Sunday last, it was our good fortune to hear the commencement sermon. This was delivered by the Rev. S. O. Capers of Mobile. We do not remember to have ever listened with more interest to a sermon of the kind. It was profound in its philosophy, Christian in its piety, strong and bold in its measures, and elegant in its style."

Rev. Dr. Clapp.—The Universalist Herald states that Rev. E. C. Bolles at present pastor of the Universalist church, Bridgeport, Conn., has been invited to take charge of the church in New Orleans. It is thought he will accept the invitation.

Dr Clapp is now sojourning in Louisville, Ky., and is preparing his autobiography, for the press.

Rev. E. D. Pitts passed through the city last week, en route for Mansfield; where, we are pleased to learn, his services have been engaged, in connection with Dr. Thweatt. The Trustees of Centenary Institute did not permit Mr. P. to leave without a most flattering testimonial of his usefulness. He preached two edifying sermons in Carondelet street church, last sabbath.

Cumberland University.—We have received the Ninth Annual Catalogue of the Law School at Lebanon, Tenn.—It seems to be in a very flourishing condition, having had 134 pupils the last session—a number surpassed by no institution of the kind in the country, except Harvard University. Its pupils come from eleven different states. It speaks well for the people of the South that they begin to appreciate an institution of their own. We presume we are indebted to our young friend Walter Tate, of Tochee Ala., whose name is in the Catalogue of students.

Mrs. Read's school, at Baton Rouge, La., has its annual examination of classes 21d and 25th inst. We make our acknowledgments for an invitation to attend and share the pleasure of the occasion. Pupils from almost every part of the State are in attendance.—The school moves out to Greenwell Springs to spend vacation, quite a number of pupils remaining through the vacation to be ready for an early commencement in October.

MEMPHIS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

We are sorry to see the action of the publishing Committee so far as it loses to the Editorial fraternity that excellent member of it, Rev. J. E. Cobb. He handed in this note on 14th July:

Dear Brethren.—I am informed by a Resolution handed me by Bro. Watson, your Chairman, that you can no longer pay the salary of an Editor. Were I able, I should gladly continue my position as Editor without remuneration from our cherished Advocate, but my duty to my family, who depend upon my personal labors for support, must, of course, forbid my attempting such an undertaking. With my best prayers and wishes for yourselves, and for the prosperity of the Advocate heretofore under my control, allow me, under the circumstances, to offer my resignation to you, as the only persons whom I can now see competent to accept the same. Yours, ever in Christ. James E. Cobb.

The Committee regretting, as justly they might, to part with him, feel obliged, for the sound reasons urged, to do so:

On motion by Bro. J. E. Cobb, it was

Resolved, That Bro. Sam. Watson be requested to act as Financial Agent, in the room of the editor just resigned, until the meeting of the several Conferences having control of this Advocate.

Rev. Mr. Watson one of the stationed pastors in Memphis, accepts the post.

THE HOME CIRCLE.

The Editor, Dr. Huston, spreads another feast. The last (June) number and this (for July) are up to the mark in volume, variety, interest and tasteful editing. Sixty pages full!—Who wants more, for the money? A good likeness of Dr. McFerrin embellishes this number. We can recommend this periodical to any one; we feel safe in doing so.—The unlearned and learned; the indifferent and acute critic; the religious or merely literary susceptibilities will be profited by it; and in their minds credit will be reflected upon the Church represented by the Home Circle. We hope all our agents are also agents for it.

AN APPEAL IN BEHALF OF CENTENARY COLLEGE.

Natchez, Miss., June, 1856.

In 1845, the State of Louisiana, by an act of sale, conveyed to Trustees acting for the Methodist Church, the entire property—consisting of buildings, lands, library, apparatus, etc.,—of Louisiana College, located at Jackson, La., for educational purposes,—"Centenary College of Louisiana" was carried into successful operation at once, and has gradually gained upon the patronage and confidence of the public.—The object of the Board of Trustees is to furnish the means of education. Their rules of government are strict and equitable, and the course of study thorough. The Faculty is composed of men of high moral worth and literary training—men fully approved by us—and to whose guidance students may be committed with the utmost confidence.

We intend to deserve the patronage of the public, and although the Institution is under the immediate guidance of the Methodist Church, no means shall be used to thrust its peculiarities of doctrine or government upon the student. By a rule of the College, all students are required to attend some place of worship on the Sabbath, but every student may enjoy his own preference.

In 1849, one of the two College buildings intended as wings to the centre building, now occupied by students, was destroyed by fire. It has been repaired at a cost of $8,000, and now the two wings afford accommodations for about one hundred students, several of the rooms being occupied as Recitation Rooms, Society Halls, Libraries, etc.

Public interest and the pressing necessities of the Institution are demanding of us additional accommodation for students; and yielding to this urgency we have resolved to erect the centre building according to the plan contemplated originally by the State.

This building will contain all the Recitation Rooms, Rooms for Library, Apparatus, Cabinet, Society Halls and a Chapel. It will cost about $60,000, and, with the solidity of its structure, will combine magnificence, simplicity and utility. About one-half of the funds necessary for its completion have been obtained, the State having invested $10,000. The building is under contract and the work is progressing rapidly. All the brick required for its erection are on the spot, and the ring of the mason's trowel is upon the ear of the hopeful student.

We believe that the success of the Institution is in a great measure dependent upon the erection of this building, for the students already there are put to inconvenience for want of accommodations in the College, and the rooms used for recitation, etc., are not suited to the purpose. These straitened circumstances embarrass our present operations, and we appeal for aid upon the broad ground that, whatever increases the facilities of education at home, adds to the patronage and permanence of the Institution.

The time is past when an enlightened public demands a reason for our efforts to build up a College of a high literary character in the South, for we are forced to the confession that it is suicidal for us to commit our educational interests to those who, reckless alike of political and social obligations, taunt us with our dependence, and inflict insult upon our sons. And while we disclaim all bitterness of feeling towards Northern professors, or narrow prejudice against Northern colleges, we as promptly disclaim all sympathy with Southerner who heap upon them unmitigated abuse, and yet put forth no effort to build up and endow Southern colleges. Our sons will go North to be educated until we make ample provision for their education at home.

The want of education is felt; the purpose to educate our youth pervades the public mind, and we cannot prevent what we deplore until we supply at home that which is now sought abroad.

We owe it to ourselves and to posterity, to appropriate of our abundance to the establishment of institutions of learning, holding, as we do, that the true greatness of our country does not consist in numbers or in wealth, but in the intelligence and integrity of the people.

We must build up and endow Southern colleges.—We intend to build up and endow Centenary College.

There are now 230 students in the Institution, and 120 of her graduates have gone forth—the proof of our earnestness, and the promise of what we intend to accomplish.

The Preparatory Department of the Institution is under the control of the Trustees of the College. Its Principal is eminently suited to his position, and we intend it to be a fit auxiliary to the College.

The Joint Board of Trustees and visitors met on the 40th of April, and authorized the Building Committee to erect the Centre Building. The Board was a unit in its purpose, and $9,000, in $1,000 subscriptions each, was contributed at once to forward its plans.—Other and liberal subscriptions have since been added to this amount.

The undersigned were appointed a Committee to prepare an Address to the friends of Education, and to solicit aid for the erection of the Centre Building. In conformity with the instructions of the Board, we have prepared the above, and now submit it to the public, feeling assured that the object we seek to accomplish will excite an encouraging response from our generous and patriotic fellow-citizens.

THE CHURCHES.

Enterprise, Clark county Miss., July 1, 1856.

The 22d June was a glorious day for this enterprising village. Bishop Andrew was here looking in good health. The people were delighted to look upon a live Bishop and hear such truths, in his plain unostentatious way, fall from his lips. The church was greatly refreshed. We all felt that it was a proud day for the church in this lately remote, inaccessable, but now, thanks to the Railroad, very accessable place. The Bishop dedicated our new church on the Sabbath, after which we took up a collection, and the congregation responded to our call liberally; thus enabling us to pay every debt hanging over us and having some left for further improvement. His sermon was such that some of our old Methodists thought we were getting back to the good old primitive days. The church in this part of the country is improving. We have nearly one hundred white members now, with a well-built and well-finished church, against twenty-five and no church, but a goat house, eighteen months since. We have also a splendid Sabbath-School and library, etc. Long, long will we all remember the Bishop's talk to the Sabbath-School in the morning. It was highly instructive and productive of the best interests of the cause.

Our bell, the gift of the citizens of Mobile, through the efforts of Mr. T. W. O'Ferrall, weighing nearly eight hundred pounds, is creditable to the place, and we hope that it will long sound the praise of those who gave it to us.

W. C. TURNER.

Wilkinson Circuit, Miss. Conference, July 19, 1856.

I have another missionary meeting to report. Our second was the 5th Sabbath June, near Centerville—collection $248 60—something larger than at Bethel. I think this circuit, though small, and by no means the wealthiest in conference, will sustain the honor of "Banner Circuit" for missionary contributions. She cheerfully offers her aid to sustain the Bee Hive you mentioned in a missionary speech at one of our annual conferences. I will send a check to the Assistant Treasurer as soon as I can conveniently.

J. A. B. JONES.

New Iberia, La., July 1856.

As it is common for our preachers to report occasionally with reference to their work, I now claim a small place in your columns for that purpose, hoping thereby to elicit the prayers of the church more fully for our country, (Southern Louisiana.)

It has been six months since my arrival in the Attakapas. On my arrival I found things in a better condition than I anticipated, but not as I desired. During the time I have labored here I trust some good has been done. Up to the time of our second quarterly meeting we had received seventeen into the church; taken in fifteen probationers, whites, and about the same number of colored. At the time of the second quarterly meeting twenty-one joined the church on probation.

Our quarterly meeting was held at a place where the people had never done anything for the missionary cause. The reason, I must think, was owing to the fact that they had never been called on for that purpose. On Sabbath morning we made a call, and in a few minutes the amount of eighty dollars was subscribed, all of which I am satisfied will be forthcoming at Conference.

The following persons were made L. M's, to wit: Mrs. J. A. Hoffpower, Mrs. A. C. Higginbottham, Isaac Hoffpower and Mother Spell, by the payment for each of $20 by various friends.

J. H. WATERS.

Minden, La., July 3.

It makes us glad to say that we have had a shower of grace in this "deserted land." Brother Randall and myself, assisted by Dr. Yonng and others a portion of the time, held a meeting commencing on the 27th ult., which resulted in the conversion of thirteen souls and an accession of as many to the church. If Christ was satisfied with the "travail of his soul," you will expect that the minister shall be thrilled with gladness to see the pleasure of the Lord prosper in his hand.

R. A. R. Alexander.

Holmes Circuit, Mississippi Conference.

We commenced a meeting at Eulogy, on Saturday before the fifth Sabbath in June, which lasted nine days. We had twenty-four accessions to the church, many conversions and the church generally revived. God be praised for his mercies.

Thos. C. Rayner.

New M. E. Church in Columbus, Ga.—We learn, says the Columbus Enquirer, that the contract for the new Methodist Episcopal Church in this city has been awarded to Messrs. Morton & Barringer. Their bid was something over $12,000. The Church is to be a fine and commodious building, and will be located on Lot No. 383, corner of Troup and Bryan streets. The present Methodist Church, on Church street, is also a large and handsome structure, and the strength and popularity of the denomination in our city is abundantly illustrated by the need of another house of worship.

LETTERS FROM CHINA.

Shanghai, China, Saturday evening, April 5, 1856.

Rev. John R. Lambuth:

Dear Father—Some minutes since I heard the mail was to close this evening at six. It is now one o'clock, so I shall write but little. We are all quite well just now.

You perhaps heard by this time of Brother Kelley's departure for home. He left us on the 10th of last month.—Our mission at present numbers but three, Bro's Cunniagham, Jenkins and myself. I am desirous of doing all the good I can. I preach almost every day, both in the country and city, distributing the word of God here and there, and preaching at every opportunity. I have in the last month gone as far as sixteen miles into the country and back the same day on a little Chinese pony. Lieu goes with me and preaches everywhere to rich and poor alike. We have our round of appointments three days in the week to the country and four days in the city. The mornings I spend in study and prayer to God. The evenings I spend in preaching and giving instruction to those who are willing to hear. To-day I have had three persons asking for books, and one an application for membership.

Yesterday was quite a day for worshiping idols—the greatest I have seen since coming to China. It would be too much to tell the whole for I have not time. They were parading their principal gods about upon their shoulders with hundreds and thousands of men, women and children following in the train. Gods made of wood and mud, in most magnificent sedan chairs. Their gods were richly dressed. Many of the people were dressed in red with large iron chains around their necks.—They were called sinners and were making their confessions. They had been very sick, which they thought was caused from some sin they had committed, and on yesterday clothed themselves in red and put great chains around their necks, and in this way made confession to their city god and begged him to protect them next year from disease. You will no doubt say "how simple the people are." If you could have seen them on yesterday you would have pitied them and prayed the more to the great head of the Church to arouse the people from their sleep. I thought of Elijah. O that we had an Elijah here to awake this mighty nation from their lethargy! O God, wilt thou help us? O delay not thy coming, lest this people perish.

My dear father, pray more for me that I may be alive to my duty. Urge the Church to send out more help! We need more laborers—men full of zeal and of the love of God and love for the dying people. Ask the church to pray for me, that while God spares my life and gives me health I may be a blessing to this people. Ask my friends and all who love God, to have their set times in praying for me and this people.—Pray for Lieu and his wife. I love them both as followers of Christ. Lieu makes a good circuit preacher. He has a horse and goes with me to my appointments. Pray for us that our work may be blessed. Give my love to mother, brothers and sisters.

Your son, William.

Letter from a Chinese convert to his Missionary's father.

Some months since Rev. John R. Lambuth, in a letter to his son sent his regards to Lieu. In return Lieu sends him a letter written on silk, in oriental style, Chinese characters, of which the following is a literal translation:

Shanghai, April 1856.

John, venerable teacher and elder lady, both great and noble, how are you?

You and your household who trust in the grace of God to sustain you, may you always be peaceful and well. I, who after you, was born in China, heard that you, an aged man, in your blessed kingdom, for many years preached the doctrine of Jesus—went about saving souls—continually praying that men would speedily repent of their sins and escape the everlasting punishment of hell.

You, in your kingdom so much blessed, preach Jesus' doctrine—call men to repent—to embrace baptism and walk in the good road that leads to heaven. In your precious kingdom this is so every year and every month, because there you have many wise and good men. Here in my small kingdom, from old down to the present time, we have three religions, viz: "Book Religion," "Buddhist Religion," and "Taoist Religion." "Book Religion" is the doctrine of Confucius, advocated by all scholars of China. Confucius said "This life is but an empty show, as floating as clouds or drifting water." In China all desire home riches and the honors of this world. Such men do not seek to save their souls, and know not whether there be a reward after death for the good or wicked. The Buddhist and Taoist religion reach from about the time of Jesus to the present, and their words are all empty sounds, without meaning, just as a crazy person's. They try to persuade all men not to eat meat or any thing having blood in it—always to pray to Buddha, and worship the image of deified men. They desire the people to feed them, give them money and count it to them (that is the people) for righteousness, and say, "If you continually give to us you will always have."—Therefore, we, three of the eighteen provinces from infancy to old age, all hold to these three religions.

The French also have a religion in China—about two hundred years ago or more, it began. The Chinese call it the "heavenly Lord's doctrine." There is no material difference between them, the Buddhist and Taoist—because they worship the image of Mary—the image of Jesus and the cross, and the images of his disciples. From its first introduction to the present, in many large cities and small ones, a great many simple people have embraced their doctrine.

I pity them! I pity them! Oh foolish people, why do you cast away your own idols and take the idols of another kingdom, which is the cross—a man Jesus—a wooden Mary, and images of Jesus disciples? The French have in the laws of their own—have many scholars—laugh at Jesus' true doctrine, and persuade men not to believe us. Luke XI—52—"Woe unto you lawyers! for you have taken away the key of knowledge—ye enter not in yourselves, and them that were entering ye hindered!" Therefore, in my small kingdom it is difficult to preach Jesus' doctrine.

For a camel to enter the eye of a needle would be easier than for many of this people to enter the kingdom of heaven.

Therefore, I, together with your son, every day trusting in the merits of Jesus, and relying upon the Holy Spirit, preach in the city and country. Those who hear are many, but it is difficult for them to believe. Therefore, my brother, every day, morning and evening, pray the true God to protect and assist me in preaching and calling them to repent of their sins and walk in the living road. Perhaps in two or three years those who are asleep will awake, then Jesus' doctrine will be everywhere.

Your daughter-in-law, with Mrs. Cunningham, every day diligently teach little girls that they may treasure these sayings in their hearts, and they also learn them to sew.

My Brother, in the third month I heard your words of regard. I thank you, Elder Brother to love me. I have no such grace to return to you. (This is a polite way of answering each other.) My elder Brother, I desire to meet you and face to face converse. Perhaps we may never meet on earth, but let us meet in the heavenly kingdom. Let me ask you elder Brother, to give my regards to all the good and holy men.

My elder Brother and elder lady with your household, how are you?

LIEU JAMES, } Together greet you.
CHI MARY, }

DOMSTIC MISSIONS.

Rev. H. N. McTyeire, Assistant Treasurer of the Missionary Society of the M. E. Church, South:

Gaston Colored Mission, Ala. Con., July 4, 1856.

This mission is in a prosperous condition. The inhabitants of some portions are highly pleased and take a great interest in it, while others seem to take but little. I have 85 full members and 25 probationers; 158 children catechized, and 31 children and 2 adults baptised. I preach to some 1000 or 1209 negroes, and they seem to take deep interest in it. Several have professed to have found Jesus precious to their souls.

T. Y. Armstrong.

Marble Valley Mission, Coosa county, Ala.

Say to the friends of Zion that the prospects are cheering in this mission. The third quarterly meeting for the Wewokaville Circuit and Marble Valley Mission in connection, was held at Andrew Chapel the 29th and 30th of June. It was a time of refreshing from the presence of the Lord. On Sabbath morning we held an old fashioned love-feast. A more glorious time I think I never saw in love-feast. I expect to bring up a good report from this mission.

G. J. Mason.

Arrival of Missionaries.—The Rev. D. D. Kelly, M. D. and wife, of the Chinese mission, arrived in New York on the 29th of June, after a voyage of one hundred and ten days from Shanghi, China. They arrived in the city early on the morning of the 3d inst., and stopped at the Exchange Hotel, where they are yet detained by the sickness of Mrs. Kelly. It will be some time before they will be able to resume their journey to the South. Dr. Kelly is in good health. They lost their child, an infant about eight months old, on their passage, not long after they left China.—His duties at the bedside of his afflicted companion have prevented any extended conversation with him as to the mission. Their friends at a distance may rest assured that they will receive every attention that their circumstances may require, or christian affection bestow during their detention in the city.—[Richmond Christian Advocate.

Wesleyan Methodism.

After several years of opposition, debate and strife in the Wesleyan body of England, and consequently large numerical losses, they are again emerging from a state of depression into the sunlight of prosperity and peace. The English correspondent of the C. A. and Journal presents the annexed gratifying facts in proof of the renewed energies and increasing prosperity of the connection:

"The annual district meetings, preparatory to our conference, have terminated, and the condition of the societies throughout the connection in Great Britain, as indicated by the numbers, is found to be most cheering. I gave you in a former letter the figures as regarded a few of the districts, and I am happy to be now able to state that the condition of affairs then described in relation to a few localities, is the rule throughout England and Scotland in general. Of the thirty-two districts only eleven returned a decrease; and the remaining twenty-one present each an increase, which, in the total result, after deducting 1,185 for the decrease in the others, leaves a net increase of 2,979; or in round numbers, 3,000; the actual increase on the twenty-one being 4,164.—The total number in society in England and Scotland is 263,834, in addition to which there are 17,818 returned as on trial. These statistics furnish cause of joy and hallowed exultation; but they become still more valuable when viewed as what they are—the practical results of a gracious spiritual work which has been going forward among the societies of late, in the conversion of sinners, the sanctification of believers, the general extension and deepening in the hearts of our people of "pure religion and undefiled," the cessation of strife and agitation, and the steady growth of a holy zeal and liberality, as exhibited in the unparalleled financial prosperity of our missionary and other evangelistic institutions throughout the year."

Excessive Eating.—In a letter to Lord Murry, found in the Life of Sidney Smith, lately published, the latter says:

"You are, I hear, attending more to diet than heretofore. If you wish anything like happiness in the latter act of life, eat and drink about half what you could eat and drink. Did I ever tell you my calculation about eating and drinking? Having ascertained the weight that I could live upon, so as to preserve health and strength, and what I did live upon I found that between ten and seventy years of age I had eaten and drunk forty four-one horse wagon loads of meat and drink more than would have preserved me in life and health! The value of this immense nourishment is considered to be worth $35,000. This is a frightful calculation, but irresistibly true; and I think dear Murray, your wagons would require an additional horse each."

Endowment of Centenary Institute.

Montgomery, Alabama, July 10, 1856.

Dear Brother:—A few days since I wrote you a hasty account of the commencement at Summerfield. I design now to recommend this institution to the favorable consideration of our people, and give some reasons for such recommendation.

Our people are pretty generally inclined to educate their children; and if either class must be neglected, I think, as a general thing, the neglect falls on the boys. Taking for granted then that our daughters will go somewhere to college, I think it important that a prudent discretion be exercised in the choice of institutions, and recommend to parents who are pondering this subject, to carefully weigh the claims of the Centenary Institute. I recommend this school first because Summerfield is quite a religious and Methodist community, especially is this true with reference to the ladies of the place. I know of no place where is to be found a company of more devout and godly women than are many of those composing the society of Summerfield. They are true to the old land-marks of Methodism; regular as clock-work to their class-meetings, which are almost uniformly seasons of refreshing from the presence of God. Many of them are strong believers in the doctrine of "perfect love," and have the abiding witness in their own souls of its possession and enjoyment. They profess it, and what is better, they live it.

And then there is a weekly prayer meeting which these godly women have been mainly instrumental in keeping up for years; formerly held in a private house, but now in the basement of the church. It is often numerously attended and God is amongst us on these occasions. Of the many christian privileges, as to hearing the gospel preached, I need say nothing, as this matter is generally understood.

Then as to the faculty of instruction, it is probably not surpassed by that of any female institution in the land. The President, Dr. Mitchell, has been long and extensively and favorably known as an excellent officer and teacher.—There is, however, one thing about the Doctor to which the noisy puffing spirit of the age might object. He is considerably deficient in the arts of flourish and humbuggery. He is a common sense, plain, practical man, whose aim is to give to his pupils a substantial education, and to imbue his instructions with the principles and spirit of the religion of Jesus Christ, thus preparing them for the active and practical duties of life; and his great ambition is that the daughters who annually go forth from the halls of Centenary, may, in the various relations which they may be called to sustain, be living epistles of Christ, known and read of all men.

To a great many people I know this very thing will be an objection, for very many parents merely send their daughters to college for the name, and because it is fashionable.—They care very little as to the solid information they may acquire; but if they have only passed through the curriculum of studies of some institution which has acquired notoriety, it is enough, whether their beautiful ones are a whit the wiser or not. Parents love to have their daughters complimented, and very few are willing to hear from the lips of an honest teacher, that that cherished and lovely one has but little mind and can't learn; or that she is careless and won't learn. Yet, however this may be, I am satisfied that in teachers as well as preachers, and every body else, honesty is the best policy. I like to see the truth acted as well as spoken.

Professor Larrabee is already well known to the patrons of Centenary as a gentleman, well qualified for his position.—Professor Richardson is a younger member of the faculty, but his department is ably sustained, and he gives fair promise of future distinction. Of Professor Gleffer, in the musical department, I don't feel competent to judge, for the truth is, Mr. Editor, that I have precious little knowledge of music as a science, nor have I much ear or taste for it in its modern developments. I dare say that many of your readers will pity the ignorance and want of taste diplayed by the poor old Bishop, but the truth is I would rather be at the Charleston camp-meeting and hear five thousand negroes sing "Old Hundred" about the second or third day of the meeting, than to attend the most splendid concert in the world. I understand, however, from those who profess to be judges, that Professor G. is a first-rate performer and an excellent teacher.—One capital thing I can say about him is, that during our revival last spring, he was happily converted to God, and is now a warm-hearted Methodist. So now every member of the faculty is decidedly pious.

So much for the female department; a word before we quit about the male school. During the past year this was under the charge of our good friend Rev. E. Pitts, who gave general satisfaction. We regret that his sense of obligation to his family led him to decide on removing to your State. He expects to take a place in the Mansfield Female College, where, I have no doubt, when he is known, he will be deemed a valuable acquisition.

The school is now placed under the charge of Rev. D. C. B. Connerly, who brings to his work considerable experience and reputation as a teacher.

The preparatory school has been successfully conducted during the past term, by Mrs. Coleman, who has acquitted herself in her important task quite to the satisfaction of her patrons and the Board of Trustees.

And now just let me say, in conclusion, that if you have sons and daughters whom you intend to send away from home for education, I think you can hardly do better than send them to Summerfield.

James O. Andrew.

Our City Charities.

The Grand Jury report, lately made public, gives the number and condition of these charitable institutions, as passing before their inquest:

The First District Recorder's office is pronounced to be sadly out of repair, and its location such that it is often impossible for the Court to hear the witness, counsel or prisoner. A removal of the office to the basement of the City Hall, or to the rear end of the building it is now in, is recommended.

Of the temporary Insane Asylum, the report says: "There are fifteen male and five female patients. With one exception, all are peaceable and mild in their department, and under the kind and judicious treatment of the well known Dr. Sabatier. Some of them will no doubt be restored to their friends, cured, without going to the State Asylum at Jackson. This department appears to be in charge of competent officers and nurses, whose time is devoted to ameliorating the condition of its unfortunate inmates."

The Charity Hospital draws forth all the encomiums that are the due of a noble and well-managed institution of the kind. The jurors took the trouble to procure the statistics of the institution for nine years past—since 1847—which we append as interesting:

Admissions—Natives of the United States..... 14,722
Foreigners..... 121,136
Uncertain..... 1,116
Total..... 136,974
Discharged..... 115,393
Deaths..... 21,581
—of which 17,495 have been buried by the institution, and the rest by their relations and friends. This shows an average annual admission of over 15,000; annually discharged 12,000; an annual mortality of over 2,300. The annual disbursements are about $75,000. The last year was $66,000. Income: The State pays passenger tax say about $12,000; balls, concerts, etc., about $4,000; pay patients, $4,000; rents, $4,000; fines, $2,000; and various other sources the remainder.

The Seaman's Home receives a very high tribute of praise; and so do the Orphan Asylums in general.

The Female Asylum on Camp street, under Sisters of Regis, has 245 inmates in good condition, aged from a month to fifteen years. Some little repairs are needed, as well as $900 which the city owes the institution.

The Boys' Asylum on Josephine street, in the Fourth District, has 106 boys from two to fourteen years. Health good, education excellent, but sleeping accommodations bad.

The Orphans' Home, near Magazine, between Seventh and Eighth streets, in the same district, contains 115 children, orphans and half-orphans, of both sexes, brothers and sisters not being separated. The children get their education at the public schools, the same as those who have parents. The institution is highly spoken of in every respect, a compliment awarded to Mrs. Lowe, the Governess.

The St. Elizabeth Female Asylum, or House of Industry, on Magazine street, contains seventy-two girls aged from nine to eighteen years. These girls are graduates from Sister Regis' Asylum, and are taught the useful and ornamental branches of housekeeping, and thus fully prepared for the actual duties of life." Their sewing and embroidery is pronounced fine.

The Immaculate Conception Asylum and House of Industry for Orphan Girls, ot the corner of Desire and Love streets, in the Third District, has sixty-one children ranged from three to eight years. It was commenced in 1851, with five little orphans. It is a model of order, comfort, cleanliness and good management.

The St. Mary's Asylum for Boys, in the Third District, contains two hundred and seventy-two boys from infancy to fourteen years—who "to all appearances are much better off than many who have parents in our city." The school-rooms are too small and badly ventilated.

The St. Anna Asylum, or Home for Widows and their Children, at the corner of Prytania and St. Mary streets, in the Fourth District, contains forty-eight widows and fifty children; some of the widows being quite old and infirm. The children go to public schools, and are well provided for. The widows are engaged in useful employment. Mrs. Barth is Governess.

The Home for Jewish Widows and Orphans, on Jackson street, in the Fourth District—which was organized in March, 1855—contains three widows and nineteen orphans. It is an excellent institution in every respect, and has a good school attached.

The Ladies of Providence Asylum for Widows and Children, on Laharpe street, in the Third District, incorporated in 1852—contains thirty-eight widows and twenty-one children. It is in a quiet, healthy spot, and in good condition. "The main building contains the chapel, school-room, directresses' and orderly superior's, etc. Most of the inmates occupy rooms in clean, neat cottages and a row of buildings which nearly surround the main edifice; the space between containing half to three-quarters of an acre, is cultivated as a vegetable garden, with borders of flowers, shrubbery, grape-vines, fig and peach trees, thus affording exercise and industry to the inmates."

The report sums up that the entire number of persons depending upon public charity, including the officers and attendants of the different institutions, is 1,000. We regret that our space will not permit us to extract from the report more largely.

An exchange truly says: "Every column of a newspaper contains from one to twenty thousand distinct pieces of metal, the displacing of any one of which would cause a blunder or typographical error? With this curious fact before you, don't you wonder at the general accuracy of newspapers? Knowing this to be the fact, you will be more disposed, we hope, to excuse than magnify errors of the press."

Anecdote of Whitfield.—Whitfield, when preaching at Princeton, N. J., detected one of his auditory fast asleep, came to a pause, and deliberately addressed him as follows: "If I had come to speak to you in my own name, you might question my right to interrupt your indulged repose; but I have come in the name of the Lord of Hosts (and accompanied these words with a heavy blow on the pulpit he roared out,) "and I will be heard!"

You may be sure that the sleeper started up as if he had heard, close to his head a clap of thunder.

As we must render an account of every idle word, so must we of our silence.

MARRIAGES.

On the 15th July, at the residence of Col. J. C Julian, by Rev. L. P. Golson, REV. Z. DOWLING, of the Alabama Conference, to MRS. ZAIDE COPP, of Santa Rosa, Florida.

DEATHS.

Died—On the 3d inst., in Noxubee county Miss., NICHOLAS GAINES AUGUSTUS, in his 29th year.

He made a public profession of religion and joined the M. E. Church about eight years since. Soon after he married and at once whce he had a house of his own, he began the world at the head of a family with prayer. As a husband, father and master, he was "faithful in all his house." The last three years of his life he filled the post of class-leader. Firm in principle, consistent in life, his christian experience was ever growing deeper.

Sick only about ten days, he had strong presentment that he should die, spoke of dying often, calmly declaring that he had made preparations, felt no fear, no unwillingness save that he must leave his wife a widow, his children fatherless.

When the end drew nigh, he was perfectly conscious. Still his faith was firm, his confidence unshaken. He knew "whom he had believed." He took leave of his family, his friends, his servant, exhorting them to the faithfulness to God that they might meet him in Heaven. With prayer earnest and heartfelt for all around him, and praises to the Blessed Jesus for his saving grace, without a groan he fell asleep in Jesus.

"Let me die the death of the righteous, let my last end be like his."

Died—On the 26th February 1856, MARGARET ELIZABETH COKER, aged 8 years. She came to her death by a horrible burn two months before. In her lingering she talked much with her brothers of religion and desired frequently to sing with the preacher and have brought to her religious books.

"The lily was her emblem flower,
So modest, fair, and unassuming,
Concealed within its leafy bower
Its HOME perfuming."

Died—On the 13th July, in the vicinity of Sharon, Madison county, Miss., SAMUEL HUBBARD, aged 9 months and 25 days, son of Samuel H. and Fanuie H. Adams.

Died—On the 9th June, at the residence of her brother in Bibb county, Alabama, MRS. ELEANOR WILLIAMS, aged 83 years.

The deceased joined the Methodist E. Church in 1791 or 1794, and had during her long life been a regular attendant. She was also a great lover of class-meetings, and was often blessed in them. She came to her death by a fall on descending ground.—A few days before her death she called her nephews and nieces to her bedside, and taking them separately by the hand bid them all farewell, with a promise to meet her in heaven. After being hurt she lived six weeks, and previous to her death resigned herself to God in all things. J. FOUST.

The Dying Thief.

I want you thoroughly to understand that the leading principles of the penitent thief's religion were just the same as those of the oldest sinner that ever lived.

See for one thing, how strong was the faith of this man. He called Jesus "Lord." He declared his belief that he would have a kingdom. He believed that he was able to give him eternal life and glory, and in this belief prayed to him. He maintained his innocence of all the charges brought against him. "This man," said he, "hath done nothing amiss." Others perhaps may have thought the Lord innocent—none said so openly, but this poor dying man.

And when did all this happen? It happened when the whole nation had denied Christ, shouting, "Crucify him, crucify him—we have no king—but Cæsar;" when the chief priests and Pharisees had condemned and found him guilty of death; when even his own disciples had forsaken him and fled; when he was hanging, faint, bleeding and dying on the cross, numbered with transgressors and counted accursed. This was the hour when the thief believed in Christ and prayed to him. Surely such faith was never seen since the world began.

He only saw our Lord in agony and in weakness, suffering and in pain. He saw him undergoing a dishonorable punishment, deserted, mocked, despised, blasphemed. He saw him rejected by all the great and wise and noble of his own people; his strength dried up like a potsherd, his life drawing to the grave. Psalms, xxii, 15; lxxxvii 3.—He saw no sceptre, no royal crown, no outward dominion, no glory, no majesty, no power, no signs of might. And yet the dying thief believed, and looked forward to Christ's kingdom.

See for another thing what a right sense of sin the thief had. He says to his companion, "We receive the due reward of our deeds." He acknowledges his own ungodliness and the justice of his punishment. He makes no attempt to justify himself or excuse his wickedness. He speaks like a man humbled and self-abased by the remembrance of past iniquities. This is what all God's children feel. They are ready to allow they are poor, hell deserving sinners.

In one word you see in the penitent thief a finished work of the Holy Ghost. Every part of the believer's character may be traced in him. Short as life was after conversion, he found time to leave abundant evidence that he was a child of God. His faith, his prayer, his humility, his brotherly love, are unmistakeable witnesses of the reality of his repentance. He was not penitent in name only, but in deed and in truth. —Ryle.

We ridicule others for their fears and failures and yet fear and fail like them in like situations; for many a path that appears smooth at a distance, is found to be rough when we have to travel it.

You will never have a friend if you must have one without a failing.

A VOICE FROM HEAVEN.

I shine in the light of God,
His likeness stamps my brow,
Through the shadows of death my feet have trod,
And I reign in glory now.

No aching heart is here,
No keen and thrilling pain,
No wasted cheek, where the frequent tear
Hath rolled and left its stain.

I have found the joys of heaven;
I am one of the angel band;
To my head a crown is given,
And a harp is in my hand.

I have learned the song they sing,
Whom Jesus hath set free,
And the glorious walls of heaven still ring,
With my new-born melody.

No sin, no grief, no pain,
Safe in my happy home,
My fears all quelled, my doubts all slain,
Mine hour of triumph come.

Friends of my mortal years,
The trusted and the true,
Ye are walking still through the valley of tears,
And I wait to welcome you.

Do I forget?—Oh! No,
For memory's golden chain,
Still binds my heart to the hearts below,
Till they meet and touch again.

Each link is strong and bright;
And love's celestial flame,
Flows swiftly down, like a river of light,
To the world from which I came.

Do you mourn when another star
Shines out from the glittering sky?
Do you weep when the raging voice of war
And storm of conflict die?

Then why should your tears run down,
And your hearts be sorely riven,
For another gem in the Saviour's crown,
And another soul in heaven?

What are another's faults to me?
I've not a vulture's bill
To pick at every flaw I see,
And make it wider still.
It is enough for me to know
I've follies of my own,
And on my heart the care bestow,
And let my friends alone.

The Branch Mint and Trade.

In another column we give the annual operations of the Branch Mint in this city for the year ending June 30, 1856. It will be perceived the entire amount of coinage is a little over three and a quarter million of dollars. It was with considerable surprise we observed in the annual report of the Director of the Principal Mint remarks that the Branch Mint at this place was superfluous and ought to be closed. Of course it would please Mr. Director Snowden to have all the coin and bullion received at this port transported to Philadelphia. While thinking of this suggestion it may be well to remark that a mint at Philadelphia is altogether superfluous, and the remark will apply with more force and with more practice to the Philadelphia Mint than to the New Orleans Branch, for the imports of coin are nothing into the port of Philadelphia even in comparison to New Orleans. As regards the Branch Mints in Georgia and North Carolina, they were built at a time of great excitement in the gold regions of these States, and as these mines were unproductive the actual coinage at both mints for the year 1855 was $334,000, and, being located distant from the seaboard, they might, without inconvenience to the commerce and trade of the country, be abolished. But when the suggestion is made of the mint in this city, we conceive it to be entirely out of place, and trust we shall hear no more of it hereafter.

There was considerable activity and bustle on the levee to-day, occasioned by the arrival of seven steamboats, four of them from the West, with large cargoes. From all accounts, the Ohio and Upper Mississippi are becoming very low, and freights from Louisville and Cincinnati to this port rule very high. From St. Louis, the prospects are not so unfavorable. So long as there is twenty to twenty-four inches of water on the bars there will be boats built to meet it. The Mississippi, however, to the mouth of the Ohio, or to the city of Cairo, is in a very good stage for the largest class of boats, so that there will not be much interruption to that point for some time to come.

There is nothing doing in cotton of moment; in fact, there cannot be much in market on sale either in first, second or third hands, as the stock to-day is reduced to seventeen thousand bales, and a good share of that is on shipboard, so that the stock is now lower than it has been at any time on the 22d July, excepting once, in the last ten years. The stock of tobacco is rather more than at the same time last year, but much less than the previous nine years.

Freights to distant ports have improved, but they are sufficiently low yet, and a ship loaded at the current rates may have sufficient left at the end of a foreign voyage, if she has good luck Homeward, to pay for a new coat of paint, but whether the owners will realize a new dollar for on old one is a matter of extreme doubt. The arrivals have not been numerous this week; vessels from New York are having long voyages, some arriving now and then after forty to forty-five days.

To Keep Fresh Meat in Summer.—A good plan is to put the meat into a stone jar, and cover it with sour milk. By changing the milk once or twice, it will keep a week or more. Before cooking, wash the milk from the meat, and lay it in a little soda water a few minutes.

The National Medical Association have inserted in their code of medical ethics, an article which declares it to be derogatory to the dignity of the profession to resort to public advertisements, or private cards, or hand-bills, inviting the attention of individuals afflicted with particular diseases—publicly offering advice and medicine to the poor, gratis—or promising radical cures and remedies, or adducing certificates of skill and success, or performing any similar acts. Old fogy nonsense!

The result of the twin five hundred pound blasts upon the Dam and Reef, in New York harbor, has been greater, in proportion to the quantity of powder used, than smaller ones. The contractors estimate that they each removed more rock than three times that weight of powder in one hundred pound charges.

The subject of making good johnny-cake is now claiming the attention of several of the European powers, and two or three of them have lately addressed to their agents at Washington pressing demands for instructions to this important branch of culinary science. As soon as the e recipes reach the other side of the Atlantic, they are immediately published in the non official part of the Paris Moniteur.

A second jury was empannelled at Washington on Wednesday, the 16th inst., for the trial of Herbert.

SQUARE BLOCK PAVEMENTS.

Nothing, in our opinion, adds more to the finish of a city, or conveys a better idea of its substantiality, than well paved streets. No matter how extensively wealth and taste may display themselves in public and private buildings, the effect is marred if the streets on which they stand are uneven or dirty. So great indeed, is the difference between a badly paved street and well paved one, that whilst fine houses on the one have a sorry look; mean houses on the other possess a certain amount of dignity. So much for the appearance of well paved streets.

Another argument for good pavements is their facilitation of business. Vehicles of all kinds get over them with considerable more speed and considerably less labor. Every driver knows this. The habit that draymen and carters have of deboucheing from one to three squares out of their direct route, in order to gain the advantage of a good pavement, must be observable to a great many beside themselves. The comfort of riding over good pavements is another thing that must not be forgotten. In the omnibusses, how many persons do we see who sit bolt upright whilst the vehicle is tumbling and pitching through the holes and ruts of the badly paved streets, but who lean back and take their ease so soon as they feel themselves on an even unflinching pavement. The comfort of the horses and mules, who draw the vehicles, and of the liberls, who ride in them, are strong persuasions in favor of good pavements.

And this brings us to consider what constitutes a good pavement—the best pavement? In this city four kinds of paving have been thoroughly tested. Round stones last a short time; shells a shorter time; planks the shortest time: but square blocks outlast them all together. In other cities, other kinds of paving have been tried, such as wooden blocks, asphaltum, the Russ pavement, etc.; but we would never advise the introduction of such experiments here. We are convinced that the simplest, most durable, and consequently cheapest pavement in the world is that which is made of square granite blocks.

Round stones require a more solid sub-stratum than the spongy soil of Louisiana can afford. They have little or no support upon each other: and this with their shape renders the passage of every wheel over them just like a blow of a ram, and very soon they sink or twist out of place; ooze accumulates, and in due time there are mud holes or ruts, and the street becomes as grievous as if it had never been paved. The filling up of such holes with shells, or ramming down a new stone here and there, only aggravates the evil and causes the hills and valleys to change places. We are speaking, it must be understood, of the busy thoroughfares through which heavy and crowded vehicles are passing all the time. Round stones answer very well and perhaps are more economical for those streets whose comaerce is limited to the breed and milk wagons, with irregular visitations of other vehicles.

Shells, plentifully used, make a solid, even road, very comfortable to drive over; but they are a terrible nuisance in dry, windy weather. They create, it is true, no mud when it rains; but in dry weather they create dust of a quality and in a quantity compared with which clay dust is a luxury. Shells are very good for garden walks and suburban drives, but entirely unfit for the public streets.

Plank roads have recently been demonstrated to be an humbug and a nuisance so egregious that we need say nothing about them; feeling satisfied, as we do, that they will not be tried again in a hurry.

Square granite blocks have been in use in this city, in some of the streets, for several years; and, so far, we hear but one opinion about them—that they are the only material that will make a decent pavement on our soil. In New Levee, Tchoupitoulas, Old Levee, Chartres and Royal streets, the blocks have been thundered over from dawn to dusk, daily, ever since they were laid; yet they are as clean and firm now as they were at first. Here and there, perhaps, a slight depression may be seen; but a mud-hole or a rut is an impossibility, and no impediment whatever is offered to hoof or wheel. A block, being square, cannot slide like a round stone, nor can the most pernicious shock displace it in the least. Another great advantage of square block pavements is their cleanliness. If a street is properly graded and paved with blocks, the rain alone will keep it as clean as it ever need be. It is positively a beautiful sight to look at the square-block pavements in some of the streets after a rain. A parlor floor could scarcely be cleaner.

The advantages of square block pavements over every other kind being so numerous and great, a "looker-on in Vienna" might reasonably wonder why they are not more generally in use; particularly if he were to know—which is the fact—that they are also cheaper than any other kind. The simplest kind of cyphering demonstrates the last-named fact. It requires a large sum of money, it is true, to lay a square block pavement; but the pavement, once laid, requires no further drafts upon the treasury, and is a pavement. Round-stones, on the contrary, are comparatively cheap; but the cost of buying and laying them is only the begining of the expense. They are everlastingly out of position, or smothered with mud; and the money that is paid out in driblets, from year to year, to street contractors to peak and scrape and tinker at them, without doing them any actual good, amounts to an aggregate equal to, if not greatly exceeding, the cost of good square block pavements. For ances have been, and are being made off the round-stone streets; but no fortunes will ever be made in pecking and scraping at the square block streets.

Of course, in the present condition of city finances, we do not urge anything like a universal system of block paving. But, we think it ought to be introduced, or at least continued by degrees, the different thoroughfares taking their turn according to their importance. We have one noble square block thoroughfare—Tchoupitoulas and Old Levee streets—extending from Napoleon Avenue to the Lower Cotton Press, a distance of six miles—one of the finest streets in the whole Union, for business purposes. We have other important thoroughfares that are partially paved with blocks, and ought to be completed.—Magazine, as well as Tchoupitoulas, is a continuation of Old Levee street, and is paved with square blocks in the Fourth District. The street is an important one, and abundantly entitled to a continuation of the square blocks from the Fourth District terminus to Canal street. The square blocks of Chartres street ought likewise to be continued up Camp street as far at least as Prytania. The condition of Camp street from Canal to Poydras is really a disgrace to the city. The street contractors are continually patching and scraping it; still it is continually full of holes, and disgustingly muddy in wet weather.

Camp and Magazine streets have gone far beyond their regular apprenticeship to round stones and mud, and are by every consideration of necessity and justice entitled to square blocks. We would like also to see the square blocks of Royal continued up St. Charles street, as far as Tivoli Circle: but that is not so much of a commercial street, and we can let it pass for the present.

For Camp and Magazine streets, however, we will not abate one jot of our demand: and, with all proper respect, we commend the system of square block paving to the consideration of the present Common Council, and urge upon that body the particular necessity of improving Camp and Magazine streets by that system, thereby giving them that cleanliness and easiness of passage to which their central position and commercial importance fairly entitle them. If the expense is too great for one year, make a commencement by paying them as far as Poydras, or Julia street this year, leaving to your successors the duty of completing the work.

The Board of Trade of Buffalo has issued a report of the commerce of that city for the year 1855, embracing a summary statement of the trade of the upper lakes, which amounted to $41,415,203, exclusive of the produce from the West by the Lake Shore Railroad, left at Dunkirk.

Good-Temper.—Only the nation which invented comfort was capable of conceiving good-temper; for good-temper be to the moral what comfort is to the physical man. It is the most contented, the most comfortable state of the soul; the greatest happiness both for those who possess it and those who feel its influence. With gentleness in his own character, comfort in his house and good temper in his wife, the earthly felicity of man is complete.

The crops, both of corn and cotton, in North Mississippi and West Tennessee, are said to be in a most promising condition. Several heavy rains have fallen recently, which greatly improved them.

THREE DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMSHIP PERSIA.

COTTON FIRM.

RISE IN BREADSTUFFS.

BY THE SOUTHERN AND NATIONAL LINES.

NEW YORK, July 23.—The royal mail steamship Persia, from Liverpool on the afternoon of the 12th, arrived at this port this morning.

Commercial Intelligence.

COTTON.—The market is steady and prices are unchanged. The sales of the week amounted to 35,000 bales, of which 3000 bales were taken on speculation and 1600 for export. The market closed firm at 7d. for Orleans Fair; Orleans Middling, 6 11-16; 6¾ for Uplands Fair, and 6 3-16 for Uplands Middling. The whole stock in port amounted to 700,000 bales, of which 575,000 were American.

Breadstuffs are a shade higher, and the market is firm. Wheat had advanced 2d. Flour 6d. to 1s. In corn, holders demand an advance of 1s. Transactions are moderate at previous rates. The weather had been stormy.

The bullion in the Bank of England had decreased £450,000.

Consols on Saturday were quoted at 95¼ to 95¾ for money; 95¾ on account.

Western Canal flour 33s. to 33s. Baltimore 34s. 6d. to 35s. 6d. Ohio 35s. 6d. to 37s. 6d.

Wheat—Western red 9s. 9d. to 10s. 0d. White 10s 3d. to 11s. 3d.

Corn—Western yellow 29s. to 29s. 6d. White 29s. 6d. to 30s. 6d.

Common Rosin 4s. 3d.

The Cotton Market.

LIVERPOOL, July 12, 3 P. M.—The sales yesterday amounted to 11,000 bales, the market closing unchanged in every respect.

HAVRE, July 8.—The sales of the week amount to 11,000 bales, at 45.

Political News.

The Persia brings no news of importance.

There is nothing new in American affairs except that the press assumes a milder tone on the Central American question.

Washington Affairs.

WASHINGTON, July 22.—Mr. Brooks is out in a long statement in the Union, stating that Burlinghame had chosen as a place for settling their dispute, Niagara Falls, which he (Burlinghame) knew it would be impossible for him (Brooks) to reach and return without running a gauntlet of mobs, assassins, penitentiaries, bailiffs, etc.,—that the proposition is too preposterous for him to accept, and that he leaves Burlinghame to the indignation and condemnation of all honorable men—but that he will accept a challenge from him hereafter.

Domestic Markets.

NEW YORK, July 21.—Flour is a trifle lower; State is quoted at $5.90. Mess Pork, $20 62½. Whisky, 30c. Coffee, 11c.

CINCINNATI, July 21.—Flour firm at $5 25 to $5 35. Whisky 32½ to 32¾c. Coffee, 11 to 11½c.

Intelligence.

LOUISVILLE, July 21.—The river is falling, with scant three feet in the canal.

We copy the following from the Evening Picayune, of yesterday:

Quaker City at New York.

NEW YORK, July 21.—The steamship Quaker City, Capt. Shufeldt, from Matdle via Havana, has arrived here. Her dates from the latter city are to the 7th inst.

The yellow fever is reported to be still raging at Havana, and the Captain General is stated to be ill.

The clipper ship Black Hawk had landed 600 coolies at Havana. Forty of those with whom she started died on the passage.

From Washington.

WASHINGTON, July 21.—In the Senate to-day, the bill providing for the appropriation of $3,000,000, to increase the efficiency of the army was passed.

A resolution that Congress adjourn on the 11th of August, was passed by the Senate.

July 22.—The House has agreed to adjourn on the 18th of August.

AN APPEAL FOR FORBEARANCE.—The clergymen of Richmond have issued an appeal to the ultras of all sections of the country, in which they urge moderation and forbearance, and hold this language:

Let us sedulously avoid every word and deed which can tend to increase the public excitement and irritation. Let us give no countenance to lawless violence, whether in low or high places. Let us seek by every practicable method to strengthen and brighten the bond of fraternal union, which should embrace every citizen of our favored States and Territories. And above all, let Christians fervently pray to the Father of Light for His blessing on our rulers—that they may be wise, firm, conciliating and patriotic; and for our people, that they may be peaceable, prosperous and happy. We are called individually to self-examination, and the confession of our sins, penitence, and a reformation of our lives; and by these methods, far more readily than by fierce discussion, we avert the dangers which are impending over our beloved land. And now we entreat you, by every consideration of patriotism and piety—by the memory of our fathers—by the blood which purchased our liberties—by the illustrious deeds of Bunker Hill and Yorktown—by the history of the past—by the millions, living and unborn, whose welfare depends on the preservation of our Union—and especially by our religious prosperity, so greatly increased under our excellent Government, to "follow the things which make for peace."

RENDERING WOVEN FABRICS WATER PROOF.—An invention lately brought forward renders cotton cloth water-proof by the application to its surface of the following vernishes: In three gallons of water, half a pound of alum, one pound of ox gall, and two pounds of linseed cake, are boiled for one hour, then allowed to cool, and applied with a brush to the surface of the cloth to be coated, which is afterward placed in a stove room to dry. The next coating is composed of three gallons of linseed oil, one quarter pound of litharge, one half pound of Indin rubber, one half pound of tar, and one half pound of Prussian blue—the latter as a coloring material. These are boiled for about an hour, and well stirred all the time, when it will form a strong varnish. It is now allowed to cool, and is put on the surface of the cloth with a brush or machine. The cloth is then allowed to dry again in a stove room, and when dry, its surface is rubbed with pumice stone to make it smooth. The third and last coat is composed of three gallons of linseed oil, boiled over a strong fire for two hours, with two ounces of the salts of tin, and the same amount of sulphate of zinc—both dryers.

FORTIFICATIONS OF SAN FRANCISCO.—It is intended by the government that when the fortifications of San Francisco harbor are completed, the fortresses and arms shall be as follows: Fort Point, 154 guns; Lime Point, 80 guns; Angel Island, 40 guns; Alcatraz Island, 50 guns. Total, 354 guns. Of these guns the majority throw balls as heavy as 64 pounds; some of them are 120 pounders, and the lowest are 32 pounders. The fortifications at Fort Point and Alcatraz Islands, the most important positions, are in an advanced condition, and could be prepared for a heavy fight in a short time.

We have received the Royal Standard, published at Grand Turk, Turks Islands, June 28. The members of the Council, the public officers, and many other inhabitants, had presented to James Winter, Esq., United States Consul at the Turks Islands, a complimentary address on the eve of his return to the United States. About 12,000 bushels of salt had been gathered at Salt Cay, during the week previous to June 28. The quantity on hand within the colony is supposed to be 170,000 bushels. Price 12 cents, export duty ½ per cent. [Charleston Courier, 18th.

A Greek maiden, being asked what fortune she would bring her husband, replied in the following beautiful language: "I will bring him what gold cannot purchase—a heart unspotted, and virtue without a stain—which is all that descended to me from my parents."

It is difficult to conceive anything more beautiful than the reply given by one in affliction, when he was asked how he bore it so well. "It lightens the stroke," said he, "to draw near to him who handles the rod."

Emerson, in a lecture on the Anglo-American says:

"Americans would ride in steamers made of lucifer matches, if they could thereby save one hour in crossing the Atlantic."

"Doctor," said a loquacious lady, "why have I lost my teeth?"

"You have worn them out with your tongue, ma'am," replied the dentist. The lady changed her medical man.

There is something amusing in the simplicity of the little girl, who asked a younger sister to spell "cat," and upon being told she could not do it, desired her to try "kitten."

LATER FROM CENTRAL AMERICA.

ARRIVAL OF THE GEO. LAW AND ORIZABA?

By the arrival of the above steamers at New York, we have intelligence from Central America later by several days than that brought by the Daniel Webster, which arrived here on the 12th inst.

The reported election of Gen. Walker to the presidency is confirmed by the Nicaraguense, files of which we have received to the 28th.

The Nicaraguense, of the 21st ult., has the intelligence of the death of Mr. J. T. Cady, at San Juan del Sur, of cholera.

Mr. Cady was connected with the press of Louisiana, and a correspondent of the Nicaraguense, over the signature of "Cynes," and is spoken of as a fine writer.

El Nicaraguense, of June 28th, has the following general intelligence:

Captain O'Keefe's Company, (Company E, Second Light Infantry,) is the only company of soldiers now stationed at Virgin Bay. The people have all returned to their houses, and every accommodation that existed of yore for the benefit of the passengers is now ready for the reception of those expected on the steamer on the 7th of next month.

The valiant and truly patriotic Gen. Chilton arrived in town on Thursday, from Leon. He reports all quiet at that place, and says the citizens have had no lot or part in the disgraceful proceedings of his ex-Excellency, Mr. Hiive.

Attention is called to the advertisement of the Quartermaster General, calling for proposals to furnish the army in shoes, and also for grass and corn. Americans in want of employment may look for a chance in these advertisements.

Lieut. John G. Bush, of the Rangers, was thrown from his horse at Managua, last week, and the fall severely injured his right arm. We are happy to say, however, that he is now recovering the use of his wounded limb.

Since the war with Costa Rica, terminated by the flight of Moras, the department of Rivas has been under the command of Brigadier-General Hornsby, and as a matter of course, in a state of the utmost quietude. The crop of cocoa is rapidly being gathered in, and will yield this season at least a million of dollars. Most of this is taken from confiscated property, and therefore goes into the treasury of the State. The property itself is in the hands of persons selected by the Government to take care of it, and these are superintending the gathering of the crops.

Sunday, Monday and Tuesday were consumed in receiving votes for President of the Republic. The people took a very general interest in the election, and the natives walked up and put in a straight ballot for General Walker. Amongst the Americans who are allowed to vote under the constitution of the State, many cast their ballots for Don Fermin Ferrer, while the great majority voted for the General. At Massaya, a fever seized the people, and they went to the polls in solid phalanx and put General Walker through without a dissenting vote. We understand the same feeling has been evinced in other portions of the State.

Mr. H. B. Drew, a gentleman of considerable means, who intended to commence business in this city, disappeared on or about the 15th of June, and has not been heard from since. Mr. Drew was known to have money about his person, and although the fact that he was partially deranged at the time might lead to the belief that he had made way with himself; yet there are strong suspicions that he was foully dealt with. Several parties have been out in search for him, but as yet no tidings have been obtained. The American Minister advertises a reward of twenty-five dollars for news concerning the missing man.

From the official documents published in the Spanish portion of our paper, it will be seen that the grave charge of breaking into and robbing the church at Rivas has been preferred against the Costa Ricans by the curate of that place, the Rev. Hurcuiano Salvatierra. On the 12th of April, after the Americans left Rivas, the Costa Ricans broke into the church, and after committing many wanton acts against the consecrated vestments and images of the sacred house, they carried off the crucifixes, and ornaments made of gold and silver.

Promotions and Appointments.

Taken from the General Orders of the Army.

John A. Jaquess appointed Colonel, 2d Light Infantry Battalion.

E. H. McDonald appointed Lieutenant Colonel, 2d Light Infantry Battalion.

Thomas Henry, J. H. Drew and Joseph Hermandy appointed Captains, 2d Light Infantry Battalion.

W. S. West, John Cooper and Diego Hernandez appointed 1st Lieutenants, 2d Light Infantry Battalion.

E. H. Clark, Arthur Connor and Henry T. Sherman appointed 2d Lieutenants, 2d Light Infantry Battalion.

Dr. C. H. Scott appointed Surgeon, with rank of Captain.

Captain John P. Waters promoted Major of the Rangers.

Robert Ellis appointed Captain of Rangers, commanding Company B.

John G. Bush and R. W. Pickersgill appointed First Lieutenants of Rangers.

Samuel H. Lasile, M. A. Frazer and Jas. A. Fisher appointed Second Lieutenants of Rangers.

W. H. Newly appointed Second Lieutenant.

First Lieutenant Wm. Merriman promoted Captain, First Rifle Battalion.

Second Lieut. J. C. Donnecan promoted First Lieutenant, First Rifle Battalion.

First Lieut. Thomas Dolan promoted Captain, First Rifle Battalion:

John J. Rivera appointed Second Lieuteeant, First Rifle Battalion.

Capt. Manuel F. Pineda attached to the staff of the Commander-in-Chief as Aid-de-Camp.

First Lieut. F. A. Thompson to be Captain, First Light Infantry Battalion.

Second Lieut. John W. Anderson to be First Lieutenant, First Light Infantry Battalion.

Second Lieut. R. E. Dicmon to be First Lieutenant, Second Light Infantry Battalion, Company C.

James St. Levy to be Quartermaster of Second Light Infantry Battalion, rank of Second Lieutenant.

James H. Hearsey appointed Second Lieutenant, Second Light Infantry Battalion.

Dr. Sanders, Surgeon, with rank of Captain, assigned to the Rangers.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.—The Washington Star says:

It is being said that the Republican party House managers have at length agreed to take up the Senate's joint resolution fixing a day for the termination of the session, and that they propose to pass it without amendment; or, in other words, to terminate the session without consummating anything for the pacification of California or the enactment of the annual appropriations bills. Tha truth is, since the failure of the negotiations to induce both Dayton and Johnston to withdraw their respective pretensions to the Vice Presidency, said to have been carried on at the quarters of Speaker Banks in this city, the aforesaid managers have grown desperate. Their game now is to superinduce as much confusion and as much real danger as possible in the condition of public affairs, in the hope of thus so exciting the Northern mass as to induce them to vote in November pretty much as a frightened flock of sheep obey or follow the motions of the first one of them who moves.

A FIENDISH ACT—Several Children Poisoned.—The Warsaw (Missouri,) Democrat, gives the following account of one of the most diabolical acts on record:

Mr. H. C. O'Haver has just related to us one of the most shocking affairs, which occurred the latter part of last week, that has ever taken place in this section of the State, the circumstances of which are as follows: It seems that James Ray, a resident of Morgan county, had had some previous difficulty with some of his neighbors, and that failing to get revenge, he concluded to take it out by poisoning the indefensive little children of those with whom he had a difficulty, and who were attending a school in that county. He consequently obtained a quantity of poison—put it in a squirrel's head, and had it in a sprig used by the school. The result was the poisoning of nearly the whole of the children of the schoo—two or three of whom died, and seven or eight others; our informant says, cannot survive. The schoolmaster, whose name we do not remember, had also been poisoned, and his death was beyond question.

Ray was arrested by the citizens of his neighborhood, and made his escape in the night, but was again apprehended near, or in Quincy, Hickory county, and carried back on Sunday evening last. It was supposed that he would be lynched.

THE RICE CROP ON SAVANNAH RIVER.—The Savannah Journal says:

"From all our sources of information, we are able to announce that the rice crop is a very fair average one on Savannah river. The harvest water has pretty generally been put upon the rice, and planters are doing the works of improvement to their plantations which occur between hoeing and harvest. We have heard considerable complaints of "volunteer rice," but the general impression appears to be that it is not near so bad as it was last year.

"We are without reliable information as to the crops on the Altamaha, the Ogeechee and the Satilla. We should be obliged to any of our friends on these rivers if they would give us a line or two on this subject. Also from the sea island planters on our coast, and from the upland planters throughout the State.

"With regard to Upland cotton, we can generally gather pretty reliable accounts from our exchanges, but of Sea Island cotton and rice, we are left in profound ignorance."

La Bruyere says: "When a person of feeling and discernment reads a book, and it excites in him elevated thoughts, he may be sure the work is good, and he needs no other mode of proving it."

ADVERTISING OUT WEST.—A man in Wisconsin, recently advertising his farm for sale, winds up as follows: "The surrounding country is the most beautiful the God of nature ever made. The scenery is celestial, divine; also two wagons to sell and a yoke of steers."

The wild woman, says the Cincinnati Comercial of the 11th inst., who has for some time been on exhibition in this city, was tried yesterday on a charge of lunacy, before the probate court, a number of physicians of the first respectability being present, and from the evidence given and the facts elicited in the examination of her person by the physicians, it appears that the largest portion of the mystery in the case is humbuggery. She is a woman of remarkable appearance, and when first brought to the city was about the wildest looking human creature that we ever saw. If her wildness has been acted, then she is an actress of no ordinary capacity. Her female attendant seems to have been deceived, and Northcote, who told the wonderful story about capturing the creature, (described as dressed in skins sewn together with grass,) with his dogs, has suddenly departed.

ORIGIN OF THE CRESCENT.—When Philip of Macedon approached by night with his troops to scale the walls of Byzantium, the moon shone out and discovered his design to the besieged, who vigorously repulsed him. The crescent was afterwards adopted as the favorite badge of the city. When the Turks took Byzantium they found the crescent in every public place, and believing it to possess some magical power, they adopted it themselves.

The Albany Evening Journal, of the 14th inst., announces the death of John J. Hoyd, an old and estimable merchant of that place. Mr. Boyd retired from business with a competency nearly thirty years ago, and has occupied the interval diligently but unostentatiously, in good works.

We learn that C. T. Baker, A. C. Baptista, Carlos Sabrada, and Wm. Stabler were arrested in Baltimore on the 14th inst., on a charge of being engaged in the slave trade. The schooner C. F. Cole, it was alleged, purchased and fitted out by them for the coast of Africa, had landed a cargo of slaves at Havana, from whence she returned to the Chesapeake Bay, where was the intention to scuttle and abandon her; but she was taken up and brought into Baltimore, and the parties above named were arrested. Baptista is the Portuguese Consul at that port.

The crops in the western or mountainous sections of the county, says the Cumberland (Md.) Telegraph, promise an abundant yield. The wheat crop now just beginning to turn into its "golden glory," stands well upon the ground, as does also the rye. The oats looks thrifty and promise a good yield. The grass generally is thin and short, owing to the long continued cold weather in the early part of the season. In that region hay is now selling at twelve dollers per ton. The grass harvest has just commenced.

Two of Hazzard's powder mills at Enfield, Ct., were blown up on the morning of the 12th inst., and three workmen dangerously, if not fatally injured.

The ship Golden Gate, from New York for Bombay, before reported at Pernambuco in distress, was burnt to the water's edge at that port on May 21st, and sunk.

The contributions in New York, for the relief of the sufferers by the inundations in France, amount to $11,000.

It seems of the ninety-one counties in Indiana, the inhabitants of eighty can leave home in the morning, go to Indianapolis by railroad, attend to business there from two to eight hours, and return home the same evening.

The Poole murder, it is estimated, will cost the City of New York something like $100,000. The cost of summoning extra jurors on the attempt to bring on the second trial was $2,000.

Underwood, the Virginian who was notified by his neighbors to leave the "Old Dominion," for making a speech at the National Republican Convention, has gone to New York with his family.

A Chicago paper tells of a young man who was well nigh being ruined by a legacy left him a few years since by his father. It was $23,000, and the career he ran in Chicago made him a miserable broken down loafer, who was, from a liberal sowing of his wild oats, reaping a most abundant crop of repentance. In this mood and tense it was announced to him that a deceased uncle had left him $30,000. "Oh! dear!" was his exclamation, "have I got to go through all this again? It'll kill me just as sure as shooting! It is no use to fight against fate, they are bound to ruin me!"

Those persons who gain the hearts of most people, who are chosen as the companions of their softer hours, and their reliefs from anxiety and care, are seldom persons of shining qualities or strong virtues; it is rather the soft green of the soil on which we rest our eyes that are fatigued with beholding more glaring objects.

SWINE AND THEIR VALUE AT THE WEST.—The number of hogs in the States of Ohio, Indiana, Michigan and Kentucky at this time, is estimated by the editor of the Ohio Farmer at 10,943,334, which at $3 a head, a fair average value of the stock, amounts to $32,830,002. If fat and sold in New York, they would average $10 a head, $109,433,340. The pork interest of the whole country is almost beyond belief. Its magnitude is so great. The census report of stock owned by farmers in 1849, gave the number of hogs in the United States at over thirty millions. It is more than fifty per cent. greater now, and the average value is at least $3—say one hundred and fifty millions of dollars invested in stock hogs.

A large cabinet manufacturing establishment, belonging to Messrs. Jaques & Ilay, together with all the adjacent buildings, lumber-yards, wharves, etc., were entirely consumed by fire at Toronto, (C. W.,) on the 16th inst. The fire burned with such rapidity that the workmen had to jump from the upper stories of the buildings, and several were killed, besides many being badly injured. The loss of property is said to have been immense.

The trial of Da Cunha, indicted for fitting out the brig Braman as a slaver, was commenced in the United States District Court at New York, on the 14th inst., before the Hon. Samuel R. Betts; the Hon. John McKeon, United States District Attorney, appeared on the part of the Government. Da Cunha was defended by Erastus M. Benedict, Esq. As the preliminary examination before Mr. Commissioner Morton was quite lengthy, it is probable that this trial will occupy considerable time.

It was rumored in Washington on the 12 inst., that after Mr. Woodruff had concluded his remarks in the House on that day, Mr. Brooks informed him, through Mr. Savage, that he took exceptions to them, and intimated a meeting. Mr. Woodruff declined, on the ground that it was contrary to his religious views, and a violation of the laws of the land.

There were 170 deaths in the city of Baltimore during the week ending on Monday, the 14th instant, of whom 83 were under one year, and 30 between one and two years. Compared with the report of the previous week, this shows a decrease of 18.

The number of deaths in the city of New York during the week ending Sunday, the 13th inst., was 382, of whom 105 were adults and 277 minors. The number of deaths in Brooklyn was 53, of whom 34 were minors.

The night mail train from New York to Boston encountered a rail maliciously placed across the track near Long Meadow Station, four miles from Boston, at about 11 o'clock on the night of the 13th instant, throwing it from the track and badly smashing the engine

History of Hail Columbia.

The following history of the now famous song of "Hail Columbia," (which we publish below,) from the pen of the author, Judge Hopkinson, will be read with interest by those of our readers who are unacquainted with its history. The author says:

The song was written in the summer of 1798, when a war with France was thought to be inevitable—Congress being then in session at Philadelphia, deliberating upon that important subject, and acts of hostility having actually occurred. The contest between England and France was raging, and the people were divided into parties for the one side or the other—some thinking that policy and duty required us to take part with Republican France, as she was called; others were for our connecting ourselves with England, under the belief that she was the great preserving power of good principles and safe government. The violation of our rights by both belligerents was owing us from the just and wise policy of President Washington, which was to be equal justice to both, to take part with neither, but to keep a strict and honest neutrality between them.

The prospect of a rupture with France was exceedingly offensive to the portion of the people which espoused her cause, and the violence of the spirit of party has never risen higher—I think not as high—as it did at that time on that question. The theater was then open in our city. A young man belonging to it, whose talent was a singer was about to take his benefit. I had known him when he was at school. On this acquaintance he called on me in the afternoon, his benefit being announced for the following day. He said he had no boxes taken, and the prospect was that he should suffer a loss instead of receiving a benefit from the performance; but that if he could get a patriotic song adapted to the tune of the "President's March," then the popular air, he did not doubt of a full house; that the poets of the theatrical corps had been trying to accomplish it, but were satisfied that no words could be composed to suit the music of that march. I told him I would try for him. He came the next afternoon, and the song, such as it is, was ready for him. It was performed on Monday morning, and the theater was crowded to excess, and so continued night after night for the rest of the season, the song being encored and repeated many times during each night, the whole audience joining in the chorus. It was also sung at night in the streets by large assemblies of citizens, including members of Congress. The enthusiasm was general, and the song was heard, I may say, in every part of the United States. The object of the author was to get up an American spirit, which should be independent of, and above the interests, passions, and prejudices of belligerents, and look and feel for our rights and rights alone. Not an allusion is made either to France or England, or the quarrel between them, or to which was the most in fault in their treatment of us. Of course the song found favor with both parties; at least, neither of them could disown the sentiments it inculcated. It was truly American, and therefore it lived, and the patriotic feelings of every American heart responded to it. Such is the history of this song, which has endured infinitely beyond any expectation of the author, and beyond any merit it can boast of, except that of being truly and exclusively patriotic in its sentiments and spirit.

HAIL! COLUMBIA.

Hail! Columbia, happy land!
Hail! ye heroes, heav'n born band,
Who fought and bled in Freedom's cause,
Who fought and bled in Freedom's cause,
And when the storm of war was gone,
Enjoy'd the regular calm;
Let Independence be our boast,
Ever mindful what it cost,
Ever grateful for the prize,
Let its altar often be nigh!

CHORUS.
Firm, united, let us be,
Rallying round our Liberty!
As a band of brothers join'd,
Peace and safety we shall find.

Immortal patriots! rise once more,
Defend your rights, defend your shore,
Let no rude foe, with impious hand,
Invade the shrine where sacred lies,
Of toil and blood the well earned prize;
While offering peace sincere and just,
In Heaven we place a manly trust,
That truth and justice will prevail,
And every scheme of bondage fail.
CHORUS—Firm, united, etc.

Sound, O ye sound the trump of Fame,
And let Washington's great name,
Ring through the world with loud applause,
Let every clime to Freedom dear
Listen with a joyful ear;
With equal skill, with godlike power,
He governs in the fearful hour
Of horrid war, or guides with ease
Our nation in the blaze of peace.
CHORUS—Firm, united, etc.

Behold the chief who now commands,
Once more to serve his country stands,
The rock on which the storm will beat,
But storm'd in virtue, firm and true,
His head shall high in honor rise,
Unchang'd by all your enemies,
Your favor gained, your peace restored,
Your vanish'd commerce, and your board.
CHORUS—Firm, united, etc.

Sound, sound the clarion, fill the fife,
To all the sons of Columbia's life,
Through the world our fame resound,
Through the world our fame resound,
How stamp'd with honor is each son,
When firm defending Columbia's right,
He bravely fought, and bravely bled,
Or firmly join'd, if not to wield
The sword, the pen of the field.
CHORUS—Firm, united, etc.

Arm, arm, ye brave,
Let vengeance rouse the rage within your breasts,
While peace and liberty lie bleeding,
While peace and liberty lie bleeding,
To arms, to arms, and strike the sword,
Whose thirst is fame, and freedom to your land.
Then let the trumpet sound,
The tocsin of war's alarm,
Our cause is just, and this our motto,
"In God is all our trust."
And when the battle's won,
And thus our country's crown'd,
Let the victor's laurels hang
Around the olive bough,
While the peaceful arts shall flourish,
And fame our deeds proclaim,
And in the world's great future,
Fair Columbia gain the name,
Of the seat of the only true religion,
And freedom's happy home.
CHORUS—Firm, united, etc.

My Wife's New Friend.

Mrs. Jones has quite a habit of cultivating sudden friendships, which have every appearance of blooming forever, but which soon wither in the world's cold blasts. I used to think that this character was confined to school girls, who profess immortal fidelity in letters crossed and re-crossed, but forget each other as soon as they have caught a lover.

My wife's last acquisition, in the way of a bosom friend, is Mrs. Mortimer Mowbray, with whom she became acquainted last summer, while she was on a visit out of town. Mrs. Mortimer Mowbray had her carriage with her, and created quite a sensation: in fact, every lady in the house was eager to become her confident. But the amiable department of Mrs. Jones, combined, I doubt, with her intellectual accomplishments, rendered her the favorite; and she it was who daily occupied the spare seat in the carriage, and had the honor of advising Mrs. Mowbray in those thousand grave perplexities under which women suffer.

We returned to the city after the Mowbrays, but my wife, though usually very firm on questions of etiquette, waived her privileges on this occasion and made the first call. She was graciously received, and came home in high spirits. All that evening she could do nothing but talk of Mrs. Mortimer Mowbray. "Such an elegant establishment!" "A footman with manners like a prince waited at the door." The drawing-room was the perfection of luxury and taste. Mrs. Mowbray had on such a sweet cap, and altogether looked so lady-like. Her manners were indeed most aristocratic, just what one would suppose those of a countess to be.

In a few days Mrs. Mortimer Mowbray returned my wife's call; she came in a splendid new carriage, and with a new pair of horses. Her equipage created quite a sensation in our street.

Mrs. Jones, soon after this, began to act as if brooding over some vast design, which not being yet quite matured, she deemed it wisest to be silent respecting.

At last, however, the mighty secret was broached. "I was thinking, Jones," she said one night as I was composing myself to sleep on my pillow, "that we ought to give a party. Not a regular ball, indeed, but a select entertainment, where a few congenial minds may be brought together. I should like to introduce my dear Mrs. Mowbray to some of the choicest of our acquaintance."

Now I detest parties, small or large, but as the delicacy of my wife's nerves does not allow of her being thwarted, I made no objection to this proposal, though I sighed to myself.

"Of course, my dear," I said. "You know best."

"We will about thirty," continued my wife, warming with the subject. "There's Mrs. Wharton, and Mr. Horace Shinn, and Mrs. Price, and the three Misses Trelawney."

And thus the dear creatnire ran on until she had mentioned about forty names, and I saw that her select party of congenial souls" was going to be after all, a crowded rout.

"You have forgotten the two Misses Howell," I said at last, when my wife stopped for the want of breath.

The two Misses Howell were aimable, intelligent and pretty girls, in whom I took a particular interest, because their father, who had once been an extensive shipping merchant, having become reduced and died bankrupt, the sisters were compelled to earn their own livelihood. They had numerous rich relations on whom they might have billeted themselves; but, with a spirit of proper independence, they preferred to work for their maintainance, instead of eating the bread of charity. I had long nourished a romantic idea of seeing them married well, and consequently had made it a point always to invite them to our parties, to praise them highly to young gentlemen there, and in every other indirect way to assist in realizing my pet scheme.

My wife had heretofore seconded me in my benevolent plan; but on the present occasion she hesitated to reply, and I knew at once that there was something the matter.

"Abem!" she said at last, clearing her throat, "ahem!" The Misses Howell are very nice girls, to be sure—that is, in their place—but as it is to be a select party, and as I have already mentioned rather too many, and as Mrs. Mowbray may not want to meet all sorts of people, and as—"

"Stop, my dear," said I, with a sigh, for I saw that my favorites were not to be invited, "you have given reasons enough." "It is a pity, though."

And I sighed again—a sigh eloquent of resignation.

My wife heard my sighs, and her tender heart was touched. She paused a moment in embarrassment, and perhaps even resolved the idea nf yielding to my wishes, but in the end she raised herself on her elbow, and said—

"Mr. Jones, do listen to reason. You don't know how foolish you make yourself about those Howell girls. They have been unfortunate, to be sure, and they are very possible, indeed; but there to a prejudice, you are aware, against girls who earn their own livelihood, and who knows but what Mrs. Mowbray would take offence at my inviting such persons to meet her. I shouldn't like to do it, indeed, without first asking her; and I can't do that this time. She's very particular, and so exclusively high bred."

"Then I don't think she would regard yon the less, my dear, I venture to say, for being acquainted with two such excellent girls as Patty and Lizzy Howell."

"Mr. Jones, don't be a child," replied my wife. "At your age yon should know something of the world. Exclusive people, like Mrs. Mowbray, don't care to meet nobodies. She was very choice, as you saw, of whom she admitted to her acquaintance this summer; I may say, indeed, that I am the only one of all she met whom she recognizes now."

To have protracted the conversation would have excited my wife's nerves, and deprived her of sleep; so I said no more, but closed my eyes and courted slumber again.

I have no recollection of anything after that till I awoke the next morning, and leaving Mrs. Jones in bed as usual, went down to see that the fires were right, and to take a walk while breakfast was being prepared.

The invitations to the party were issued that week, Mrs. Mortimer Mowbray graciously promising to attend.

When the important evening arrived, my wife was very nervous. At every ring of the bell the color rose to her face with expectation, but guest after guest entered without Mrs. Mowbray appearing. Her nervousness soon began to change to anxiety, and this, as the hours wore on, to disappointment and dismay. She delayed the supper for a full hour, thinking that her new friend might yet arrive, but in vain.

"What can be the matter, I wonder?" she said to me, as we were alone. "I hope the dear babe is well. Perhaps, however, Mrs. Mowbray is herself unwell. Dear me, I am afraid I shall not sleep for anxiety. The first thing I shall do to-morrow will be to call on Mrs. Mowbray and see what is the matter."

"Would not that be against etiquette?" I ventured to ask. It seems to me that Mrs. Mowbray should send you a note or message, or something of that sort, at least, to apologize for her absence."

Mrs. Jones did not reply in words, but she gave me a look, and such a look! It expressed all the indignation which her enraged bosom felt at having the slightest suspicion cast upon her friend.

When I came home to dinner that day, I saw at a glance that something had occurred to ruffle my wife's nerves. She had nothing whatever to say to me, but she scolded the servants and children incessantly. I was too wise to inquire what was wrong. I knew that Mrs. Jones, if she thought proper, would tell me; and if not, that idle questions would only aggravate her secret troubles. But the next day, having heard something that enlightened me respecting Mrs. Mowbray's absence from our party, I could not contain myself when I came home.

"Did you ever hear, my love," I said, as I began to carve the turkey for dinner, "that the Misses Howell had a married sister?"

Mrs. Jones looked sharply up, as if she suspected I meant more than I said, and then answered, laconically—

"I heard it casually but never asked further."

"It seems," I continued, "that Mrs. Mortimer Mowbray is that sister."

"I have heard since," said Mrs. Jones, sharply; and turning to our second child, who was asking for a wing bone, she rapped him over the head, exclaiming—

"Haven't I told you to wait till you're helped? Take that, now, and learn manners."

I allowed a minute and more to elapse, in order that my wife's ebullition might subside when I remarked—

"Mrs. Mowbray, it seems, expected to meet her sisters here."

"I aboudn't wonder if she did," said Mrs. Jones, snappishly, looking down into her plate and apparently absorbed in parting a wing joint.

"When she found," I continued, "that her sisters were not asked, she grew indignant. She heard the reason, it seems. Your friend, Mrs. Wharton, whom you had made a confident, told some lady, who told her, and hence her anger."

"I am sure I don't care if I never see the proud woman again," said my wife, reddening very much, but still without looking up. "One could not have supposed she was a sister to the Misses Howell."

After another pause, I said—

"Did you tell on Mrs. Mowbray, as yon intended?" Mrs. Jones was silent for a full minute, and seemed half disposed to decline answering altogether, but finally she blurted out her reply—

"Yes, I did, since you must know, and she was not in. So at least the footman said; but if I didn't see her at the drawing-room window—" and here she burst into tears of mortification and rage—"may I never eat another mouthful!"

I saw it would not do to continue the conversation, so I quietly eat my dinner, kissed the children, and, like a Christian in the Pilgrim's Progress, "went away."

Of course the intimacy of my wife with Mrs. Mowbray ceased from the date of that party, and I am sorry to say that the Misses Howell also have, as the phrase goes, "cut our acquaintance."

A DILEMMA.—A gentleman who had been absent for a considerable time, and who, during his travels, had cultivated a great crop of whiskers and moustaches, visited a relative, whose little girl had been his especial pet. The little girl made no demonstration towards saluting him with a kiss as usual.

"Why, child," said the mother, "don't you give your old friend a kiss?"

"Why, ma," said the child with perfect simplicity, "I don't see any place!"

She has Outlived Her Usefulness.

Not long since a good-looking man, in middle life, came to our door asking for the minister.

When informed that he was out of town, he seemed disappointed and anxious. On being questioned as to his business, he replied:

"I have lost my mother, and as this place used to be her home, and my father lies here, we have come to lay her beside him."

Our heart rose in sympathy, and we said, "You have met with a great loss."

"Well—yes," replied the strong man with hesitancy, "a mother is a great loss in general; but our mother has outlived her usefulness. She was in her second childhood, and her mind was grown as weak as her body, so that she was no comfort to herself, and was a burden to everybody. There were seven of us, sons and daughters, and as we could not find anybody who was willing to board her, we agreed to keep her among us a year about. But I've had more than my share of her, for she was too feeble to be moved, when my time was out, and that was more than three months before her death. But then she was a good mother in her day, and toiled very hard to bring us all up."

Without looking at the face of the heartless man we directed him to the house of a neighboring pastor, and returned to our nursery. We gazed on the merry little faces which smiled or grew sad in imitation of ours—those little ones to whose ear no word in our language is half so sweet as "Mother," and we wonder if that day could ever come when they would say of us, "She has outlived her usefulness—she is no comfort to herself and a burden to everybody else?" and we hoped that before such a day would dawn we might be taken to our rest. God forbid that we should outlive the love of our children! Rather let us die while our hearts are a part of their own, that our grave may be watered with their tears, and our love linked with their hopes of heaven.

When the bell tolled for the mother's burial, we went to the sanctuary to pay our only token of respect for the aged stranger, for we felt that we could give her memory a tear even though her own children had none to shed.

"She was a good mother in her day, and toiled hard to bring us all up; she was no comfort to herself, and a burden to everybody else!" These cruel, heartless words rang in our ears as we saw the coffin borne up the aisle. The bells tolled long and loud, until its iron tongue had chronicled the age of the toil-worn mother. One—two—three—four—five.—How clearly and almost merrily each stroke told of her once peaceful slumber in her mother's bosom, and of her seat at night on her weary father's knees. Six—seven—eight—nine—ten—rang out the tale of her sports upon the green sward, in the meadow, and by the brook. Eleven—twelve—thirteen—fourteen—fifteen—spoke more gravely of school days, and household joys and cares. Sixteen—seventeen—eighteen—sounded out the enraptured visions of maidenhood, and the dream of early love. Nineteen brought before us the happy bride. Twenty spoke of the young mother, whose heart was full to bursting with the new strung love which God had awakened in her bosom. And then stroke after stroke told of her early womanhood—of the love and cares and hopes and fears and toils through which she passed during these long years, till fifty rang out harsh and loud.

From that to sixty, each stroke told of the warm-hearted mother and grandmother, living over again her own joys and sorrows in those of her children and children's children. Every family of all the group wanted grandmother then, and the only strife was, who should secure the prize; but hark! the bell tells on! Seventy—seventy-one—two—three—four. She begins to grow feeble; requires some care; is not always perfectly patient or satisfied; she goes from one child's house to another, so that no one place seems like home. She murmurs in plaintive tones, and after all her toil and weariness, it is hard she cannot be allowed a home to die in; that she must be sent rather than invited from house to house.—Eighty—eighty-one—two—three—four—ah, she is now a second child; now she has outlived her usefulness? she has now ceased to be a comfort to herself or anybody; that is, she has ceased to be profitable to her earth-craving and money-grasping children.

Now sounds out, reverberating through our lovely forest, and echoing back from our "hill of the dead," eighty-nine; there she now lies in the coffin, cold and still—she makes no trouble now, demands no love, no soft words, no tender little offices. A look of patient endurance, we fancied also an expression of grief for unrequited love, sat on her marble features. Her children were there, clad in weeds of woe, and in an irony we remember the strong men's words. "She was a good mother in her day."

When the bell ceased tolling, the strange minister rose in the pulpit. His form was very erect, and his voice strong, but his hair was silvery white. He read several passages of Scripture expressive of God's compassion to feeble man, and especially of his tenderness when grey hairs are on him, and his strength faileth. He then made some touching remarks on human frailty; and of dependence on God, urging all present to make their peace with their Master while in health, that they might claim his promises when heart and flesh should fail them. "Then," he said, "the eternal God shall be thy refuge, and beneath thee shall be the everlasting arms." Leaning over the desk, and gazing intently on the coffined form before him, he then said reverently, "from a little child I have honored the aged, but never till grey hairs covered my own head did I know truly how much love and sympathy this class may have a right to demand of their fellow creatures. Now I feel it. Our mother," he added most tenderly, "who now lies in death before us, was a stranger to me, as are all these, her descendants. All I know of her is what her son has told me to-day—that she was brought to this town from afar, 69 years ago—a happy bride—that here she has passed most of her life, toiling as only mothers ever have strength to toil, until she had reared a large family of sons and daughters—that she left her home here, clad in the weeds of widowhood, to dwell among her children; and that till health and vigor left her she lived for you, her descendants.

You, who together have shared her love and her care, know how well you have requited her. God forbid that conscience should accuse any of you of ingratitude or murmuring, on account of the care she has been to you of late. When you go back to your homes be careful of your words and your example before your own children, for the fruit of your own doing you will surely reap from them when you yourself totter on the brink of the grave. I entreat you as a friend, as one who has himself entered the "evening of life," that you may never, say, in the presence of your families nor of Heaven, "Our mother has outlived her usefulness. She was a burden to us." Never, never! A mother cannot live so long as that! No; when she can no longer labor for her children, nor yet care for herself, she can fall like a precious weight on their bosoms, and call forth, by her helplessness, all the noble, generous feelings of their nature.

Adieu, then, poor toil-worn mother. There are no more sleepless nights, no more days of pain for thee. Undying vigor and everlasting usefulness are part of the inheritance of the redeemed. Feeble as thou wert on earth, thou wilt be no burden on the bosom of Infinite Love, but there shalt thou find thy longed-for rest, and receive glorious sympathy from Jesus and his ransomed fold.

Courting in Broadway.

A very singular wedding, says a New York peper, transpired here this week. A young and very pretty Irish girl—the sister of one of our common councilmen, was walking up Broadway, New York, when she attracted the attention of an elderly gentleman of large wealth, who had lived all his life a bachelor and an ascetic. Rumor says that he was foiled in an affair du cœur, and carried thenceforth in his breast a heart impenetrable to the sweet influences of the tender passion. Well, this gentleman on the promenade was attracted by this Irish girl to such a degree that he arrested his steps and ventured to address her:

"Will you pardon the liberty, Miss, if I ask your name?"

The girl timidly surveyed him, and apparently satisfied that not mere curiosity prompted him in the query, and that he was a gentleman, she acceded.

"My name is Mary O'K——, sir."

"Dare I ask you another question, Mary—I mean Miss O'K——?"

"Proceed, sir," she replied, very good humoredly.

"Then I should like to ask you—and you will confer an infinite obligation upon me by answering truly—whether you are engaged in marriage to any one, or whether your feelings are interested in any person."

The question was decidedly a home one, but there was so kind and gentle an expression in the old man's eye, and such an evident earnestness in his tone, that she answered him freely—

"Not in the least, sir."

"Then allow me without any further ceremony, to place my card in your hand and with it the offer of myself and fortune. Commission any friend you please to make whatever inquiries concerning me you may deem proper, and let me know your determination to-morrow."

The girl, overwhelmed with surprise, deposited the slip of pasteboard in the reticule and passed on. On Wednesday afternoon her brother called at the hotel where her admirer resided, and informed him that Mary had concluded to accept him. They were married the same evening at the residence of the bride's mother, and the old gentleman settled on her one hundred thousand dollars on the spot.

This gentleman—he would not like me to give you his name—has held a great many public offices in his time; was formerly a Major in the United States Army, and afterwards Assistant Indian Commissioner. His real estate in this city is worth more than two hundred thousand dollars.

Mary and the Major started the next morning for New Orleans, where the latter has a brother who is a sort of pecuniary nabob in that city.

GOOD HUMOR.—It is the clear blue sky of the soul, on which every star of talent will shine more clearly, and the man of genius encounters no vapors in his passage. It is the most exquisite beauty of a fine face; a redeeming grace to a homely one. It is like the green in a landscape, harmonizing every color, mellowing the light, and softening the hues of the dark; or like the flute in the full concert of instruments, a sound, not at first discovered by the ear, yet filling up the breaks in the concord with its deep melody.

Thirty-Fourth Congress—First Session.

WASHINGTON, July 12th, 1856—Senate.—The Senate was not in session to-day.

House.—Mr. Grow gave notice that he would soon call up a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill annulling the laws of Kansas was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union.

Mr. Stephens introduced a bill authorizing the Postmaster General to enter into a contract with Christian Hanson, of Brooklyn, to carry the United States mail in a line of steamers from New York to Gludstadt via some port in England.

The House then resumed the consideration of the report on the Sumner assault.

Mr. Cullen, who was entitled to the floor, yielded it to Mr. English, who wished to offer an amendment to the pending resolutions, "that the House declares its disapprobation of the assault, and deems this a fit occasion to express its disapprobation of the use of language in debate personally offensive to individual members or to the States of this Union."

Mr. Campbell, of Ohio, wished to know whether the offering of this would prevent him from amending the original resolution.

The Speaker replied that it would not prevent Mr. Campbell from perfecting the original proposition.

Mr. Dean and Mr. Matteson objected to Mr. English offering his amendment.

Mr. Campbell said he should move the previous question, so as to take the vote on Monday morning, with the understanding that if the parties implicated desired to be heard, he will withdraw his motion for their benefit, but not for re-opening the general debate. (Voices—"that's right.")

Mr. Comins trusted if Mr. Brooks desired to address the House, he would be allowed to speak on Monday morning.

WASHINGTON, July 14.—Senate—After the presentation of several memorials a resolution was offered by Mr. Hill directing inquiry into the expediency of suspending operations on the dome of the Capitol, and to prepare a plan more in accordance with modern architecture.

Another resolution was offered by Mr. Bell, calling for information from the President in relation to his stationing a force in Kansas to disperse unarmed assemblages, etc. Objection being made, these bills lie over under the rule.

The Senate then took up the bill to amend the charter of Georgetown, which was passed.

Several bills of a private character were also taken up and disposed of, among which were bills for the relief of J. R. Powell and Nathan M. Lownshury, the latter a pensioner over one hundred years old.

Mr. Weller then moved to take up the House bill for the construction of a road from Fort Ridgely, in the Territory of Minnesota, to the South Pass of the Rocky Mountains, in the Territory of Nebraska, which, after being partially disposed of, was postponed until to-morrow.

The bill for testing the practicability and usefulness of the atmospheric telegraph was called up, discussed, and made the special order for to-morrow.

The Naval bill was taken up at one o'clock. Many amendments were proposed, which caused debate.

Mr. Crittenden addressed the Senate in a forcible appeal in behalf of the officers who had been retired and dropped from the rolls. He was followed by Messrs. Bell and Toombs. The latter spoke with great earnestness for an hour; at the expiration of which time

Mr. Crittenden moved an adjournment, as he wished to be present at the final vote. Adjourned.

House.—Mr. Clingman, of North Carolina, moved a suspension of the rules, to enable him to offer a resolution to terminate the session of Congress on Monday, 28th instant; which was decided in the negative. Ayes 110, noes 91.

Mr. Campbell, of Ohio, moved that the special order be postponed till Wednesday morning.

This motion was resisted by Messrs. McMullen, Houston, Letcher and others, when

Mr. Meacham, of Vermont, moved the previous question, which was sustained, with the condition that the parties implicated should be heard.

Mr. Edmundson, of Virginia, proceeded to address the House on a personal explanation.

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. English, that the House declare its disapprobation of Mr. Brooks' assault on Mr. Sumner, and deems this a fit occasion to declare its disapprobation of the use of language in debate personally offensive to individual members of Congress or States of the Union.

It was disagreed to—yeas 35, nays 174. [Mr. Harris and Mr. Hoffman were momentarily absent when their names were called, but stated had they been present they would have voted in the affirmative.]

The question was then taken on the resolution of the minority of the committee, as a substitute for those of the majority, namely: That this House has no jurisdiction over the assault committed by P. S. Brooks on Charles Sumner, and therefore deem it improper to express any opinion on the subject.

This was disagreed to—yeas 66, nays 145.

The question was then taken on the resolution of the committee—that Preston S. Brooks be, and he is forthwith expelled from the House as a Representative from South Carolina.

The question was decided in the negative—yeas 121, nays 95—two-thirds not being obtained.

TUESDAY, July 15, 1856—Senate.—Mr. S. Houston appeared in the Senate this morning, after an absence of several weeks, much improved in health.

A communication was received from the President in answer to a call of the Senate, relative to the amount of moneys expended for advertising in the several papers of the District; laid on the table.

After the presentation of various petitions, the Senate took up House bill for the construction of a road from Fort Ridgely, in the Territory of Nebraska.

Mr. Collamer desired to know if there was a report in the case.

Whereupon

Mr. Weller sent to the President a memorial from the Legislature of Minnesota, upon which the bill was founded, which was read.

House.—TUESDAY, July 15.—The question being on the motion of Mr. Campbell, of Ohio, for a division of the question on the second resolution of the Committee of Inquiry, in which Messrs. Keitt and Edmundson were censured, from which an appeal had been taken,

Mr. A. K. Marshall, of Kentucky, withdrew his appeal.

Mr. Jones, of Tennessee, observing that the House was thin, and knowing no better way to kill time, moved that the House adjourn, and called for the eyes and noes; which was seconded, and resulted—ayes none, nays 194.

The question recurring on the resolution declaring the disapprobation of the conduct of Messrs. Keitt and Edmundson,

Mr. Dunn, of Indiana, said, that as the question was not divisible, he moved to lay the resolution on the table, but subsequently withdrew his motion.

Mr. Stanton, of Ohio, rose to a question of order, insisting that the question should be divided.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?" resulted—yeas 162—nays 25.

The previous question having been ordered on the second resolution, the yeas and nays were ordered, and were being taken when our report closed.

THE ONLY SURE REMEDY for WORMS

THERE are worm medicines, so called, as harmless and at the same time as useless as water. There are others which are admirably adapted to kill the patient as well as the worms. WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE belongs to neither of these two classes. It destroys internal worms in all cases, while instead of injuring the general system, it gives tone, strength and vigor to every muscle and fibre and function of the human frame. These are its characteristics and the source of its great popularity.

☞Be particular and remember the name "Winer's Canadian Vermifuge." This is the only article that can be depended on. For sale in New Orleans, wholesale and retail, by

15,000 ACRES OF LAND FOR SALE.

THE lands are situated in Morehouse parish, Louisiana, and in what is known as the "Bastrop Grant." They are of the richest quality of alluvial soil, unsurpassed in fertility by any lands in the south, and fully capable of producing from one and a half to two bales, or fifty to sixty bushels of corn to the acre. They lie near the Ouachita and Bœuf rivers—good navigable streams—and like wise in convenient distance of the route of the Vicksburg, Shreveport and Texas Railroad, now in course of construction, and hastening to a rapid completion. A portion of these lands are highly improved and in a flourishing state of cultivation; the country in which they lie is very healthy, the water is excellent and abundant, and altogether they will be found to possess greater advantages and present inducements to purchasers than any lands now offered for sale in the Southern country. They will be sold in quantities to suit purchasers, and on the most favorable terms. Titles perfect.

For farther particulars inquire of the undersigned, either personally at his residence in Prairie Jefferson, Morehouse parish, or by letter addressed to Point Jefferson, Morehouse parish, Louisiana.

Startling and Interesting Facts
CONCERNING
CHOLERA, DIARRHŒA, DYSENTERY, COLIC,
Summer Complaints, etc.

A fact that should startle in this—One feels a slight uneasiness in the bowels, a slight diarrhea comes on, which is little thought of; in a short time, in a few hours, perhaps seldom days, it is attended with sickness of the stomach, a most sinking weakness, rapid discharges, coldness, cramps, agonies, blackness; collapse, DEATH—and yet all this fatal result from a disregard of the warning, premonitory Diarrhœa, and neglect of a wise provision of a safe and sure remedy that kind Providence has made easy to all.

This remedy is made public from the strongest desire to rescue the exposed, under the best substantial conviction that it is certain in its good effects, and with it on hand, no one needing the warning and using the remedy, need be a victim to the Cholera.

DR. BILDINGS'

CARMINATIVE and ASTRINGENT SYRUP
IS THIS SURE REMEDY.

By the advice and urgent request of hundreds, whose lives have been saved—of many even when apparently in the very last struggles of death—he has been induced to make still more efforts to give a wider publicity to a remedy so greatly successful.

The perfection which he and others ascribe to this remedy may appear beyond the power of medicine to possess; yet the truthfulness of the claim is most thoroughly established, and will be fully confirmed by calling on the individuals who have witnessed its effects, and used it with complete success, some of whose names we are authorized to give.

For Cholera, Colic, Cholera Morbus, Dysentery, Diarrhea, Bloody Flux, Summer Complaint and Weakness of the Bowels, this medicine is offered as a certain remedy. This is the medicine that arrested that horrible disease so prevalent among the Mexican soldiers. The officers first commenced its use, after which they gave it their soldiers, and cured in every case without an exception. I would refer to the officers and others who served in the war with Mexico. Sold by

ITEMS OF CALIFORNIA.

THE FACE OF THE COUNTRY.

On the passage from Panama to San Francisco, the vessel is very often in sight of the coast mountains. These, to a man from the older States, present a striking scene. These mountains are generally lofty and grand. It is not unusual to see the clouds reposing on their summits, and sometimes hanging on their sides; but the most unique appearance which they present occasionally, is that of entire nakedness. No shrub, bush, grass or weeds, but a huge pile of reddish brown dirt. This is the appearance in many places on the face of the mountains fronting the ocean. I am told that it is not unusual for the other side of these same mountains to be clothed with grass, flowers, and sometimes trees and shrubbery.

These coast mountains appear to be called to their position by the hand of Omnipotence to carry out the decree of heaven, given to the mighty ocean they border. "Hitherto shalt thou come and no farther, and here shall thy proud waves be stayed." This range is so lofty as from many portions of the country to be visible to the eye for fifty or sixty miles. Looking at them from the bosom of the ocean you would suppose that they presented a termination of the wildest hill country, without human habitation or the possibility of culture. And yet it is often the case that behind their rugged appearance lies the most beautiful vallies, perfectly level and exceedingly rich, dotted over with rising villages and surrounded by the most productive farms. This is a peculiarity of this country, especially in the neighborhood of the extended Bay, to consist in wide and beautiful valleys, surrounded or other bordered by a magnificent roll of treeless hills, rich to their very summits, and in some instances richly covered with oats, growing thick and lofty. The richest specimen of this kind that I saw was bordering the Suisen valley and neighboring vallies. Occasionally on these hills you will see a few live oak trees, which nearly any one not acquainted with the country would take for apple trees, the resemblance is exceedingly close. In some instances these are very low, but widespread and thickly clothed with foliage, very well adapted to the shelter of sheep, and for no other purpose. I could not but be amused in the valley of Suisen at the position of some of these trees. They present the appearance of a tree in the most violent storm, growing nearly horizontally with the ground, but they never change their position. Constant and strong winds have trained them to this appearance, and whether in calm or storm, true to nature, they show their training, their uniform attitude.

The oat crop in this country, particularly in the part just alluded to, and some others, is spontaneous—comes without the care or culture of man, and offers to the grazier the easiest and most certain method of making money I have ever seen. All he wants is capital enough to buy his first herd, and then almost watch-care enough for mercation. In these wide pastures of the living wood, we see beautiful herds feeding and thriving at the hand of their Creator.

It is usual among the hills of California, to present you first with what they call the foot-hills, and hill rises over hill in the rear of each other until the summit of the distant hill is so lofty and huge that the impression on you is awful and sublime. This is true whether in the border of the vallies or in the more regular mountain country. In that section here that they call the mountains, the scenery is terribly sublime. It becomes more and more so until you reach that awfully majestic range of mountains the Sierra Novada, in the bosom of which reposes eternal snow, looking up in the face of the sun and defying his strength. This mountain, in peerless majesty, stretches nearly the entire length of the eastern tile of the State, and ranges with the coast of the Pacific ocean, and seems never to be looking out on its broad surface and distant islands, and over all intervening objects.

I have never as yet visited the Sierra Nevada, but have made approaches to it at various points, and from other mountains have gazed with solemn awe upon this object of inspiring grandeur. On a recent trip to Sonora, with two stages in company, the passengers were requested to walk up a very considerable hill, a German passenger and myself were walking together until we were both very sensible of the fatigue of the operation. I remarked to him, this is a very long hill, he said "yes, and slowly raising his hand) it keeps raising up." And this remark of his is generally true until you reach the summit of this gigantic mountain.

Having introduced in connection with the grazing of this country the volunteer oats, it would be appropriate also to mention that the country produces no less than five distinct species of clover, none of which, I think, induces slobbering. One of these species grows tall on a tender stalk and bears a yellow flower, another presents the appearance of a vine bearing a seed having the appearance of a small burr, numerously strung along the vine, and this has nearly the nutriciousness of grass, and serves to sustain the stock in a dry condition when the greener food is gone.

LETTER FROM DOWN EAST.

New London, July 14, 1856.

Dear Advocate:—Yesterday being Sunday, in company with my little boy, I went to the Methodist church here. My road lay along the river side but there was not much to attract the attention of a health seeker except, we might so term the up hill and down dale character of the scenery, but to me it was not more interesting than a walk on our own dusty levee, for the ever present rocks profusely scattered over the surface of the ground where they have no business to be, give it an air of sterility which is oppressive to the mind. If I had not been informed that the church to which I went was a Methodist church I should never have supposed it to be one, although the Methodist hymn book was used by the choir, which consisted of about two dozen of young girls three or four boys and a man with a fiddle. No one in the congregation sung. They have a habit which seems universal among them which certainly must have been originally introduced by some lazy men I will not say women, of turning their backs upon the preacher and gazing up into the choir while it is performing.—You will perceive that this very devotional posture gives them an opportunity of resting against the backs of their pews.

The extempore prayer was very cool, almost frigid, and I suppose the architect who designed the edifice must have left out the "amen corner," so little of vitality did there appear to be in the assembly. How a good fervent amen from Bro. Keene's strong lungs would have startled through, I fear it would scarcely have moved them. Those of us in New Orleans who love quietness and order so well that we are afraid to give the heart's emotions audible utterance, ought to pay a visit here, which I have no doubt would prove beneficial; for as the Jews were cured of their idolatry by seeing so much of it during their captivity in Babylon, so would we be cured of our excessive sensitiveness in point of order by being brought in contact with people who love it so much that to avoid any appearance of confession they sit while praying. I must confess I was not prepared for so marked a difference in the department at church, of Methodists at home and abroad, and although I am partial to novelty in some things, yet in this particular department it is not very agreeable to me. It may be habit, but I must prefer the way things are done in Felicity street to anything I have seen of Methodism during my present trip east.

School of the Prophets.

Our readers are aware that a Society of the Alabama Conference educates young men who have been called to the ministry. They have nine or ten receiving the benefits of education and primary training. A correspondent says:

BROTHER MCTYEIRE:—There were several things at Summerfield, not coming properly within notice of the Examining Committee, that are, nevertheless, worthy of notice. I hope some one will give you an account of the "annual class-meeting." It is worthy of a chronicler—ought to have a place in the history of modern Methodism.

But I am seated to give you an account of another scene. During the year there have been connected with the institution six licentiates and three candidates for the ministry. Our excellent Brother Pitts had taken much pains to teach them. This was found a pleasant and profitable task for both teacher and pupils. Should we put theology under lock, and carefully exclude it from the "school of the prophets?" Ought we to? The class, to manifest their appreciation of his labors, presented him, through Bishop Andrew, a fine family Bible. The Bishop's talk was rich and touching. He heartily endorsed the effort to teach those intending to enter the ministry—thought the gift the most appropriate the class could have selected for the occasion—commended Brother Pitts, and exhorted the class as he would have done at Conference.

Brother Pitts receiving the book, promised to preach his doctrines in simplicity—to have all the labors of the school-room hallowed by it—night and morning to gather his family around it with renewed thankfulness, to enquire the way of the Lord and, find the "golden seed seed which yieldeth angels, food."

That, sir, was a scene upon which angels and the spirits of just men made perfect might look down with approbation and delight.

TRUE MAGNANIMITY.—Hath any wronged you? Be bravely avenged, slight it, and the work is begun; forgive it, and the work is finished.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Homer, Louisiana, July 14, 1856.

Dear Advocate:—At the time I wrote before, the affairs of Homer College seemed to be in a precarious condition. A great deal of the interest hitherto felt in it had died away, and many of the subscribers endeavored to get released from their promises. Even some of the Trustees were in favor of going no farther. This state of feeling I have since learned was caused by the idea having prevailed that the necessary sum had not been subscribed, and that the Board had been neglecting the interests of the College. But I am happy to be able to say that all these false impressions have been removed from the minds of the people. Last Saturday a general meeting of the Board was called once for all to decide whether or not the enterprise should be carried on to final success. The meeting was well attended, some of the members from below only having failed to arrive. Many of the citizens also showed the interest they felt by being present. At the opening of the meeting much fear was entertained that the Board really would resolve to give up the undertaking. But as the meeting progressed, as the speakers addressed the assembly, among whom were the Rev. J. T. Wafer, Gen. Young, Judge Thomasson, and others, the doubtful looks vanished, eyes began to sparkle and all seemed fully satisfied that Homer College was a fixed fact. It was shown to the satisfaction of all present that more than a sufficient amount had been subscribed by responsible men, and President, Rev. J. C. Blackman, triumphantly informed us that nearly a thousand more had been subscribed the day before and that he had the promise of considerable more when the building should be commenced. A plan for the edifice was submitted and unanimously adopted. They resolved to build a house that would endure and prove an ornament to the town and state. Gen. Young read an estimate of the cost and a responsible gentleman present offered to take the contract at that estimate and deliver the keys of the building by next spring. I have been thus particular because I desire the friends of the cause to understand the true state of the case. There now seems to be but one opinion prevalent and that is that the College will be built. This you may be assured is the true state of public feeling at this time.

The Preparatory Department has just closed its first session. The examination and exhibition passed of finely. The young gentlemen did much credit to themselves and their teachers. The second session will commence on the first Monday in September next under the direction of J. W. Stacey, A. M. late President of Asbury College, Ala. There are about seventy scholars in this Department. The examination and exhibition of Mrs. Jackson's Young Ladies High School will come off in a day or two. This accomplished lady and her assistants Miss Groves and the Rev. B. J. Hamilton have won the esteem and admiration of the community by their course as instructors of the young ladies of this place. In this school there are about sixty young ladies. Mrs. Crowson also has a large school of smaller children. Taken altogether I believe that Homer offers as many inducements in an educational point of view as any other town in Louisiana. But it is young yet, it needs the encouragement and aid of the people in the southern portion of the state. The Methodist Church especially should come forward and help it, by giving to it the patronage and favor generally bestowed upon the institutions of eastern states. The people up this way will try to do their duty.

Crops are in good conditions, and most of the farmers with whom I have conversed think the yield will be a good one. The weather has been very changeable, rain or shine, heat or cold, has been the order of the seasons for sometime. There has been some little sickness about in the Parish but scarcely any in town, indeed considering the changeableness of the weather it is surprising that there has been so little. Last Saturday a foul murder was perpetrated in the Parish by a man by the name of Frank Allen upon one E. Hamilton. I understand that it originated in a drunken quarrel.

On Homer Circuit religious devotion seems to be on the increase. New appointments are being taken in and some good meetings are occasionally held. But, Adios.

SILVICOLA.

EVERGREEN, Louisiana, July 21, 1856.

Bro. White and myself have just closed a meeting at Bayon Rouge, which resulted in the conversion of 32 souls and 26 accessions to the church. The church was greatly revived and blessed. Brothers Alexander and Parrin where with us and labored with zeal and acceptability. At the close, we took up a missionary collection and obtained by subscription and cash one hundred and sixty dollars.

The people are getting liberal as they get religious. The assessment was only fifty dollars for this, the Chicot Circuit. We will more than treble it. During the year we have received one hundred into the church. A spirit of reviving seems to be abroad.

F. P. SCURLOCK.

FRED. WHITE.

For the N. O. Christian Advocate.

"Stealing our Thunder."

Bro. McTyeire:—Nothing but the deepest interest in the subject on which I write could induce me to attempt it. I have always regarded class-meetings as the peculiar and distinguishing as well as the most edifying trait of Methodism. I have not found that any sect of Christians held class-meetings from the days of the Apostles and Fathers until the days of Wesley and Methodism. But I find now, that the Presbyterians and Episcopalians are waking up to the importance of this heaven blessed institution. And I will here predict, that if they persevere in these meetings it will not be long before those churches receive powerful reinforcement.

But my object in writing is to try and stir our people and preachers to renewed effort in this matter. With sorrow, I say it, but I think I could point to preachers who have not held a class-meeting this year; and yet all will agree that it is one of the best, if not the very best means of keeping up a good state of feeling in the church. Who has not been blessed in class-meeting? Who has not felt their heart burn within them as some brother or sister, some old father or mother in Israel, has recounted the goodness of God to their souls. Mr. Editor, if every one was of my mind, no one should have any chance to "steal" any of this old Methodist "thunder." They might manufacture some of their own, (using our recipe,) and I would bid them God speed, but they should have none of ours. You might just as well tell me that a farmer can make a good crop without the plow and hoe, as to tell me that Methodists can grow in grace without class-meetings. What I want to know how the church is getting along at any place I ask how they attend class-meetings there.

The Poor in Spirit.

"Blessed are the poor in spirit: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven."—MATT. 5. 3.

Well may afflicted believers rejoice in the beatitudes, and often drink of their quiet consolation, and luxuriate in their blessedness; for, precious as they are to all, they shed a peculiarly tranquil light in the chamber of sorrow. You might search all heathen authors through, and find no sympathy like this. Indeed they stand opposed to the very spirit of the world, which praises the high spirited, the mirthful, the victorious and shuns with heartless pity the meek-spirited, the broken-hearted, the crushed Be of good cheer; Christian sufferer; those whom the world commiserates, Jesus congratulates. And we may say with far truer assurance than Balak, "I wot that he whom thou blessest is blessed." Suffering, silence, seclusion—ah, this is a congenial climate for poverty of spirit, which grows best like the lily of the valley, shadowed and sheltered. Wherefore are the children of the kingdom poor in spirit?—From feeling their sin to be exceeding sinful, from casting themselves supplicantly on the Lord for mercy, from receiving pardon and righteousness from him, from learning daily their own weakness, from living daily as pensioners on his bounty, from imbibing his spirit of humility, from anticipations of glory undeserved. Wherefore are they blessed? They are possessors of the kingdom of heavenly grace, they are inheritors of the kingdom of heavenly glory. Our Lord sums them both here in the promise, "Theirs is the kingdom of heaven." The Bible never seems very careful to distinguish between the kingdom of grace and that of the glory. Sometimes the kingdom of God is spoken of as being "within you;" at others, as being established when Jesus returns. But the distinction is not material.—They are inseparably connected, like the flower with its root. Blessed art thou, suffering member of the kingdom of grace, for thine is the kingdom of glory.

A beautiful eye makes silence eloquent—a kind eye makes contradictions an assent—and an enraged eye makes beauty deformed.

"KEEP TO THE CONSTITUTION."

"A STRICT CONSTRUCTION."

Mr. Editor: The above is your own forcible language and you tell us, that, "these are not ranting phrases." No truly, they are full of meaning—fraught with importance. They should be indelibly written upon the hearts and minds of all who sit at the helm of affairs in church or state. The constitution of the United States has been styled "the palladium of our liberty" and you think—"that little book, the discipline, has been the salvation" of the M. E. Church north. "They in 1856, are only saved by insisting on a strict construction—keep to the constitution."

These pertinent remarks, are found in your excellent Advocate of June 21st 1856, under the head of "Constitutional Methodism." Happy for the Methodist Church, had such council always prevailed, in the law or rule making departments, and also in the exercise of her administrative functions. Much of the mischief produced by arbitrary majorities, and rash judgment, might have been prevented and such council prevailed in the M. E. Church, South in 1854—The constitution contained in "that little book, the discipline," with proper "veneration for the fathers who laid its measures and its checks," would have appeared in the discipline published in 1855. Had such council prevailed, the measure proposed altering the sixth restrictive article, would not have "stretched beyond the organic law," it would have been judged, that "the majority of the General Conference is not enough for a change. A two-thirds vote is required to put it upon its passage." Had such council prevailed, section 4, of 2d part would have kept its constitutional position instead of the substitution of section 6 with its questionable policy. Many intelligent and influential friends of the church, of the ministry and membership view these changes as I do, and are dissatisfied with the present policy. They, with me, think, that the authorities in the church south as well as north should "feel penitent for past treatment of it"—the constitution. And I would say with you, in sober, earnest and deep concern, "let it be cherished by us all."

The Proper Way to Rebuke Sin.

It is our duty to rebuke sin, to endeavor to arouse the conscience, to a perception of wrong doing and to a sense of guilt. To do this successfully, and so as to secure beneficial results, requires wisdom. Wisdom seldom prompts the direct and stern rebuke.—It never assumes the attitude of a prosecuting attorney. It never allows the rebuker to assume an heir of superiority.

There is nothing comparable to Scripture in power to convince of sin, and yet much depends on the skill with which it is applied. When bluntly or boisterously presented, it is more likely to repel and harden than to convince. When the conscience is thus directly addressed, it puts itself on its guard, and endeavors to steel itself against impression. An indirect mode of address throws the conscience off its guard, and allows the light of truth to enter and reveal the sin.

The reader will remember the course pursued by Nathan when sent to rebuke David for his flagrant sin. Nathan was a prophet of the Most High. He might have spoken in the name and with the authority of his Master. He might have brought his charges directly with vehement indignation, and denounced the just judgment of God.—But under the guidance of the Omniscient Spirit, he pursued a very different course. He told the affecting story of the ewe lamb, thus awakening David's power of moral perception and his just indignation at sin, and then, by a single word; turned those awakening powers towards his guilt. The citadel was reached before the conscience had time to put itself on guard.

Some who wish to become convictive preachers, fail through want of knowing the true method of approaching the mind. They study to collect and arrange the most pungent truths, and to deliver them with the utmost directness. They suppose this is speaking to the point. A man speaks to the point when he so speaks as to gain the end in view. The preacher speaks to the point when he so speaks as to lead the mind to perceive and feel its guilt—or when he pursues a course which experience has shown to be skillfully adapted to that end. In most instances, the pungent, abrupt rebuke is not adapted to that end. Minds having great reverence for religious truth may quail before this mode of address, but most minds put themselves in the attitude of resistance.—[Exchange.

ONE WEEK LATER FROM EUROPE.

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMSHIP PERSIA.

The British and North American mail steamship Persia, Capt. Judkins, left Liverpool on the 12th inst., and arrived at New York on the 23d inst.

The Persia brought 206 passengers, and the mails, with London papers of the morning of the 12th inst., conveying intelligence one week later than was received per the previous steamer.

The Arabia arrived at Liverpool at 9½ P. M. of Saturday, July 5th. The Ericsson arrived at Liverpool on the morning of the 7th, whence she sailed for New York at 1 P. M. of the 10th with five passengers.

The City of Baltimore arrived off the Mersey on Tuesday night, the 8th, and went up with the next tide.

The Arago arrived at Southampton on the morning of the 11th, en route to Havre.

Great Britain and Ireland.

Nothing of much importance has occurred in Parliament. Lord John Russell's motion respecting Italian affairs was fixed for Monday, the 14th instant. There has been no reference to American affairs excepting some interrogatories as to the boundaries of the Balize.

Col. Dunn asked whether other persons than Austrians might navigate the Danube above the frontiers of Austria on equal terms, in accordance with the treaty of Paris. Lord Palmerston replied, that by the treaty of Paris, the navigation of the Danube was to be rendered liable to the stipulations of the treaty of 1815. By that treaty, such rivers as divided or traversed different States were free to the navigation by vessels of all nations. He apprehended the opinion of the Congress to be, that the Austrian monopoly referred to could not stand against the stipulations of the treaty.

A festival under the auspices of the association for promoting a reduction of the wine duties, was held in the Sydenham Crystal Palace on the 9th. Three hundred sat down to dinner, under the presidency of Mr. Oliviera, M. P.

Lord Stanley, Earl of Shaftesbury, Bishops of Bath and of Manu, Mr. Monckton Milnes, and other notables, spoke at a meeting in London on the 10th, in favor of the early closing of stores, and a Saturday half-holiday to the working classes.

Baron Hausman, Prefect of the Seine, acknowledges receipt of the fourth remittance of 100,000 francs of the 600,000 francs subscribed by the city of London. "The city of Paris," he says, "will never forget this act of the generous English nation."

The extensive spinning mills, belonging to Joseph Ainsworth, at Bolton, Lancashire, have been totally destroyed by fire. There were 80,000 spindles in the mills.

After an absence of two years and a half "the Guards" returned from the Crimea made their entry into the Metropolis, on Wednesday the 9th. A public reception was given them by the Queen and the Londoners. The three battalions, Grenadiers, Coldstreams and Fusileers, numbered 3,200 men. They arrived by rail from the camp at Aldershott and marched from the stations through the principal streets to their barracks. Queen Victoria, accompanied by her family, also the King of the Belgians and his family, with Prince Oscar of Sweden, and a crowd of ladies and lords, appeared on the balconies of the Palace and waved a welcome to the troops. Half a million of persons were assembled.

A serious riot occurred at Nenagh, Ireland, on the 6th of July and succeeding days. The cause was, in substance, that the Government, when the militia was embodied, promised to each man a considerable bounty, but having now no further need of the men, refuses to pay the balance, and orders them to be disbanded. An order was issued to take up the new clothing which was distributed to the men in April last. One man refused to give up his clothes, and was sent to the guardhouse, whereupon his comrades broke it open and liberated him. They then threw off all discipline, broke open the magazine, supplied themselves with the small quantity of ammunition they found therein, and refused to give up their arms until all arrears were paid. The militia then paraded the town, preceded by their band, and discharging their muskets in the air. Their officers do not seem to have acted with any energy to quell the riot.

Assistance was telegraphed for, and in a short time 1000 of the line, of the 13th, 71st, 47th and 55th regiments, arrived under the command of Col. Hurt, who marched to the Summerhill barrack and surrounding it, succeeded in disarming the insurgents within. Other parties of the militia-men were, however, outside the barrack walls, and made several attempts to fire through the gate upon the regulars. They did shoot a Crimean veteran dead through the key-hole of the gate, and wounded another. The troops having disarmed the rioters in the Summerhill barrack, marched toward Pound street barracks. In Castle street they met a body of the lusargeants, who fired a volley, which was replied to with effect by the troops. A good deal of skirmishing ensued.

At length the ammunition of the rioters ran out, and they were disarmed and made prisoners. The ringleaders will be tried by the civil power. Only four persons were killed and about a dozen wounded. Had not the military shown much forbearance, the number of casualities must have been much greater. The citizens sided with the militia, and cheered them on. The names of the dead were Denis Toohey and Patrick Tracey, milltinnen; Patrick Curley, 41st regiment, and Peter Gibbons, pensioner. At latest telegraphic accounts, all was quiet. A detachment of lancers had arrived.

The Queen has conferred the title and dignity of Baronet of the United Kingdom on Sir Allen M'Nab, late Prime Minister in Canada.

It is stated by the Daily News that the retiring pension of the Bishop of London is to be £6,000; that of the Bishop of Durham, £4,500. A reference to Mr. Dod's Parliamentary Companion shows that the present Bishop of London who retires on the 1st of September next, was consecrated Bishop of Chester in 1824, and translated to the See of London in 1828, so that he will have enjoyed a tenure of thirty-two years of office. The Right Rev. prelate is in his seventy-first year. Dr. Maltby, the retiring Bishop of Durham, was first consecrated Bishop of Chester in 1831, and translated in 1836. The Right Rev. prelate is in the eighty-seventh year of his age.

The London Star of the 11th inst. says:

Yesterday the Admiralty issued orders for the war steamer Driver, under the command of Capt. Chamlers, and two more gun boats, the Onyx and Nettle, Commodore Wilson, to proceed across the Atlantic with the object, it is said, of joining the formidable fleet of ships of war there concentrating.

On the 6th inst. the mail steamer from Dublin was run into in the Mersey, by the screw steamer Excelsior, for Belfast, and was cut down to the water's edge. Six steerage passengers, Irish laborers, were killed, and eight severely injured.

Mr. Wm. Smith O'Brien arrived at the Shelbourne Hotel, Dublin, on the 8th.

Thirty thousand pounds sterling will be lost by the Great Britain Railway, from Limerick to Cork, by the forgeries of the convict Knighting.

Capt. Webster, of the schooner Stetson, fitted out in the United States to search for the abandoned ship Boomerang, laden with cotton, from Mobile, and which was seen about more than a month after being abandoned, has arrived at Queenstown, having crossed the Atlantic without having seen anything of the missing ship.

A Tipperary paper, (the Vindicator,) states, as a general rumor, that Mr. James Sadlier, who stands charged by the Master of the Rolls as being a principal in the gigantic frauds and swindles of his brother John, has fled to Sweden or Norway, where, in the absence of an international law, the fugitive is safe from arrest.

Mr. Atkinson, cabinet manufacturer, has been elected Lord Mayor of Dublin for the ensuing year. The Lord Mayor elect is a Protestant and a Conservative, the election having been carried out on the principle which has been acted on hitherto by the reformed corporation of Dublin, of electing the chief magistrate from the opposite parties each alternate year.

In the emigration from Great Britain and Ireland to Australia, there has been considerable falling off during 1855 as compared with 1854, attributable to the practical causes which have affected the emigration to America.

CELEBRATION OF THE ANNIVERSARY OF THE DECLARATION OF AMERICAN INDEPENDENCE.—On Friday, the 4th inst., a sumptuous dinner was given by Mr. Peabody, at the Star and Garter, Richmond, to upwards of one hundered American, and a few English gentlemen, in commemoration of the 80th anniversary of the Declaration of the Independence of the United States. The grand dining hall was fitted up for the occasion with busts of the Queen and Washington, the American eagle, the standards of England and the United States, and other appropriate decorations. Mr. Peabody took the chair shortly after seven o'clock, supported on the right by the American Minister, Mr. Dallas, and on the left by Mr. W. Brown, M. P.; Mr. Shell, of Manchester; Mr. Morgan, of London; Mr. Sonierby, of Boston, United States; Mr. U. N. Dallas, Secretary of Legation, and Mr. Crosbey, United States Consul at Southampton, acted as Vice-Presidents. Mr. John Macgregor, M. P., Mr. S. C. Hall, and Mr. J. E. Jones, the sculptor, were among the English guests.

France.

The Emperor continues at Plombieres, where he uses the baths, and passes his time mostly in out-door exercise.

A paragraph in the Independence Belge denies the authenticity of the letter attributed to the Count de Paris, on the subject of the Orleans fusion, but the correspondents of London papers reaffirm it.

Gen. Martinprey is the French officer who remains in the Crimea, charged with the consular functions until such time as a regular French Consul is appointed.

Germany.

Berlin correspondence of the London Times says:

The Zollvercin is, just now, approaching a crisis which will lead to great alterations, and not impossibly to a rupture between the liberal Northern and the protective Southern States of Germany. Prussia is the State that is empowered to negotiate with foreign nations, in the name of the Zollverein, and it is at Berlin that the main business of the Zollverein is transacted, and the reparation of the revenues, the preparation of new measures to be introduced at the conferences, and the conduct of the business in general are carried on—Prussia fording nearly half of the whole Zollverein. Prussia already (three years since) took a step indicating the course the Zollverein ought, in future, to follow, viz: In the union it formed with the Steuerverein of Hanover, etc. this will enable it, on an early occasion, to strive with a better degree of success for the introduction of a more liberal tariff.

Turkey.

Gen. Codington and Marshal Pelissier, the French and English Commanders-in-Chief, were at Constantinople in the beginning of the present month, where a great festival was about to be held in their honor, after which they would leave for Western Europe.

All Pachn arrived at Constantinople on June 28th, from Paris.

The Sultan has given positive orders to all general officers and commanders of corps in his army, directing that when there are Christian soldiers under their command they shall be at liberty to "observe their religion in perfect freedom," and to this end they shall be "marched in a body" to their places of worship on every Sunday and on every Christian festival.

Russia and the Crimea.

It is now said that the Czar is sincere in his desire to abolish serfdom. A plan for its gradual extinction now commands the attention of the Russian Government. It is proposed to raise a loan, by means of which the Government will purchase the serfs from the private owners, and then liberate them under certain conditions.

An imperial decree extends the amnesty accorded to refugees of the Western governments of Russia to individuals who took part in the events of 1830 and 1831. After three year's good conduct they will be considered eligible for government employment.

The Paris Monitteur publishes the following dispatch from Admiral Trehouart, Commander-in-Chief of the Mediterranean squadron:

"ON BOARD THE BRETAGNE, July 6.

"Yesterday, July 5th, the definitive evacuation of the Crimea took place. Marshal Pelissier embarked on board the Roland, which immediately got under way. The Bretagne, which has just anchored at Belcos, left Kamiesch with the last vessels that were there, and which are expected to arrive to-morrow in the Bosphorus."

A letter from Odessa, quoted in the Austrian Gazette, reports the definitive resolution of the Russian Government to settle the Greek military volunteers in the Crimea, on the land abandoned by the Tartars, exempt from taxes during fifty years. The state will advance for the same period to each father of a family a sum of 200 silver roubles. The children of these families will be educated at the expense of the state.

We learn from St. John's, N. F., that the telegraph work is progressing favorably and everything indicates the completion of the work by the time anticipated. Telegraphic communications with New York may therefore be expected in September next.

The Halifax morning Chronicle states that the submarine cable connecting Cape Breton with Newfoundland, which was submerged on the 10th inst., works admirably, messages being transmitted from shore to shore with the utmost facility.

A burglar broke open a store in New York, recently, and went to sleep on the counter with his jimmy by his side. On the store being opened in the morning he was discovered, and when he awoke to a "sense of his situation," was quite overcome with astonishment.

The stock of cotton on hand in Savannah on Monday, the 21st inst., was 3,575 bales Uplands and 850 bales Sea Islands. Of this amount, less than 300 bales were on sale.

Land warrants are bringing the following prices at Washington: 160 acre warrants at 98 cents per acre; 80 at 99 cents; 120 at 94 cents; 40 at $1 10 per acre.

WEST INDIA SUGAR CROP.—A letter dated Antigua, West India, June 18th, says that the sugar-making season was nearly over, and the yield had been most prolific. There had been sent to England and Belgium fully 39,000 hogsheads and 1,400 hogsheads of molasses, and about the same quantity to the United States.

Miss Caroline Butts wove last week at Tromp Factory, Troup county, Georgia, with four looms, 1,782 yards osnaburgs. Miss Lilly Wright got off 1,710 yards in the same time.

The degree of Doctor of Divinity was conferred at the commencement of Princeton College, on the Rev. Joseph B. Stratton, pastor of the Presbyterian Church, in Natchez. A very well-deserved compliment.

The 18th inst. was truly an eventful day at the North. We have the horrible scene at Fort Washington, the burning of the Northern Indiana, the burning of the Tinto, and a large fire at Newark. More than one hundred lives were lost during the day, and one hundred individuals in addition were wounded. It may well be known in history as the "eventful 18th."

The specie sent to Europe by the steamer Baltic last week, amounted to $458,201, making the total shipments of the week from New York $500,191 44, and the grand total, from the 1st January to that date, $10,464,527 48.

During the week ending on the 20th inst., there were 329 deaths in Philadelphia. In Baltimore there were 178.

The sloop Julia, seven days from Bermuda, came into Barnegat Inlet, N. J., on the 17th inst., with three soldiers of the Twenty-sixth Regiment of the British army on board. The vessel was seized by the Custom-House officers at Barnegat. It was supposed that the soldiers were deserters and had stolen the sloop. They had no compass, and started on their voyage with no other provisions than four loaves of bread and about ten gallons of water, which was all consumed before they reached port.

THE AFFAIRS OF THE TRANSIT COMPANY.—The report of the commissioners appointed by the Walker-Rivas Government of Nicaragua, to examine and report as to the indebtedness of the Accessory Transit Company to that Republic has been published. The property of the company seized is valued at $161,129 05, and the commissioners report that the Company owes the Government of Nicaragua $412,589 96, leaving the Company still indebted to the Government in the sum of $251,460 91.

There were only nine deaths in Savannah during the week ending on the 21st inst., two of which were by drowning.

The Secretary of State has addressed a letter to the Governor of California, informing him that the Federal Government cannot interfere against the Vigilance Committee until requested by the Legislature of California, or until that body shall be unable to act in consequence of the insurrection. This is understood to be in accordance with an opinion given by the Attorney-General.

The gross earnings of the Michigan Central Railroad during the year ending on the 31st May last, amounted to $2,800,442 81. This shows an excess of earnings over the year previous of $685,159 08, or a little over 26 per cent.

The Secretary of the Navy left Washington on the 18th inst., for the White Sulphur Springs, Va., where the condition of his health makes it necessary that he should sojourn for a short season.

NEW ORLEANS:

SATURDAY, AUGUST 2, 1856.

CORRECTION.—In the Advocate of June 21st an article was copied from the Tennessee Baptist, purporting to have been written by a minister near Lake Providence, La., in which several statements are made of that field. A well informed correspondent writes us to be careful as to authority. He lives near Lake Providence and has lived in Tennessee, and knows. After specifying—he concludes: "As there are no less than eight false impressions and misstatements embodied in eighteen lines it is unnecessary for me to make any suggestion about copying anything from that quarter."

YELLOW FEVER.—On Thursday, in ward 33 of the Charity Hospital, a patient was lying ill of yellow fever, with black vomit. He was taken Monday, having arrived a few days previous from Vera Cruz. He is a Kentuckian. This is the only case that is or has been in the Hospital this season, so we are informed by Dr. Austin, a prominent officer, and this an importation. Does it not look like we ought to enforce quarantine?

SHARON, MISS.—In consequence of ill health Rev. J. W. Shelton has resigned the Presidency of the Female College and Rev. Saml. F. Gard succeeds him.

A LIBERAL RIGHT HAND.—Some friend of Missions in Alabama has sent up to the Treasurer W. R. Elliston, Esq., one thousand dollars. The indications are that the thirty thousand dollars fixed by Conference will be moved up several notches by the people. This will be a well deserved rebuke.

The left hand is ignorant still.

MINUTES OF P. E. CHURCH IN LOUISIANA.—We have been favored by Mr. Norman, 14 Camp street with a very neat copy of the Journal of the 16th convention of the P. E. Church, in the diocese of Louisiana, held in this city May first. We give an abstract for the year then ending:

Baptisms—infants, 631; adults, 78; communicants, died or removed, 73; added, 156; present number, 1342; confirmed 178; marriages, 159; Burials, 266; sunday-school scholars, 1287; contributions for religious purposes, $17,615 42.

Dr. Longstreet has sent in his resignation as President of the University of Mississippi, and although strongly importuned and petitioned by the trustees and scholars to withdraw the same, he peremptorily refuses to do so.

MORE OF THE FRUITS.—Since the account of the camp-meeting in the Attakapas was published, we learn that the number of souls converted and received into the church, as the fruit of that meeting, amounts to 120. May it endure to eternal life.

CHURCHES IN CALIFORNIA.—A very judicious friend writes us from the Pacific about signs of mutual conciliation in the Methodist Churches North and South, out there. Shall the sword devour forever? He says:

The two churches here seem to have grown weary of the quarrel, and are daily becoming more brotherly in their regards of each other. If you will observe, their paper has lately become more religious, and I think is growing in grace.

AUSTRIA AND THE JESUITS.—The Emperor of Austria has contributed 30,000 florins out of his own pocket towards the erection of a house for the Jesuits at Vienna, whence they were expelled, near a century since, by Maria Theresa.

LONGEVITY.—The life of a British Wesleyan preacher seems favorable to the enjoyment of good health and length of days. Of the twenty-nine itinerant ministers belonging to the Wesleyan Conference, who have died during the last Conference year, one has been 67 years in the ministry, a second 64, a third 63, a fourth 59, a fifth 52, sixth 51, a seventh, an eighth, and a ninth, 50 each; a tenth, an eleventh, a twelfth and a thirteenth, 47 years each, and not one, except an African missionary, less than eleven years in the ministry. Six Irish preachers are included in the list, and their ages range from 71 to 80 years, and their terms of ministerial life from 46 to 64!. This is more than can be said in favor of the length of lives of American Methodist preachers, many of whom, through exposure and excessive labor, fall victims to disease and death long before their 40th year is reached.

The heart—the pendulum that ticks the hours of life.

JOY, SORROW AND HOPE.

How wholesomely combined in the Christian's life are these! David sung, in the same breath, of mercy and judgment. A ship takes many tacks and courses before making port—and so needs a breeze from every point of the compass. Side winds fill all the sails. There is a time for every dispensation.

Robert Hall, in one of his exquisite letters of condolence with a friend under affliction, says: "This state is designed to be a mingled scene, in which joy and sorrow, serenity and storms, take their turns. A perpetuity of either would be unsuitable to us. An uninterrupted series of prosperity would fill us with worldly passions. An unbroken continuity of adversity would unfit us for exertion. The spirit would fail before Him and the souls which he hath made. Pain and pleasure, scenes of satisfaction and sorrow are admirably tempered with each other, so as to give us constant room for thankfulness, and yet to remind us that this is not our rest."

Wm. Jay, of Bath, preached a sermon, shortly before his death, with these divisions. The text of the sermon was, "By the rivers of Babylon, there we sat down; yea, we wept when we remembered Zion. We hanged our harps upon the willows in the midst thereof." The divisions were these: First, "Every man has a joy, else what need of a harp?" Secondly, "Every man has a sorrow, else why hang it up?" Thirdly, "Every man has a hope, else why not break the harp in pieces and fling it away?"

THE REVISION MOVEMENT.

The Bible Union has had a blow, that threatens to amount to a blowup. As some of our readers have taken an interest in the movement to get up an immersion bible, and agents are at work for the Union within the bounds of our circulation, we lay before them a few items from the New York Examiner, a Baptist paper.

Dr. Maclay, the President after Dr. Cone, has resigned and given his reasons and complaints in a pamphlet to the public. He has been one of its ablest money-collectors and friend makers, and supposed every thing was going on right. But on his accession to the Presidency, he felt a weightier responsibility, made personal investigation, and arrived at certain discoveries, namely:

I then for the first time ascertained who the revisers were; and found, to my astonishment, that instead of there having been about forty individuals actually engaged in translating the New Testament, as I had understood from the Secretary, and often stated, there had not been more than twenty-three or twenty-four. Instead of all these being competent scholars, as I had supposed, and as the plan of the Union required, and as is often reiterated in the official documents of the Union, some of them unquestionably lacked the essential qualifications of a translator.

After parley with the Board and further research into Revisers' Department he "found that numerous translations had been made, which, though not in all cases inconsistent with good scholarship, were nevertheless calculated, on other grounds, to compromise the character of the Union, and to shake the confidence of men in the truth of God's word." Of these, he gives the annexed specimens:

"In the beginning was the word, and the word was with God, and God was the word."—John 1: 1.

"He it is that immerses in a holy spirit."—John 1: 33.

"If any one be not born of water and spirit.—John 1: 5.

"The Son can do nothing of himself, if he see not the Father doing anything."—John 5: 19.

"But this is said of the spirit which those believing on him were about to receive: for there was not yet a holy spirit."—John 7: 39.

"And I give to them eternal life, and they shall not perish, forever."—John 10: 28.

These, we are told, are not the worst. There are some which he "would not disclose to the public eye." On further search, he discovered that "the misguided hand of the reviser had been rashly laid upon the original text," as he thinks, without any authority of the Board. He does not repudiate the principle of the Society, but despairs of it:

But I found myself unable to remedy the existing growing evils. My best endeavors, in the whole affair, instead of being met with candor and frankness, have been captiously and obstinately thwarted. Being thus compelled to relinquish all hope of reform, I was constrained some time ago to withdraw from the meetings of the Board. It only remains for me, therefore, to take care that I be not a party to wrongs which I have in vain sought to remedy.

Being fully satisfied, from personal examination, that the funds which I have done so much to collect, and which I know have been most sacredly devoted, by the rich and poor, to one of the holiest purposes of Christian charity, are being squandered; that a vast amount is expended for operations remote from the one great object of the institution; that men are employed to translate the word of God who are not qualified for the work; that unwarrantable translations have been made, which, if published, must bring into discredit the most precious doctrines of my faith, sap the fundamental truths of Christianity, as indubitably revealed in the Holy Scriptures, and shake the confidence of the people in the canon of the sacred writings. * * * * *

And having now, after half a century spent in the ministry of the gospel, devoted all my strength and influence, for the last six years, to inspire the public mind with confidence in what seemed to me the greatest enterprise of the age—having induced thousands throughout the United States, in the British Provinces and Europe, to become self-sacrificing supporters of the American Bible Union—and being myself at last compelled, by the hopeless mismanagement of that institution, which is barely outlined in this letter, to abandon the enterprise, I feel bound, as an honest man and a Christian, to answer the inquiries which are coming to me from every quarter, by frankly stating, once for all, the reasons of my action.

The officers of the Society rejoin, asserting that the rules of the Union have not been violated—that their books and administration are open to investigation, which they challenge.

THE LESS BEFORE THE GREATER.

The Methodist Quarterly (July) notices "Appleton's Cyclopedia, comprising a series of original memoirs of the most distinguished persons of all times." A royal octavo, edited by F. L. Hawkes, D. D. The basis of the work is a London Cyclopedia, published a year or two since. The American Editor's task was chiefly confined to the insertion of American names. As a specimen of fairness and the appreciation of real or comparative greatness therein shown, the Quarterly states that while Bishop Asbury's record covers only ten lines, Bishop Wainright gets more than a half a column!

Unfortunately for certain gentlemen they cannot preside over the real evolution of events. We should have a stunted and deformed growth of facts, if their theories ruled. Unrol the panorama of American history—moral and social. Compute the forces that have shaped American character. Take a glance at the actual achievements and positions of the religious denominations of this country. And then think of it, that the Bishop who superintended the foundation and discipline of the Methodist Church for thirty years, throughout the original thirteen States and Territories, is dispatched in ten lines—while he of lawn and silk, the Bishop of a diocese, the man of yesterday, is spread out over half a column! It is a burlesque on cyclopedian biography.

There is a deal of snobbery in literature. But after all, the bios is more than the graphy.

It is hard to hold us to the test of true greatness as propounded by Christ. He is greatest among men who does men the greatest service.—Bishop Asbury went about doing good, and organized his good as he went—he "planted" more churches than ever Bishop Wainwright will "visit"—he ordained two ministers to where Bishop Wainwright will administer one confirmation. He went from New York to Georgia on horseback—preaching along—oftener than Bishop Wainwright has made the circuit of his little diocese on railroads; he got $64 per annum, where Bishop Wainwright gets $6000; he crossed Alleghany mountains sixty times, episcopating—oftener perhaps than Bishop Wainwright has or will make episcopal trips up and down the Hudson on a floating palace; he has put off his harness gloriously, whereas the other has just put his on. Which is the greater?

Of the many reflections provoked by this act of impartial history we give expression to two only, suggested with the force of corollaries:

1. Live not for the praise of men.—They who love it more than the praise of God are neither wise nor good. The only just and safe record is that on high.

2. If Methodists expect others to set their measures or their men in a proper light before the world, and send them down to truthful and appreciative history, they will be disappointed. They owe this to themselves; they have the power; and they must do it for themselves. Let them cultivate their own literature. We feel like adding several horse-power more to that steam engine in the basement of the Publishing House at Nashville.

To the Members of the Alabama Conference.

I appeal to you once more as the Treasurer of the Ministerial Education Society, and hereby inform you that claims to the amount of several hundred dollars, for the board and tuition of the young men now under our care during the last scholastic year, have been presented, and your treasury is empty! If you had complied with the resolution passed at the last session of our Conference—each to raise twenty dollars at your earliest convenience, and forward to the Treasurer—those claims might have been promptly paid. But as it is, they are laying over unpaid, to the inconvenience of the holders, and the discredit of the Society. I now acquaint you with these facts, and call upon you for assistance. At least five hundred dollars will be necessary to meet the present liabilities of the Society.

Rev. B. B. Ross.

Extract from the minutes of the Board of Trustees of the Talladega Conference Institute, passed unanimously at their meeting, July 22, 1856.

WHEREAS, the long continued ill-health of the Rev. B. B. Ross, has made it necessary for him to resign the Presidency of the Talladega Conference Institute, over which he has presided for the past year with signal ability, and with the cordial approval of this Board and the patrons of the school, therefore—

Resolved, That the Board of Trustees accept his resignation, with unfeigned regret for the cause which impels him to take this step, for the recovery of his health.

Resolved, That in dissolving the connection with Brother Ross, we tender him our warmest acknowledgments for the ability and scholarship laid under contribution to the cause of education in our midst, and for his faithful devotion to the interests the School and the Church. GARRET E. GROCE, Pres't.

AN OLD ADVERTISEMENT OF 1568.—"Wanted, a stout, active man, who fears the Lord, and can carry two hundred weight."

DOMSTIC MISSIONS.

REV. H. N. MCTYEIRE, Assistant Treasurer of the Missionary Society of the M. E. Church, South:
PRAIRIE CREEK MISSION, Alabama Conference.

I now send you the report of the state of this mission for the third quarter of the current year. Thirty have been received into the church, and several have professed saving faith in our Lord Jesus Christ. Seventeen adults and nine infants have been baptised.

One has been expelled, and one has died in the triumphs of the Christian's faith.

This aged woman, in a conversation with her missionary a short time before her death, expressed herself perfectly willing to "depart and be with Christ." She rejoiced in a Saviour's love, and continued in that happy state till her spirit took its flight to the paradise of God.

There is work enough in this region of country to employ scores of missionaries, if the owners of negroes felt as they should, their responsibility to God.

Much more might be accomplished by the missionaries now in the field, if more judicious plans than those now in use for reaching the people, were adopted. If the owners would, from proper motives, unite several plantations in one congregation, many more might be reached by the same labor.

What I mean by uniting different plantations at one place of worship, from proper motives, is, that the object kept in view in so doing, should be the accomplishment of the largest amount of good, and not the lessening of individual contribution to the support of the mission.

But it is the duty of the missionary, without too much theorizing, to do the best he can with things as he finds them, and pray for the blessings of God upon his labors.

Yours in Christ, J. C. BUCKNER.
Macon, Ala., July 15, 1856.

GAINSTON MISSION, Second Quarter, July 18, 1856.

I report that there are six appointments in the mission.

One white and sixteen colored have joined the church this quarter; the latter on probation; eleven baptised—six adults (colored) five children (one white.) Whole number preached to from four hundred and fifty to five hundred.

I think the Mission is in a healthy condition. C. WIMBISH.

Sinners Denied of Christ in the Day of Judgment.

To be denied of Christ is a compendious expression of hell; an eternity of torments comprised in a word. It is condemnation itself; and, what is most of all, it is condemnation from the mouth of a Savior. O the inexpressible horror that will seize upon a poor sinner when he shall stand arranged at the bar of divine justice! when he shall look about and see his accuser, his judge, the witnesses, all of them his remorseless adversaries; the law impleading mercy, the gospel upbraiding him, the devil, his grand accuser, drawing his indictment, numbering his sins with the greatest exactness, and aggravating them with the cruelest bitterness; and conscience, like a thousand witnesses, attesting every article, flying in his face, and rending his very heart. And then, after all, Christ from whom only mercy could be expected, owning to the accusation. It will be hell enough to hear the sentence; the very promulgation of the punishment, and anticipated execution.

If Peter was abashed when Christ gave him a look after his denial; if there was so much dread in his looks when he stood as a prisoner, how much greater will it be when he sits as a Judge! If it was so fearful when he looked his denier into repentance, what shall it be when he shall look him into destruction? Believe it, when we shall hear an accusation from an advocate, our eternal doom from an Intercessor, it will convince us that a denial of Christ is something more than a few transitory words. What trembling, what outcries, what astonishment will there be upon the pronouncing of this subject! Every word will come upon the sinner like an arrow striking through his veins, like thunder that is heard and consumes at the same instant; yea it will be a denial with scorn, with taunting reprobations! And to be miserable without commiseration is the height of misery. He that falls below pity can fall no lower. And for those whom Christ has denied it will be in vain to appeal to the Father, unless we can imagine that those whom Mercy has condemned Justice will absolve.

LIBERALITY.—Daniel B. Turner, Esq., President of the Commercial Bank, Memphis, Tenn., we learn, has appropriated three hundred dollars to establish a Prize Gold Medal for the best musical performance on the regular anniversary concerts of the Huntsville Female College. The annual interest of that amount will secure a large and beautiful gold medal with suitable inscriptions thereon. It is to be known as the "Turner Prize Medal."

A wise man is like a spring lock—always more ready to shut than open.

The Saint's Glorified Body.

We shall be like Christ in those spiritual bodies in which we shall arise. The Scripture does not leave us in uncertainty on this point. Hear the chief apostle: "Our conversation is in heaven, from whence also we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall change our vile body—how the assurance begins to make his speech glow—our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body, according to the working whereby he is able," (is he not speaking of an omnipotent power?) "able to subdue all things unto himself." Did not that other disciple, whom Jesus loved, mean to include this same transcendant change, when he also looked forward to the consummation of all things—saying, "Beloved, now are we the sons of God, it doth not appear what we shall be, but we know that when he shall appear, we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is?"

"Whom he did foreknow," declares Paul again, "he also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son, that he might be the first born among many brethren." Is it altogether of a moral likeness that the scripture discourses? Why is it then added in such significant language, "that he might be first among many born brethren?" This language that refers to Christ's resurrection,—as he was the first of them that slept, his resurrection in body, delivering the corruptible dust from the grave. And as a prelude to this sublime assertion of God's eternal purpose to make us like his Son, it is the Apostle himself that sighs forth this long desire and expectation—"we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body." It cannot be doubted then that this is a Scripture hope—a revealed and accredited truth. And we see a new meaning thus in the final resurrection argument of Paul, which is not so much a piece of reasoning as a flash of heaven's own light, a sunbeam of inspiration—"We shall not all sleep, but we shall be changed.—* * * * For this corruptible,"—of what is he speaking, the soul or the body?—"must put on incorruption and this mortal must put on immortality."

Jesus rose from the dead with his rescued body; from the Mount of Ascension he went up with that body, the disciples being witnesses, through the parting heavens, till a bright cloud, (his chariot of glory) received him from their sight, and with that spiritualized, glorified, deified humanity, sat down at the right hand of Majesty. Our body is to be "like unto his own glorious body."

Something of that gloriousness he designed once to reveal to mortal eyes.—Three chosen followers stood with him on Mount Tabor—they knew not for what august display of his power or his grace. And while they waited with palpitating heart and quickened breath he was transfigured before them. They saw for a little, as their dazzled vision could bear the overpowering splendor—his glorious body—the model of that with which they too should be clothed, when they should finally and forever see him as he is. And what was it they saw? The record is, "his face did shine as the sun, and his raiment was white as light." Was not this the same form that one of them gazed upon again in the Apocalspye, and sketched it on that wondrous canvass that we too might behold at least the portraiture? "Being turned," he says, "I saw one like unto the Son of Man." And this is the sketch his pencil drew: "His head and his hair were white as snow; his eyes were as a flame of fire; his feet like unto fine brass, as if they burned in a furnace, * * his countenance was as the sun shining in his strength." And he could gaze no longer, but fell at his feet as one dead. So shall our vile bodies be changed. From this handiwork of God all grossness shall disappear. Every infirmity shall be gone. That which is mortal in us the grave shall hide forever. No more shall there be any inlet to disease or pain. No more wasting of strength and vigor; no more withering of bloom and beauty. No quick, declining youth; no fleeting of prime manhood; no tired sinews; no aching loins; no encroaching old age. There shall be no lame; no halt; no blind; no deaf; no hectic flush; no feeble knees; no pallor on cheek or lips. There shall be needed no couches for outworn frames; no opiates for restless pulses; no panacea for fleshy ills; no more bondage unto the fear of death; no ghastly coming of the pale, remorseless king; no ignominy of burial. The last enemy, whose all-obtrunding, everywhere-hunting presence has shadowed the life that now is in all its years, is vanquished forever. Forever invulnerable shall we be to mortality. This vile body, where fevers lurk, whose humors so clog the soul, whose headed drops pay tribute to the fiery summer sun, wrapt now in furs, and now cooled by baths or mountain airs, breaking down in some of its forces with overstrain, obliging us to stop and repair, against whose weakness we contended all life through, by-and-by to be food for worms—our vile body, vile in the charm of its utmost symmetry, softness and grace, because mortal and corruptible—the grave's odor hanging around it, however decked and beautified and scented, shall be fashioned like unto his glorious body. And there we shall walk the pave of the city, visible to all the glittered residents, like the King's Son. The angels will not be like him thus, the immigrants from other shores of starry worlds will not be like him thus, we only. He took on him the seed of Abraham. This will be our distinction, unshared, seen of all the heavenly hosts like the glorious body of the Master.—Each of us will have his own individual face, on which will shine and speak the lineaments of his own individual soul. Paul will be Paul, grand and heroic; John tender and loving; Peter ardent and eager; we shall be our own sanctified selves, but all will be clothed and garmented in Christ's glorified humanity, that external nature, of which the Bible speaks in paradox, that "spiritual body." Surely, surely, we shall be satisfied with this. The sense of beauty, the sense of elastic and joyous health, the sense of lightness and swiftness and strength, the sense of an unincumbered, matchless vehicle for the soul, instead of this groaning, crumbling, burdensome, panting earthwork, and patterned after that to which no other creature may aspire, we shall be satisfied when we awake with his likeness.—[Congregationelist.

Every-day Preaching.

One painful lack with some excellent ministers is the lack of knowledge of the human heart in its daily actings.—They are not ignorant men. They are tolerably familiar with Owen and Howe, with Poole and Turretin, and may have waded deep into Havernick, and Heugstenberg. But to the living, acting, weeping, working, tempted, and sinning world around them they are well-nigh strangers. During the week, their parishioners have been driving a plow, or hammering a lapstone, or pleading a cause, or have been "up to their eyes" in cotton bales, or sugar casks. When the Sabbath comes, these parishioners bring to the sanctuary their every day wants and trials, as parents, as citizens, as men of business. They want preaching that shall tell them how to live, as well as what to believe. They want plain teaching. They want doctrine, but doctrine made practical. They hunger for truth, but truth purged of all scholastic technicalities. We once heard a young licentiate of great promise preach a sermon in which he talked about "governmental theories of atonement," of "potentialities," of "subjective feelings," and "eclaircised verities." We said to ourselves, "Young man! you will burn that sermon up before you have been in the ministry twelve months." Such preaching saves no souls.

The Sabbath teachings which are carried into the work are those which point the sinner most clearly to the Saviour—which meet the Christian in his daily struggles and temptations—which soothe the afflicted with gospel consolations—which tell the young how to shun satan's pitfalls, and the aged how to prepare for death; and all this in the simplest language possible. A discourse which a minister would not be willing to read to his domestics, and his children of 12 and 15 years of age, with a good hope that they would understand it, is not usually a safe sermon for a popular audience. "It takes all our learning to make the truth simple." The preacher who never "wears out" is the one who studies most closely the Bible, and the human heart in its every day workings.—[Ex.

Greatness of Little Things.

Little habits drive nails into our coffins. They more than make up by their number what they seem to lack in individual importance. They are the true seeds of character. We might as well plant acorns, and not expect them to grow, as cherish small vices and not calculate on their increase; or as reasonably hope to see the firm and noble oak where no acorns were ever planted, as true greatness and success in life, where the seedlings of thousand little habits of industry and virtue had not been first carefully cherished.

In a word, character is the sum of little things rather than great ones. The true estimate of an individual is not ascertained by his incidental or occasional achievement, but his every day habits. A nation's character is not determined by its famous men, but by the habits of its masses, and the character of the age by the vices or virtues that were so inherent as to be unnoticed.

A FIRST RATE CHARITY SERMON.—Our readers have probably seen the following anecdote, but it will do to read twice.

Dean Swift was once solicited to preach a sermon for the benefit of the poor. When the time arrived he arose and selected his text; "He that giveth to the poor lendeth to the Lord."—"Now," said he, "my brethren, if you are satisfied with the security, down with the dust." He then took his seat, and there was an enormous collection.

The True Theory of Missions.

DEACON TODD.

The Master—"Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature."

The Church—To whom, oh Lord, is thy command addressed?

The Master—To you as my disciples, the body of believers here worshipping, holding the faith once delivered to the saints.

The Church—Shall we, oh Lord, disband this body, and each go into some foreign land, and thus leave the cause that we have pledged ourselves to thee and to each other, to sustain at this point, to languish and perhaps perish?

The Master—Do you know of none unto whose hearts I have put the desire to go far hence to the Gentiles? Have you faithfully inquired of that subject?

The Church—Lord I we are compelled to confess that we know of many such.

The Master—Then, on the principle that what is done by another is done by yourself, I again say, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature."

The Church—Lord, we are a feeble band, and not able to support a missionary and attend to all the interests of religion around ourselves.

The Master—Do you know of no body of my disciples, feeble and poor like yourselves, who would probably take part of this pleasant burden on their hands? or have you faithfully inquired on that subject?

The Church—Lord, we are compelled again to admit that we do.

The Master—Then I again command "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature."

A Horse in a Fat Pasture.

When this horse was kept in pasture short leas, where he had much scope but little grass, how gentle and tractable was he then. He would not only stand quiet to be taken, but come to hand of his own accord, and follow me up and down the field for a crust of bread, or handful of oats; but since I turned him into the fat pasture, he comes no more to me, nor will suffer me to come near him, but throws up his heels wantonly against me, and flies from me as if I were rather his enemy than a benefactor. In this I behold the carriage of my own heart towards God, who, the more he has done for me, the seldomer doth he look from me. In low and afflicted state how tractable is my heart to duty. Then it comes to the foot of God valiantly. But in an exalted condition how wildly doth my heart run from God and duty! With this ungrateful requital God faulted his own people (Jer. 3; 31,) teachable and tractable in the wilderness, but when fatted in that rich pasture of Canaan, "then we are lords, we will come no more to thee." How soon are all God's former benefits forgotten? And how often is that ancient observation verified even in his own people:

"No sooner do we gifts on some bestow,
But presently our gifts grey-headed grow."

But that is a bad tenant that will maintain a suit at law against his landlord with own rent; and a bad heart that will fight against God with his mercies. I wish it may be with my heart, as is reported to be with the waters in the kingdom of Congo, that are never so sweet to the taste, as when the tide is in at the highest.—Flavel

The Danger of Prosperity.

As long as the waters of persecution are upon the earth, so long we dwell in the ark; but where the land itself is dry, the dove itself will be tempted to a wandering course of life, never to return, to the house of her safety.

Many are not able to suffer and endure prosperity; it is like the light of the sun to a weak eye—glorious indeed in itself, but not proportioned to such an instrument.

In the tomb of Terentia, certain lamps burned underground many ages together; but as soon as ever they were brought into the air and saw a bigger light, they went out, never to be rekindled. So long as we are in the retirement of sorrow, of want, of fear, of sickness, or of any sad accident, we are burning and shining lamps; but when God comes with his forbearance and lifts us up from the gates of death and carries us abroad into the open air, that we may converse with prosperity and temptation, we go out in darkness, and we cannot be preserved in light and heat, but by still dwelling in the regions of sorrow.—[Jeremy Taylor.

A Methodist minister lately applied for arrears of salary. His wants were urgent. He pressed the payment. At length the steward, with the usual unfeeling and cutting remark ever indicative of a covetous selfish soul, said—"Ah, you preach for money, do you? I thought you preached for souls." "Souls!" replied the minister. "I cannot get souls; and if I could, it would take a thousand such as yours to make a decent meal."

MARRIAGES.

At the residence of Rev. R. Philips, by Rev. Robert Scales, on the 17th July, Rev. E. PHILLIPS, of the Alabama Conference, to Miss JULIA A. SMITH, of New Haven, Ct.

On the 17th, July, by Rev. James A. Godfrey, WM. HUNT, Esq., of Aberdeen, Miss., to Miss MARIA E. YOUNGUE, of Hinds county, Miss.

DEATHS.

Died—On the 12th May, 1856, Mrs. EDITH COTTON, aged 57 years.

The deceased was a member of the M. E. Church for the last ten years. She left good testimony of her acceptance with God. She often expressed herself to me as being perfectly reconciled to the will of the Lord. She has left a large family to mourn her loss. Will they use the means of grace necessary to meet her in heaven? L. P. GIBSON.

Died—In Clinton, Miss., on Wednesday, July 16, 1856, after a protracted illness of 31 days, of rheumatism, Mrs. SIDNEY A. COMFORT consort of Mr. F. M. Comfort, aged 37 years. She died in peace.

Died—On the 13th July, 1856, at Sour Lake, Texas, JOHN EARLY, infant son of Rev. C. and Mrs. J. A. Gillespie.

Died—On the 5th July, in Attala county, Miss., HARRIET O., consort of Septimus Weatherly, aged 55 years.

She was born in North Carolina, and born again at Rocky Spring Camp-meeting, Jasper county, Ga., in 1820, since when she has been a consistent member of the Methodist Church. The writer of this, with other preachers, has often been the recipient of her marked hospitality. In her painful sickness she expressed a desire, with resignation, to depart and be with Christ. This was granted her.

The Sugar Crop.

Messrs. Editors—Fully agreeing with you as to the smallness of the sugar crop of Louisiana, this year, I will submit to your consideration and that of your readers, some statistics of sugar, which are compiled from the Treasury and Champonier's reports, which exhibit in a condensed form the imports and consumption of foreign sugar, and the product and consumption of domestic:

EXPORTS into, Exports from, and Consumption of Foreign Sugars in the United States, for the five years ending 30th June, 1855, from Treasury Reports:

	Imports in Pounds.	Exports in Pounds.	Consum'n Pounds.
1851	386,000,000	6,000,000	380,000,000
1852	427,000,000	9,000,000	418,000,000
1853	461,000,000	18,000,000	443,000,000
1854	432,000,000	6,000,000	426,000,000
1855	379,000,000	23,000,000	356,000,000

PRODUCT of Sugar in the United States—Exports and Consumption thereof. From Champonier's and Treasury Reports.

	Product in Pounds.	Exports in Pounds.	Consum'n Pounds.
1851	275,000,000	2,000,000	273,000,000
1852	277,000,000	3,000,000	274,000,000
1853	260,000,000	10,000,000	250,000,000
1854	347,000,000	11,000,000	336,000,000
1855	265,000,000	(estimate)	253,000,000

The consumption of foreign sugar for the year ending 30th June, 1855, cannot be known until the publication of "The Report of Commerce and Navigation" is made in December next. The consumption of foreign sugar in the United States in 1855, was 400,000,000 of pounds. Of domestic sugar, crop of 1854, 382,000,000 of pounds. Total consumption of 1854 and 1855, 822,000,000 of pounds.

Assuming that the consumption of 1855 and 1856 will be as large as that of the previous year, the import and consumption of foreign sugar would have been 839,000,000 of pounds. Taking this as the basis of a calculation of consumption in 1856 and 1857, and assuming a product in the United States of 100,000,000 of pounds, the quantity to be imported in 1856 and 1857 would be 722,000,000 of pounds.

The import and consumption of foreign sugar of the United States was, in 1854-'55, 440,000,000. If an import of 722,000,000 is required in 1856-'57, it will exceed the imports of 1854-'55, 282,000,000, or 64 per cent. more will be required from abroad than heretofore.

It is assumed that the crop of sugar made in the United States, in 1856, will not exceed 100,000,000 of pounds. Owing to the diseased condition of the sugar cane of Louisiana, the crop has fallen from near 300,000,000 of pounds in 1853 to 250,000,000 in 1855; and no well informed person can think the crop of 1856 will go over the estimate of 100,000,000.

The diseased state of the cane for several years past, and the very long, cold and wet winter, has eradicated the rattoon cane. There is so very little rattoon cane made in 1856 in Louisiana, as to make it unnecessary to take it into consideration in an estimate of the quantity of cane necessary "to mat" for planting in 1857. Many will be compelled to put in mat till all their crops of 1856. Few or none will make as much sugar as in 1855; and nine-tenths cannot make one-half of what they made in 1855. These are facts patent to all who are informed upon matters relating to sugar in Louisiana.

It is quite a common practice to over-rate the product of sugar in the United States. It will be very difficult for any one to under-rate it in 1856. If all the cane now growing was saved for planting in 1857, the crop of that year would not amount to the product of 1853.

High prices tend to diminish consumption. The capacity to consume was never so great, owing to the general prosperity. A rapid increase of population will also have a tendency to prevent much reduction in the importation of sugar. ALLEGARLE.

CRYSTALS OF CARBON.—The diamond, on account of its hardness, transparency, brilliancy and rarity, has always been regarded as one of the most valuable of the precious stones. It has been long known to consist of pure carbon in a crystalline state. Chemically, it differs little from charcoal, black lead or, plumbago: it may be readily burned in oxygen gas, and the resulting compound is carbonic acid—precisely what arises from the combustion of charcoal.—In view of these facts, the production of diamonds in the laboratory has long been "thought possible," and from a charcoal prepared from crystallized sugar, M. Despretz has produced crystals of carbon having all the properties of the diamond. This result was obtained by the long continued action of the galvanic battery. The crystals are microscopic, but clearly recognized as octahedra, some black, others transparent. Cloudless, the famous lapidary, found these crystals to cut diamonds and rubies, like powdered diamond themselves.—It yet remains an achievement of chemical science to produce these crystals of a size convenient for ornament or purposes.

Ep Fraud.—We again call attention to the advertisement entitled Dr. J. HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS. Since these bitters have for their medical virtues in all cases of Dyspepsia, Flatulency, Constipation, or General Debility, become so popular and in such general use, many unprincipled men have refilled the bottles with some vile preparation, and palmed it off for the genuine, while others are putting up an article represented to be the same; but we advise all acquainted with Hostetter's bitters to use none other, and to buy of none but a respectable dealer. NEW ORLEANS AND ITS ENVIRONS.

Our Omnibus Interest—No. 1.

The multitude of incidental, auxiliary and apparently trifling matters on which the prosperity of a city depends, is hardly ever sufficiently considered by those who have to do with the city's good. Citizens themselves look at the one or the other thing as a private or corporate speculation and judge it without regard to its civic and public relations, which may alter all be of the greater importance. So great, in fact, is the importance of some of these apparently minor matters on the growth, progress and interests of a city, that it may be well doubted whether they are not collectively more beneficial to the city than any of the larger and more prominent ones. They are the little conduits that fill and empty the great arteries—the small streets that give ingress and egress to the mighty avenues. Without the lesser there could hardly be the greater.

Prominent among these minor interests to which we refer, and hardly less useful than any, though less generally acknowledged and understood, is that one which by means of omnibusses and shares brings remote sections of great cities into close contact, and enables persons residing in very remote streets and the farthest suburbs, to be within a few squares of any desired spot, which for a dime or a picayune transports the business man from his shady home in Lafayette to the bustle of the New Levee, or carries him from the New Levee to a distance beyond the lower shipping; which enables the ladies without trouble or fatigue to make a journey of three or six miles for shopping purposes, and in fact marries all portions of the city to one easily attained center and depot.

The great advantages and almost absolute importance of this arrangement will strike every one on a moment's reflection; and yet, of all the people who avail themselves daily of these advantages, there are few who have any knowledge whatever of their extent, their nature, their cost; or in fact anything whatever concerning them. And it is somewhat singular, moreover, that there have never been published in our city any statistics with regard to this very important city interest—one which, if abolished to-morrow, would affect all the real estate in the suburbs as well as in the city proper, and cause as much annoyance and additional expense as two droaths. In order to supply some information on so interesting and important a subject, we have been to the trouble of obtaining the following history of omnibussing in this city, and as it comes from first hands it can be looked upon in the main as reliable.

The first line of omnibusses started in New Orleans commenced running in May, 1832. It was begun by the Levee Steam Cotton Press and ran from the Press to the Pontchartrain Railroad Depot, and thence to Canal street, over the same route as at present. There were two omnibusses, or rather stages—the entrance being on the side—and the fare was twelve and a half cents. The primary object of the Press in establishing the line was to accommodate merchants above Canal street doing business with the Press, which accomodation was afterwards given to way passengers and individuals having no business relations with the Cotton Press. The advantages of the line were found to be so great that in March, 1842, the Company started two additional omnibusses at a charge of ten cents each, running over the same route. In 1845, the same Company started an additional omnibus, making five running in the same line.

In February, 1848, the Press sold out its entire interest to Messrs. Hart, Thomas & Co. in the omnibus interest, and they subsequently transferred their interest below Canal street to J. B. Slawson & Co., who have now a monopoly of all the business below Canal street, except that which belongs to the Bayou Bridge or Bayou St. John line. The old omnibusses, which some of our citizens recollect, named "One of the People," "Col. May," "Lieut. Beauregard," "Palo Alto," "Our Soldiers," etc., were built by the mechanics belonging to the Press and named in commemoration of the successes won by American arms in the war with Mexico.

Hart, Thomas & Co. come next in a description of the omnibussing business of the city. It is true that John Heey and Kip & Reed, with some others, were interested before them in the different lines, but they are the present owners of nearly all the rights of their predecessors, together with some they never had. Messrs. Hart, Thomas & Co. own four lines—the Magazine, Tchoupitoulas, Annunciation and Camp and Prytania streets routes. The Tchoupitoulas line is three and five-eighths of a mile long; the Magazine two and three-quarters; the Annunciation one and one-quarter, and the Camp one and three-quarters. These lines were started by different persons, at different times.

Messrs. Hart & Thomas have been in the business about eight years, and it is really wonderful what an amount of business is transacted by them, how many men and animals they employ, how many different trades and what a quantity of material they have need of. The same, too, may be said of all our omnibus lines—that they are little worlds of themselves—sustaining boarding houses, blacksmith and wheelright shops, harness makers, carpenters, painters, and a number of other trades and occupations not generally supposed to be allied to the business of running omnibusses. Messrs. Hart & Thomas give employment to about one hundred and fifty men, at whom one-third are drivers, and some dozen or fourteen women. They have twenty mechanics and eight or ten blacksmiths. They have three large establishments, of which the chief one is at the head of Tchoupitoulas street, and occupies nearly a square. The main building is a stable, 280 feet long and two stories high, containing 255 stalls. The loft is capable of containing fodder for 250 animals, sufficient for six months. It is probably the largest, finest and best arranged stable in the South, is well ventilated, has a well or cistern in it, and is handsomely painted. On the opposite side of the yard is a large dwelling house, two stories high, for the accommodation of the hands. The office is in one end and the remainder is occupied by a large sleeping hall, dining room, kitchen and chambers. Beyond the dwelling house are the shops for the wheelwrights, painters and saddlers—all well stocked with material. The blacksmith shop comes next, adorned with long rows of horse-shoes and iron for tires to the carriages. These different apartments are all methodically arranged and conducted without trouble. They enable the Company to do all of its own work at home and at a very considerable saving.

Hart, Thomas & Co. have 512 head of stock—330 mules and 142 horses. The average price of mules is stated to be $180 to $190, and of horses about $125. A mule will last about seven years, whereas a horse generally wears out in three or four years. Each animal is allowed fifteen pounds of oats and nine pounds of hay per diem, and ten horses or mules are considered necessary to run one omnibus. The employees are mostly Germans. The drivers get $20 a month and found, and the hostlers receive from $16 to $18.

When they first entered upon the business, Messrs. Hart & Thomas built a number of omnibusses, but latterly they have bought them in New York, finding it more economical and convenient to do so. The average cost of a gold carriage is $900, and with frequent repairs they will last four years. When badly broken down and defaced, the omnibusses are taken into the repair shop, thoroughly stripped, rebuilt, repainted and refurbished. The wheels generally give way first, and need to have new tires put on them at least twice or three times a year, although the tires are made of iron an inch thick.

During the eight years that Messrs. Hart & Thomas have been in the omnibus business, they have carried some 15,000,000 people, and judge that they now carry about 6000 persons per day. In all this time no life has ever been lost, nor any limb ever broken, although several times the stages have broken down, and once or twice the horses have run away. The severest accident that has ever occurred to a passenger of theirs, was the loss of two teeth by a man who jumped out when the horses were running, and fell on the pavement.

The carriages on the different lines owned by them commence running from 6½ to 6¾, according to the nature of the routes. The different streets have a peculiar character in regard to omnibussing, which is worthy of note. On Magazine and Camp streets, the business is chiefly transacted at meal times, when merchants, clerks and business men are going to or from their offices to their residences. On Tchoupitoulas street the business, however, is most brisk from 10 to 2 o'clock, when butchers, cattle dealers and the working class are in motion. Camp street has almost twice as many lady passengers as any other, and Tchoupitoulas is nearly monopolized by mechanics.

J. B. Slawson & Co., we believe, are the owners of more routes than any other omnibus proprietors in the city. Their lines are chiefly below Canal street, although one runs to the Waterworks, one to Lafayette Square and another up Common street. Mr. Slawson went into the business in April, 1848, with two omnibusses, and commenced running on Tchoupitoulas in opposition to Hart, Thomas & Co. He ran from Millbank's Warehouse, via Tchoupitoulas and Chartres streets, to the Government Wharf. Within six months he had twelve or fifteen omnibusses and from 160 to 170 horses at work—the fare being seven cents for tickets and ten cents cash.

In or about 1852 Mr. Slawson started a line from the corner of Chartres and Canal streets to Rampart, down Rampart to Love, and thence to the Mexican Gulf Railroad Depot. The route is about two miles and a half long, on which there is five and six omnibusses. The same year he also started a line running from the same point on Chartres street to Marais street, thence down Marais street to Esplanade—about two miles long. There were three omnibusses on it, but after an experiment of three years it was withdrawn.

In the same year Mr. Slawson started the line that now runs down Royal to Maine, and on Maine streets some six squares back of Claiborne. It originally ran down Bourbon instead of Royal. There are two carriages every half hour on the route, which is two miles and a half long. They start from the same point on Canal street as the others.

The line which runs on Lafayette street from the Pontchartrain Railroad Depot to the Waterworks was started by Mr. Slawson in conjunction with Hart & Thomas, in 1852. The route is three miles long, and will shortly be extended to the Bull's Head. There are now on it ten or twelve carriages.

At about the same time the line was started which runs from Lafayette Square down Camp and Chartres to Dauphin street, down Dauphin to Lonbia, opposite the Government Wharf. The line was started in connection with Hart, Thomas & Co.—each line putting on a like number of carriages. The line is three miles long, and now employs from twelve to fourteen carriages.

Shortly after opening the Lafayette Square line, Mr. Slawson opened that which now runs from Canal street up Tchoupitoulas to Annunciation Square. Like the two last named it was started in connection with Hart & Thomas. The route is two miles long and has four omnibusses.

In the latter part of 1852 the line that runs through Common street to Claiborne, thence down Claiborne to Esplanade was opened. It is two miles and a half long, and uses five and six omnibusses.

The old original line, started by the Levee Press and now owned by Mr. Slawson, uses ten and twelve carriages and continues to be one of the most important and profitable routes in the city.

By this statement it will be seen that Mr. Slawson has started more lines than any other man in this city, and that he is now very heavily engaged in the business. At one time there were nine different routes on his hands, but by an arrangement entered into between Messrs. Hart, Thomas & Co., in the beginning of the last year, it is so arranged that most of the routes above Canal street are run by the former Company, while those below are in the hands of Slawson & Co. Mr. Slawson now has six routes, Hart & Thomas four, Irwin two and the Bayou Bridge Line one.

Mr. Slawson has several stables at different points, in which he keeps 450 head of stock, of which about 40 are horses and the rest mules. He employs 140 hands, of which about 20 are mechanics, 50 drivers, 10 hostlers, 6 watchmen, 12 women and the rest in miscellaneous duties. About three years ago he brought 100 mules from Kentucky in a single lot for which he paid $16,000, since which time mules have advanced in value from fifteen to twenty per cent. The general facts concerning carriages, running expenses, wages, fodder, etc., that are stated concerning Hart & Thomas, hold good with the lines of Slawson & Co., and need not be repeated. The number of persons carried per day is from 5,000 to 6,000, yielding an income of from $350 to $500. The lines in the rear of the city carry a great many ladies, but very few ride in the front routes.

Of the omnibus lines above Canal street, there are but three in the possession of other owners than Hart, Thomas & Co. One of these, running from the Pontchartrain Railroad Depot, via Levee street to the Water Works, we have already mentioned. The other two run from Canal street, one via St. Charles to Julia, thence to the New Basin, up New Basin to Hercules, to Felicity road and back to Dryades market. The other runs up St. Charles to St. Joseph street, thence to Carondelet, on to Apollo, and ends on Eighth street. Both of these lines are owned by Mr. Pat. Irwin. The Apollo street line has two miles and one quarter long, and the Dryades market line one mile and a half. The latter line employs six omnibusses with nine hours to each. The omnibusses commence running at six o'clock in the morning, and quit at nine in the evening. The Apollo street line has ten omnibusses that start from each end every eight minutes. Mr. Irwin started both lines in 1852, and has now twenty omnibusses, one hundred and thirty mules and twenty horses employed. Like the other omnibus proprietors, he does his own repairing, painting and iron work, deeming it cheaper and more convenient. Mr. Irwin has sixteen drivers and forty hands all told. Since the starting of the lines, real estate at the extreme ends has risen more than 250 per cent in value. The general facts embodied in our notice of Hart, Thomas & Co., and J. B. Slawson's line, apply equally to the lines of Mr. Irwin. The price of cattle, amount of feed, wages of men, and all similar matters are set down at nearly the same figures in each instance.

The Bayou Bridge of Bayou St. John line, running from Canal street down Royal to Hospital and down Hospital to the Bayou Bridge, is the only other line now in operation.

The length of the route is about three miles, and there are nine omnibusses on it, employing fifty mules and thirty horses. Most of the stages are made in New York and all are filled with registers. Nine drivers and nine hostlers are employed, at the same rates as on other lines. The blacksmithing and other work is also done at the stables. The omnibusses of this line are of a yellow color, by which they can be easily distinguished from those of other lines. Most of the travel towards the Bayou Bridge is of a pleasure character, very little business going in that direction, and the evening is accordingly the most busy and profitable portion of the day. A great many go down to the park to get a breath of fresh air and a bite of the green grass—the ride amply repaying all who put themselves to such an amount of trouble and expense. The line is owned by Messrs. Roderigues, Benachi & Co., who have had it for some three months past, and added materially to its efficiency. The fare is one ticket to the stables and one ticket and a half to the bridge, or ten cents cash to either place.

The distance from the stables to the bridge is one mile, and the road is in excellent condition. The street through which the stages now run will be gradually changed, however, as soon as St. John Road is properly shelled and rolled, and a finer and more thickly populated portion of the village will be traversed. The city park is only a few minutes walk from the terminus of the line, and thither a great proportion of the travel goes.

The omnibusses run by Pat. Irwin and the Bayou Bridge Company are furnished with registers, indicating by means of a bell and dial, the number of passengers conveyed. On horse fares payment is required in advance, and so soon as it is made the bell strikes twice, and the hand of the dial moves forward two points. This invention is a recent one, and is intended to check the leakage in receipts which occurs when there are dishonest drivers.

It may be well for travelers to bear in mind the fact that the tickets for one line are good in all the others—the different lines having agreed to exchange. Thus a person having a bundle of Slawson's tickets may travel on the Bayou Bridge line, or with Irwin, or Hart, Thomas & Co., or vice versa. The price of tickets is sixty cents for a bundle of ten, or six cents apiece. A dime, however, is charged for a ride in all cases where tickets are not procured, except on the Apollo and Dryades street lines, where the fare is a picayune. Half tickets are also given in charge to children under twelve years old, which enables them to ride for three cents, or five cents.

The facts which we have published concerning the omnibus business of this city have not, to our knowledge, ever been collected before. There are undoubtedly some errors and some omissions, but taken generally, they may be considered as reliable and correct. Statements of the history and present condition of a very important interest, and one with regard to which comparatively but little is known.

EDUCATIONAL.

That sufficient encouragement has not been given, in times past, in Louisiana, to the cause of education and to educational institutions, is beyond controversy. From the facts and figures before us, the conclusion is irresistible that the importance and benefits to be derived from institutions where our youth of both sexes can be thoroughly educated, has not received that attention from our people and lawmakers that their magnitude demands. Indeed, until within a few years past, parents desirous of bestowing upon their children the advantages of a thorough and classical training, have been compelled to send them to institutions beyond the limits of the State, and frequently where they were surrounded by adverse influences, different from what they had been accustomed to, in order that they might obtain the requisite facilities for the end proposed.

Time and again has the press—that sleepless sentinel on the outposts of education—called attention to the evils to be apprehended from the education of those who are to succeed us, under the shadow of influences foreign to the customs and social laws of their homes.

The laws that govern a country, the influences that shape its course for weal or woe, have their origin in the proper or improper training of its youth. By their hands and by their skill must, in future, be moulded the forms of society. If this position be correct, as a matter of reason, as a matter of concern for the future, care should be had that our youth should be brought up with a full knowledge of the circumstances by which they are to be surrounded, and an intimate acquaintance with the task which hereafter necessarily devolves upon them.

In other States, seminaries of learning have been built up and supported by both corporate and individual aid, and the results have proved that such aid was wisely bestowed. We all point with pride to such universities as Harvard, Yale, Princeton, and others, because of the bright halo that distinguished names, once familiar to their halls, has thrown around them: because many of them who have carved a niche in the temple of our country's fame, there tempered the chisel, afterwards so successfully used.

Why may we not build up in our own State colleges that hereafter will be referred to with proper and becoming pride? Is there any insurmountable obstacle in the way? One step towards this end has been taken in the establishment of the "Centenary College" at Jackson. In 1845, by an act of the Legislature, certain buildings, lands, etc., were granted in aid of this institution, and its prosperity at this time evinces the laudable interest by those who are alive to the advantages and necessity of home education.

The increase in the number of students has rendered necessary more room for their accommodation, and to that end the trustees propose the erection of a centre building in accordance with the original plan. To accomplish this end they have sent forth an appeal to the public for aid, but as they are entirely competent to state their case, we conclude with an extract from the circular we have been favored with, and commend to the friends of education throughout the South, irrespective of creed, the cause they advocate. The circular says:

We intend to deserve the patronage of the public, and although the dullness is under no living male government of the States which we have moved to thrust its peculiarities of doctrine or government upon the students. By rule of the College, all students are required to attend some place of worship on the Sabbath, but every student may enjoy his own predilections. In 1839, one of the buildings intended as wings to the center building, now occupied by students, was destroyed by fire. It has been repaired at a cost of $4,000, and now the two wings afford accommodations for about one hundred students, each of the lower stories being occupied as recitation rooms, society halls, libraries, etc.

Public interest and the pressing necessities of the institution are demanding of us additional accommodation for students; and yielding to that demand, we have resolved to erect the center building, to contain also the plan contemplated originally by the State.

This building will contain all the recitation rooms, rooms for library, apparatus, cabinet, society halls and a chapel. It will cost about $60,000, and while the cost for its structure will be combined excellence, simplicity and utility. About one half of the amount necessary for its completion is now on hand. A State bond, invested $16,000. The building is under contract, and the work is progressing rapidly. All the brick required for its erection are on the spot, and the laying of the massive foundation can be put in progress at once.

We believe that the success of the institution is in a great measure dependent upon the erection of this building, for the proposed plan already thrown out has met with evidence of want of accommodation in the College, and the rooms used as recitation, etc., are not suited to the purposes. Through altered circumstances or embarrass our present operations, and to appeal in that spirit of confidence which influences the liberality of the public in addition at home, adds to the permanency and permanence of the institution.

The close is put when an enlightened public demands a reason for our efforts to build up a college of high literary standing in the South, for we are forced to the conclusion that it is needful to commit our educational interests to those who, possessing alike of political and social obligations, grant to each our independence, and forbid insult upon any score. And while we disclaim all sympathy with Southern area which leap upon them municipal abuse, we feel that we owe it to the South to build up and endow Southern colleges. Our sons will go North to be educated until we make ample provision for their education at home.

The whole of education is felt; the purpose to educate our youth in the highest style, and the cause cannot prevent what we do place, until our supply at home that which is now sought abroad.

We come then as one and to publicly, to appeal to the generosity of our citizens for the establishment of institutions of learning, believing, as we do, that the true greatness of our country does not consist in numbers or in wealth, but in the intelligence and integrity of the people.

We would build up and endow Southern Colleges. We intend to build up and endow Centenary College.

There are now 251 students in the Institution, and 120 of her graduates have gone forth—the proof of our earnestness, and the honor of which we intend to accomplish.

The preparatory department of the institution is under the control of the trustees of the College. Its principal is eminently suited to his position, and we intend it to be a fit auxiliary to the college.

The Joint Board of Trustees and Visitors met on the 10th of April, and authorized the "Building Committee" to erect the "Center Building." The Board was present in its corpus, and $9,000, in $1,000 subscriptions each, were contributed at once to forward its plans. Other and liberal subscriptions have since been added to this amount.

The Board of Trustees appointed a committee to prepare and address to the friends of education, and to solicit aid for the erection of the "Center Building." In conformity with the instructions of the Board, we have prepared the above, and now submit it to the public, feeling assured that the object we seek to accomplish, will excite an encouraging response from our generous and patriotic fellow citizens.

RAILROAD DISASTERS.

Among the more important elements that have contributed to the growth and prosperity of this country, may properly be classed railroads. The vast extent of territory, the varied interests, and the ever active spirit of our people, have rendered necessary that speedy methods of communication from one portion of the Union to another should be devised and accomplished. Consequently it is that railroads—the most rapid mode of traveling practically known to us—have been built, equipped and placed in running order in an incredibly short space of time, from one end of the country to the other. Upon these roads every class of the community, almost of necessity, at sometime or other, places its trust of safety of life and limb.

The recent and terrible disaster upon the North Pennsylvania Railroad has called attention to the necessity of guarding, in every possible way, against the chance of calamities so much to be deplored. Our Northern exchanges are full of the subject, and earnestly urge the adoption and rigid enforcement of such regulations by railroad directors as human foresight may suggest, to prevent the recurrence of such calamities.

The Philadelphia American and Gazette, in a very able article on the subject, says:

Many disasters have occurred to be the consequence of defects in the construction of the track and rolling stock, and of rapid speed and careless management of the service, having for the great and important objects not being attended to, or the established laws and regulations, and to ensure the safety of the passengers, have already shown, were owing to the neglect of Old and New Times.

[The following went the rounds of the newspaper press a few years ago. It "hits" now about as well as it did then, and will continue to fit just as well many years hence.]

When you and I were young, Maggie, I
Was a girl,
And you were a boy;
Young men then knew how to knit,
And young maids could spin and weave,
Could bake, and brew, and sweep;
Could sing and pray, could dance and paint,
Could make a socket keep.

Young men then could hew and saw,
Could plow and reap, and thrive;
Young maids then were beautiful
In every troubled way—
Could make the new mown hay,
Or milk the "brindled cow."

Young ladies then wore bonnets, too,
And wove them their own hair;
They made them from their own good straw,
And pretty, too, they were.

Young ladies often fell in love,
And married, too, the men;
While men, with willing hearts and true,
Loved them all back again.

Young ladies now can knit and sew,
Or read a pretty book,
Can sing, and paint, and joke, and quiz,
But can't bear to cook.

Young ladies now can blithely spin,
Or "street yarn" many a spool;
And weave a web of scandal too,
And dye it in the wool.

Young ladies now can bake their hair,
Can brew their own cologne;
Be forward passengers often shine,
While they neglect their own.

And as to secrets, who would think
Possible—a pearl?
One fact a thousand little pens,
Perchance a country girl.

Young ladies now wear lovely curls,
What pity they should buy them;
Just as curls—heaven! they fright
The heavens ventures nigh them.

Young men then could be trusted
They'll hold a dozen men;
And if you came get in their sleeves
Round as the tree ye sawn.

Men love is changed from what it was,
Although true love is known;
The wealth adds lustre to the cheek,
And melts the heart of stone.

Well! Time works wonders—young and old
Confess his magic power;
Beauty will fade—but Virtue proves
Pure gold in man's last hour!

Stray Thoughts.

BY W. SEAMAN BEARE.

Far away there sleeps a maiden,
Where the waves dally sing
Soothing murmur, deeply laden,
Of the ocean's mighty king.
Smiling as in days of yore,
Sorrow from my heart's a-reaping
Fruits emblem'd in its core.

Words of nature, music that fondly uttered
Words of nature, breathed a holy love,
But an echo faintly muttered
Its regret still from words above,
And lonely, ever roaming,
Saying o'er the desert wild,
Dark and dreary, as the shrouded
Pall that bears the midnight hour,
Hope and joys seem ever clouded,
Hopeless joy in sadness power.
Fondly as I gaze on all to have vanished
Fleeting through memory
O'er the sea of pleasures banished,
Still the love still true to thee.

A Plea for Kissing.

The fountains mingle with the river,
The rivers with the ocean;
The winds of heaven mix forever
With a sweet commotion;
Nothing on earth is single,
All things by law divine,
In one another's being mingle;
Why not I with thine?

See the mountains kiss high heaven,
And the waves clasp one another;
No sister flower would be forgiven,
If it disdained to kiss its brother;
And the sunlight clasps the earth,
And the moonbeams kiss the sea,
But what are all these kissings worth
If thou kiss not me?

The following beautiful stanzas are from a poem by H. S. Sayre, Esq., of Alabama. The national heart will respond to such sentiments, we are sure:

"Her banner is not sectional—
Its fields that cut alike on all:
The North, its South, no East, no West,
Is blessed on our country's crest!
The star-gemmed flag, where'er unfurled,
O'er towering fort or watery world,
Speaks all her sons, or near or far,
For safety and protection there.
There are her triumphs—this the fame
That time for her one united name.
Where is the traitor hand to tear
The line from out the record there?

No! let her stand in all the power,
That marks her progress at this hour.
What nations claim for her farthest strand,
What headlands mark her lengthened land,
What star her breadth—where e'er her bound,
It like us all hallowed ground.
And the war compliant prayer still be,
To him who guides and guards the free—
God bless the Old Thirteen, that won
The heritage we call "our own"—
God bless the Thirty-one to save—
The precious boon the Thirteen gained!"

Light of Home.

BY THOMAS BUCHANAN READ.

Oh, thou whose beauty on us beams
With glimpses of celestial light;
Thou fade of our waking dreams,
And early star that crown'st our night.

Thy light is magic when it falls;
To those the deepest shadow yields;
Thou bring'st unto these dreary halls
The heart of the Summer fields.

There is a freedom in thy looks
To make the prisoned heart rejoice;
In thy blue eyes I see the brooks,
And hear their music in thy voice.

And every sweetest bird that sings
Hath poured a charm upon thy tongue;
And where the bee ensnared clings,
There surely thou in love hast clung;

For when I hear thy laughter free,
And see thy dancing light hair,
As in a dream at once I see
Fair upland realms and valleys fair.

I see thy footsteps wandering
The violet's and lily's lone;
And when the morning woodland woos,
Then hadst no over beds of moss:

Or by some mossed old willow's side,
Where waters like a bird strold,
Down their dark course, and, flashing, glide
Beneath the sunrise and the shade;

Where streams our steps beguile,
We see the cascade, broad and fair,
Dashed headlong down to foam, the while
It sparkled bright in air!

The Railroad.—The Pacific Railroad Convention, it is stated in a Washington letter, has given a bill. These routes are provided for—

Commencing at the north degree of latitude, for the Northern Atlantic and Pacific Railroad, of which Minnesota is to be the eastern terminus; one between the thirty-third and forty-second degrees, to be constructed by an association as now chartered and reorganized forward Texas and Missouri, the junction to be formed Kearney and the single trunk to run to the Pacific, in California; and one to the Southern Pacific, of which T. Butler King is associated with the Atlantic Company of California, Texas Company, and the Vicksburg Company. This line runs from some point south of the thirty-second degree to San Francisco with a branch to Texas, and with a grant of forty sections per mile to the California line, and ten sections per mile to Texas. The middle road runs from Kansas to Fort Smith, Memphis, Nashville, Knoxville, Lynchburg, Richmond, Washington, Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, Albany, Buffalo, Cleveland, Toledo, Chicago, Rock Island, Galena, Dubuque, Iowa City, Council Bluffs, Omaha, Fort Kearney, Fort Laramie, Fort Hall, Fort Boise, Walla Walla, Dalles, Vancouver, Portland, Puget Sound, Fort Steilacoom, Seattle, Bellingham Bay, Fort Langley, Fort Hope, Fort Yale, Fort Kamloops, Fort Alexandria, Fort George, Fort Simpson, Fort Wrangel, Sitka, Kodiak, Kamtschatka, Behring's Straits, Asiatic Russia, Siberia, Moscow, St. Petersburg, Berlin, Paris, London, Liverpool, Halifax, Quebec, Montreal, Kingston, Toronto, Detroit, Chicago, Milwaukie, Madison, Prairie du Chien

CORRESPONDENCE UP THE RIVER.

Detroit—Great Western Railroad—Canada—Niagara—First Impressions—Descriptions—Realities—Moonlight—Lundy's Lane.

Eight or ten hours of travel over the "Michigan Central" brings the traveler to Detroit, and if he leaves Chicago on Saturday morning, he must needs put up at the Biddle House and spend the Sabbath in the most pleasant of Western cities. Detroit is clean, exceedingly, with regular and well shaded streets, and fronts upon the blue and placid river which conducts the waters of the great lakes from St. Clair into Lake Erie. Sabbath morning came and with it Sabbath privileges. The first Methodist Church is pewed, and has a choir and melodeon—well filled at the hour, and a sermon rather closely read from a young and talented preacher. In the evening at three 3 o'clock we meet again, and enjoy a quiet and impressive celebration of the Lord's Supper. A day of sweet repose, calm, bright and gracious. Monday morning we cross the river and take the Great Western Railroad through Queen Victoria's dominions to Niagara Falls. She track is wide guage, well laid, and our progress on it is smooth and rapid. It is more under-ground than our American roads, and all the crossings are either above or below, so that collision from this cause is impossible. The country for the most part is rough and sterile; the villages have an English affectation about them, and the people at the stations have an unmistakable cockney swing.

The train reaches the Suspension Bridge after sunset, and our transit is made in unsatisfactory twilight. Your friend, Dr. K. and myself, stayed on the platform, anxiously awaiting the first view. After what has been said and written for a hundred years, and after the world's suffrage has accorded Niagara the first place amongst the wonders of nature, it is impossible to approach the first view without emotion. We tremble lest the introduction shall overpower, and then are fearful lest it shall fall below excited and extravagant expectation. Either of these alternatives were obviated to some extent by the twilight, and by the very partial view which the bridge affords. The effect was unexpectedly passive and tranquil. There were no interjective heart-throbs, no breathless awe, nothing overwhelming. Every thing, the river beneath us, and the falls of which we had but a side-face glimpse, were less grand—they were smaller than we expected. Tupper did not think Niagara sublime, and said so. For the first time I began to think well of Tupper, who would be heterodox that he might be true. But with this sense of disappointment, there was a consciousness of illusion, and a conviction that the first impression was deceptive. And so it turned out that the deep and latent conviction was true, and that the first impression upon the senses was false. Like the chef d'œuvre of painting and sculpture, this great work of God must be studied in all lights and views, and in connection with many accessory features. The idea of magnitude is derived from comparison and analysis.—As these processes proceed the magnitude increases, and the more closely the details and minute objects are eliminated and inspected, and then thrown back into the general view, the more wonderful are the proportions of the whole.

A stranger is struck with the points of difference between descriptions he has seen and read, and the scenes as he sees them himself. Descriptive writers and artists, in their word and pencil pictures, give accurate expression of lions, elephants, and landscapes, and we are surprised when we see the originals, at their truthful delineations. But with Niagara it is all the other way. The traveler feels that he has never had any adequate and accurate idea at all. The half has neither been described nor painted, and it never will be. The following features had escaped my attention: First, the outline of the falls and their relative position; instead of making a curve, or semi-circle, the extremes of which are opposite, the trend of rock and the direct line of the comb of water extreds diagonally across, far up and down the river, so that the falls present a nearly front face to the Canada shore. From that side we look them in the face and obtain the only coup d'œil that embraces Goat Island and the falls on either side. From the lower limb on the American side, and standing on Prospect Hill, the observer looks directly up the river, and has in his eye a profile view, the side face only. Goat Island is the second feature of which I had no right conception. The pictures are mostly profiles, and this island, like people's noses in such cases, is higher and sharper, and not relatively as broad as it really is. The front face gives it proportions better, and causes it to fill one-third of the entire span. Its area is greater, not a mere foot-hold for goats, but broad, covered with magnificent forest trees, and of ample dimensions for the site of a city. In the next place the greater breadth above the falls and the rapids had escaped my attention. It is more like a lake than river, converging like the mouth of a bay and becoming a river proper not till it tumbles over the precipice. The rapids, to my mind, dispute with the falls for the palm of sublimity. From the calm deep lake the waters commence their mad race, and for miles above they come in giant strides to the final and fearful leap. Nothing on paper can convey an adequate idea of them. Like a troop of horse rushing to the charge, they come in gallop; with manes of foam and tread of thunder they come. The foremost waves are baffled and broken by the rocks and islands, but with conscious invincibility they deploy to right and left, reform below and in massive grandeur hurl themselves into the smoking abyss. It is impossible not to feel that these waves are animated, and the illusion clothes them with life and individuality when they disappear in the depths; and then again when they come out of the spray and creamy foam, and flow lazily away, as if stunned by the shock or subdued by the terrible experience of their recent revel.

Of course we cross over to Goat Island and have a stroll through its woods, climb the tower which stands upon the brink of the horse-shoe fall, go down Biddles' Stairs and look into the Cave of the Winds, get wet with mist and weary of climbing. At the base of the rocks we wander in close proximity to the thundering deluge; little impromptu rainbows bend out from the foot-path, not arching over, but around us like hoops; while every tint and form of beauty play in the mist and dance and glow and sparkle in the sheets of falling water. And what heights are behind and above! We stand on a mossy rock down at the water's edge and look amazed at the cliffs which cap the eminence and the shelving masses which hang over our heads.

Niagara by moonlight would startle the dullest prose into poetry. Not for our accommodation, but because it was the right time of the month, the moon shone on us and chanced the scene by her charms. Goat Island is quiet now. Only a few are moving among the trees, or standing like spectre sentinels on the points of interest. The moon beams mingle with the shade and roar of Niagara is terrible at such a give wild solemnity to the scene. The time, and its sullen awful voice speaks of eternity and of God. The ground trembles beneath its weight, and the leaves sparkle like aspen in the breeze less air. In the mists which rise slowly and heavily in the night atmosphere are lunar bows, sometimes in perfect arches, at other times broken into fragments, or turning on their axes and changing the plaine from arch to circle. They looked like the ethereal drapery and flitting forms of the spirit world; almost colorless and almost eluding the sharpest eye, it was not unnatural to think that these bows indicated the presence of disembodied spirits.

At set of sun, as the twilight began we put on tarpaulin hoods and coats, and are rowed through mist and wave directly across to the Canada side.—From thence a mile farther, to Table Rock, we proceed by land. Divested of our usual apparel and clothed in submarine style, we descend to the foot of Table Rock, more than one hundred and fifty feet of stairs, and tread the narrow foot-path which leads under the falls and to Tormination Rock. Here the roar and crash is deafening and the spray is blinding and suffocating. Besides having the sublimest shower-bath in the world, the adventurer obtains the only full conception of Niagara's power. This, unlike all others, is not a superficial view, for we stand under and behind it and are overwhelmed. The weight and volume of water is more justly estimated, and the height of fall is more truly measured. Ascending and resting from the fatigue of our adventure, we drive to the Clifton House and witness the finest of all our sight-seeing. The moon rises directly over Goat Island and gradually bathes rocks, trees and water in light. We see the falls in all their breadth and majesty, and the rapids have put on brazen helmets. The eye passes from point to point, and it is with difficulty that the attention can pause and fix itself upon any one of them. But I will not be so presumptious as to aim at description.

While at Niagara we visit the celebrated battle-field of Lundy's Lane. It is two miles from the Suspension Bridge, and in the heart of a populous and well cultivated county. There are two towers erected on the battle-ground from which the view is wide and charming. Our guide, the man of the tower, was in the battle, and by our leave fought it over again. Whether in the battle or not, his account is historically correct. There is a quiet burial place near the tower in which some of the officers who fell are interred. Where the greatest slaughter was, and where scores are buried, corn and wheat are growing luxuriantly. All is peace now. The din of battle, the marshaling of armed men, and the groans of wounded and dying have given place to peace. The dead sleep well, and war has left no trace of its bloody march. In the distance to the South-East the spires of Buffalo are perceptible, to the North-East Brock's Monument lifts its head from Queenstown heights, and to the North-West the surface of Ontario glistens in the evening sun. Nearer and yet distant, the falls, the villages, the river, the islands and Lake Erie are spread out as if at our feet. This is a suitable place for the traveler to complete his study of Niagara, and one where your correspondent, for the present, leaves the readers of the Advocate.

The Passing Cloud.

"O my God, my soul is cast down within me." Psalms, 42; 6.

It is a frequent danger with young Christians, in the early stages of their experience, to trust too much to their frames and feelings of mind—to think they are safe when they are happy, and to fear that they are unsafe when unhappy. And this is a temptation that may peculiarly beset them when, withdrawn from the bracing employments of active life, they are compelled to "feed on thoughts" in the chamber of sickness, and lie passive beneath the shadows or the gleams which fleet over the inner man. Yet most true it is, that spiritual depression is a matter not of groundless imagination, but of sad experience; that there are seasons when those "who fear the Lord walk in darkness and have no light;" that there are times often and suddenly clouding unusual felicity of soul, when the Lord hideth his face and we are troubled; and when, with the Psalmist, we are compelled to confess, "O my God, my soul is cast down within me." Yet, may we not take comfort from our very griefs? Does the world know anything of sorrow from the lidings of of God's countenance, from the strugglings of inward corruption? Nay, they have not experienced spiritual sunshine; how should they mourn the want of it? They have not known spiritual peace; how should they be disquieted for the lack of it? Every believer has found in the Psalms the utterance of his own fears and anxieties, breathings and cries. Take courage, fellow-soldier; it is no mean proof that thou art in the King's army, when the experience of those who have fought and fallen in his cause expresses thine own, and every watch-word they used just suits thy case. And consider this lamentation, with which you so deeply sympathize a little more closely, and it will go hard but that you may wring from it unexpected consolation. "O my God," mourns David, "my soul is cast down within me." What means this cry? Question it rigidly; be not content with a first impression; and when pressed for an answer, it will reply, "Be of good cheer." "O my gracious sovereign," exclaims the favored subject, "I am anxious about my prospects." "O my dear father," laments the fostered child, "who will support me, tend me, love me?"—"O my brother," cries the beloved friend, "to whom shall I look for sympathy?" Is there not a strange contradiction here? Does not the first clause of the complaint abundantly satisfy the despouding close? Muse on this, depressed Christian, it applies to you.

EFFICACY OF PRAYER.—There was once a colored woman who used to sit in one corner of the gallery on the Sabbath, and single out some young man, as he came in the door, and pray for him till she saw him come forward to join himself to the church. Then she dropped him and singled out another, and prayed for him in like manner till she witnessed a similar result. Then she dropped him and took a third, and so on, till at the end of twenty years she had seen twenty young men join themselves to the Lord in a perpetual covenant—young men with whom she had no personal acquaintance whatever. This fact was disclosed to her pastor on her death-bed.

MAKING TRACKS.

Mr. Editor: The excessively warm weather has not prevented me in the usual amount of travel, but it has delayed the appearance of the written history of the same. For who can write when sweat from every pore threatens to fall from the ends of your fingers? Friday the 6th June found me en route for the Western portion of our Conference. Hamburg a small village in Perry county, was about to enjoy a Quarterly Meeting, and being pressed by Bro. Starr, I tarried one night; a shower in the evening made some mud which prevented the attendance of some who sometimes go to night meetings. The crowd was small. The contributions promised and paid amounted to four dollars and fifty cents. Can any one tell, why it is, that so few of the paying members of the church attend worship at night, and bad weather, while the praying ones are almost sure to be there? Passing on next day through and beyond Greensboro, Sabbath the 8th I met Brother Linfield and his congregation at Flatwoods. The collection amounted to eighty one dollars. Twenty of this, however, was sent by a brother, who could not attend the meeting. It will be a pleasant time to be the Lord's collector when the church has such men by the thousand, who when they cannot go, will send. I have met some old and valued friends, and would have been pleased to linger, but the word was onward, so after dining with Bro. W. A. Battle and his good wife, (both of whom I joined into the church, baptizing the latter in 1849, in the city of Tuscaloosa,) I passed over to Eutaw—Night appointment, very sultry the paying members not on hand. The contribution twenty two dollars. Next day, dined with Bro. Willis, who gave me five, and I passed on to Forkland, but a storm of wind and rain just before night defeated me entirely. I was sorry, for there is much wealth thereabouts, but the Tract cause is none the richer thereby, unless the brethren will press a few twenties, tens and fives, upon Brothers Powers and Moody to bring up to Conference. Tuesday night in Sumpterville, small crowd, the collection nineteen dollars, the preacher gave five of that. Wednesday night, called on the good people of Gainsville, found two singing school in full blast in town. Five dollars and a few cents tells the measure of success in that place. The pastor Bro. Crymes, seemed to hate it much as all the ministers do, when these failures occur, but what can they do to remedy the evil, but mourn the worldliness of the times, and lift up once in awhile the voice of warning. I wonder if I had all the money paid out by church members in our bounds, in the last twelve months, for shows, circuses, and needless pleasure trips, if the society would not release the agent for the next five years!—Journeying on, I tarried all night with a Bro. Smith, who gave me five, and Friday evening I reached Macon, Miss. This was my home some years ago.—Trooping remembrances came upon me. Here I buried my father and one of the lambs of our own household flock. They rest, and as I gazed upon their graves may be for the last time the thought came that it would not be long till I should rest also. Saturday I rode six miles, met two persons and got nothing. Sunday the 15th the congregation in Macon responded to my appeal to the amount of something over one hundred dollars. This was liberal, and a great compliment to either the goodness of the cause, or my powers as a beggar, for one of the brethren who has not a stingy bone in him, assured me in the morning that in view of all demands upon them, if I got twenty five I might consider it well done. My next point was De Kalb, Kemper county, Miss. The rain again defeated us—the same the next day at Pleasant Ridge, but I collected privately from three or four friends sixteen dollars.—As I am now about to leave Mississippi, allow me to say, that it is doubtless a great state, and many great and good people in it, but the road workers must have an easy time of it, for judging from appearances, those I passed over have not had a blessing for many years. Thursday night I lodged with a good brother who gave me three dollars and seventy cents. From thence I rolled on to Livingston, Ala. Friday night, singing school again, Bro. Newman begged me off from making the attempt to collect promising to do it for me the Sabbath following. His success I have not learned. Sunday 22d, Belmont, a small village in Smapter county was the scene of my morning labors, there were clouds, and thunderings, and finally rain.—The congregation not large, the collection thirty five dollars. At night, in Demopolis, collection some forty two dollars. The P. E. and the stationed preacher gave each five.—Monday, dined with Bro. Manning at Prairieville, who gave me five dollars.

Yours Truly, F. H. FERGUSON.

Channing says: "It is too true, and a sad truth, that religious books are pre-eminently dull. Without wishing to say the same of lecturers, it is too true that their efforts abound in technicalities to a repulsive extent. It is one thing to be a profound scholar, and another and a greater to be able to popularize profound subjects and enlist the feelings and sympathies of the multitude therein."

A TEST.—An American vessel was once boarded by a Malay merchant in the India seas, and almost the first question was if he had any good books or tracts to dispose of. "Why do you want them, you cannot read them?" asked the captain. "True," said the Malay, "but I have a use for them. If one of your people, or an Englishman comes to trade with me, I give him a tract and watch what he does with it. If he reads it soberly, and treats it with respect, I take it he is honest and will not cheat me; if he throws it down with an oath, I'll have nothing more to do with him, for he can't be trusted."

GOOD ADVICE.—"Lady Holland was always lamenting she had nothing to do; that she did not know what to be at or how to employ her time. "I recommended her," said the poet Rogers, "something new—to try and do a little good." Once fairly engaged in that business, one will never have to complain of nothing to do. It is a great cure-all to laziness or listlessness.

SLANDER.—Against slander there is no defence. Hell can not boast so foul a fiend, nor man deplore so foul a foe. It stabs with a smile. It is a pestilence walking in darkness, spreading contagion far and wide, which the most wary traveler can not avoid. It is the heart-searching dagger of the assassin. It is the poisoned arrow whose wound is incurable. It is as futal as the sting of the most deadly asp; murder is its employment, innocence its prey, and ruin its sport.

No minister likes to see a person in his congregation asleep. He cannot avoid the unpleasant reflection that to such a one his sermon is lost. But there is another thing which is even more unpleasant and annoying than this, it is to see persons whispering while he is preaching. We candidly confess that we would rather see ten persons asleep than two whispering. There may be times when it is almost impossible for a person to keep awake, but for whispering there can be no apology.

A Western editor, copying a story about a drowning man who had a wonderful memory of every event of his life, advises some of his subscribers to practise bathing in deep water.

The truth as it is in Jesus, whilst in one view of it, so profound that the highest archangel's intellect may be lost in the contemplation of its mysterious depths, is yet, in another, so simple that the lisping babe at a mother's knee may learn its meaning.—[Caird.

The proud have no friends in prosperity; for then they know nobody; and none in adversity; for then no one knows them.

Many a brilliant reputation resembles a pageant—showy and unsubstantial, attracting the acclamations of the crowd, and forgotten as soon as it has passed.

A REASON FOR RAMBLING.—Mr. Whitefield was accused of rambling in his discourse, by one of his hearers, to which he replied. "If you will wander to the devil I must ramble after you."

MR. LOCKE'S OPINIONS.—A short time before his death, Mr. Locke being asked what was the surest way for a young man to obtain a true knowledge of the Christian religion replied, "Let him study the Holy Scriptures, especially the New Testament; therein are contained the words of eternal life."

People who take out, and do not put in, soon find the bottom.

ONE WEEK LATER FROM EUROPE.

ARRIVAL OF THE INDIAN AND ARABIA.

By the arrival of the steamship Indian at Quebec on the 27th, and the Arabia at Halifax on the 28th ult., we are enabled to present the following summary of foreign news to our readers:

Great Britain.

In the House of Commons Lord John Russell made his anxiously looked for motion of enquiry, demanding to be informed what course the British Government proposed to adopt in reference to the suggestion of the Congress of Paris respecting the affairs of Italy.

Lord Palmerston replied that it was not expedient to make known the intention of the Government.

Mr. D'Israeli and others spoke on the subject, when the motion was negatived.

The Government of Honduras has prepared a memorial to the European powers inviting them to guarantee the right of transit from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

The Duke of Cambridge has been appointed commander-in-chief of the army, and Lord Palmerston decorated with the vacant garter.

The Decimal Coin Committee will not report during the present session of Parliament.

Secretary Labouchere states that the Government has advices from the Cape of Good Hope to the 1st of May, and that the home government had sent out troops to prevent an apprehended Caffre rebellion.

On the 16th inst., the Queen reviewed 14,000 Crimean troops at Aldershott Camp.

The Queen has granted five years exclusive privilege to Messrs. Lord, Hindson & Henshaw, of Liverpool, to sell guano on three islands off the coast of Arabia, recently ceded by the Imaum of Muscat.

The Liverpool papers state that the difficulties which have for some time surrounded the relations between Great Britain and the United States are in a fair way of adjustment, and it is understood that great assistance has been rendered by William Brown, M. P., in the discussions between Mr. Dallas and Lord Palmerston, which it is confidently believed will prevent a rupture between the two countries.

France.

Nothing can exceed the quiet of the political world at this moment in Paris, and the journals only reflect the general dullness.

General Pelissier was expected to arrive at Marseilles between the 15th and 25th instant. A banquet will be given him.

The Journal du Pays says, that in political saloons in London there is a talk of the abdication of King Otho in favor of Prince Adalbert, of Bavaria, who, in that case, would go through all the religious formalities necessary to the accomplishment of such an event.

Letters from Athens also speak of the rumor, but they add, that the Queen of Greece is strongly opposed to her husband's designs.

We give these reports with all reserve.

The Moniteur publishes a list of British soldiers decorated in the Legion of Honor.

Holland and Germany.

There is no intelligence of any importance from these countries.

Spain.

A formidable insurrection has broken out in Spain. The embroglio began by the opposition compelling Espartero and the Ministry to resign, and the appointment of a new Ministry, composed of O'Donnell as Minister of War; Dean, Foreign Affairs; Cantero, Finance; Rossas, Interior; L. L. Uzdage, Justice; Allando, Public Works. Espartero was supposed to have left Madrid, at least it was not known where he was. Immediately on the new appointments, insurrection broke out in Madrid, and the National Guards assisted the citizens in erecting barricades, and being attacked by the troops, fighting ensued in the streets for twenty-four hours, with much loss on both sides. On Tuesday, the 15th, at 4 o'clock, P. M., a suspension of hostilities was agreed to until 5 o'clock, to allow the insurgents to make their submission. At the expiration of this time fighting seems to have been resumed, for most of the accounts received are Government dispatches, dated at Madrid at 4 o'clock, P. M., on the 16th, stating that the insurrection was suppressed, excepting a few bandits—one under the command of Pacheta, the celebrated bull-fighter.

The Queen presented herself to the combatants, and a Government dispatch says she was respectfully received, but others say that the insurgents proclaimed a republic. Gen. Infante, President of the Cortes, commands the insurrection. Gen. O'Donnell has appointed a new municipality to Madrid, and has declared all Spain in a state of siege. He is acting with vigor, but Paris dispatches say that the French Government do not believe in his remaining master of the situation. O'Donnell, by decree, dissolved the National Guard, and calls on them to deliver up their arms. Gen. Infante assembled the minority of the Cortes, but O'Donnell caused them to be dispersed. Another account says that the Queen appeared on the Plaza in tears, and besought the combatants to cease, and that it was owing to her intercession the armistice of one hour was agreed to. Gen. O'Donnell's dispatch says, he hopes to suppress the insurrection; from which it is surmised that the revolt is yet unquelled. The revolt had broken out at Saragossa, and all Aragon was more or less in insurrection. Fears were entertained of an outbreak at Barcelona.

The Paris correspondent of the Daily News, of Thursday evening, says: "I learn from a reliable source that the French Government has already given orders for the formation of an army of observation on the Spanish frontier."

MADRID, July 16.—At 8 o'clock this morning the insurrection was overcome on all points. Gen. Concha obtained possession of the Toledo Gate. As some of the insurgents still held the Plaza Sevaldo, measures were taken to attack them. The various bodies of the lower orders were commanded by Pacheta. At 10 o'clock, the last remains of the insurgents dispersed throughout the city were annihilated. Pacheta was killed. Twelve pieces of artillery were in possession of the insurgents at the Plaza Beltaldo. The Queen visited the wounded. Happily the victims were not numerous. The Government has been admirably supported. The disarming of the National Guard is actively carried on, and the thoroughfare is re-established. All is tranquil in the province, except at Saragossa.

MADRID, July 19.—To-day order is completely re-established at Madrid. The Queen, accompanied by the King and by Marshal O'Donnell, has just reviewed the garrison troops, and the people received their Majesties and the Marshal with enthusiasm. To-morrow will take place the solemn burial of soldiers who have died gloriously in defending the throne and order. The twelve pieces of cannon posted on the Plaza Sevalde were captured by the Royal troops after several hours fighting.

The Londoe Daily News publishes the following dispatch from its Paris correspondent, dated Madrid, July 17:

The insurrection here has been suppressed, after a combat which lasted thirty hours, and was fiercely obstinate. The dead are very numerous. The National Guards have been disarmed.

Forty Deputies, now present at Madrid, having associated themselves to convene the Cortes in a legal manner, were dispersed by the troops. The whereabouts of Espartero is still unknown, but he is still, probably, at Saragossa or at Loesono. It is asserted that the insurrection has been victorious at Saragossa, and that the garrison there goes along with the people.

By news from Barcelona, it would appear that Catalonia is also in a state of insurrection.

The Paris correspondent of the London Times, under date Thursday evening, says that a private telegraphic dispatch announces that not only Saragossa but all Aragon is in insurrection. All Aragon, is supposed, means the large towns that have followed in the wake of Saragossa, with their respective garrisons.

Austria.

The Emperor has granted an extensive amnesty, on the birth of his second daughter.

The English Peninsular and Oriental Steamship Company, have put on a weekly steamer to Ibrailn, in opposition to the Austrian Lloyds.

Italy.

Naples letters say that the signs of revolt are more frequent, and even the army is discontented. Austria has sent another note of remonstrance, and a letter in Horsen Hall says if not attended to, a Special Ambassador will be sent to demand a categorical guarantee. Austria is supposed to be acting by the instigation of France.

The Sardinian Government demands a credit of a million to erect fortifications. The demand is urgent.

Russia.

The following diplomatic appointments are rumored as certain: M. Kleboleff to Paris, Chreplowitch to London, and Boatenieff, Constantinople.

The Emperor Nicholas is reported to have left a memoir of his reign to be published five years hence.

The coronation of the Czar is officially fixed for the 37st of August.

The Grand Duke Michael is betrothed to the youngest sister of the Regent of Baden.

The crops in Southern Russia looked well. English steamers keep up communication between Constantinople and Odessa.

Greece.

The Russian Government has sent the disbanded soldiers of the Greek Legion back to Greece, but the Greek Government refuses to receive them, and calls upon the British for assistance to refuse them.

Turkey.

The Hospodars of Moldavia and Wallachia are finitely removed and replaced by Lieut. Princes as Lieut. of Wallachia and the Bayard, Theodore Balsh, Lieut. of Moldavia.

Marshal Pelissier had landed at Constantinople.

The Crimea.

The Crimea was entirely evacuated, except that the allied ships were carrying away hewn stone and iron from Sebastopol.

Gen. Luders had issued orders to respect the graves of the Allies.

Egypt, etc.

The Government has reduced the charge for the transit of Australian gold via Egypt, to ¼ per cent. on the value.

Arabia and the Holy Cities continue disturbed. The last sheriff sent from Constantinople was refused reception.

India.

Bombay dates are to June 10th. The monsoon had commenced and rain was abundant.

The Indian Government meditate a new 5 per cent loan.

Another insurrection of Santals, from famine, is apprehended.

The insurrectionary movements in Northern Madras are suppressed.

Cholera raged at Patna.

The export of cotton is active.

China.

Hong-Kong papers of May 22d report the Chinese insurrection over, around Canton, but broken out again at Honan, and the insurgents held most of the cities. On the whole, affairs were not improved.

Freights at Hong-Kong for the United States, $16 for ten and $30 for silks. At Canton, May 8th, $74 was asked, but no freights were offering. For California $11 was asked.

Australia.

Melbourne dates are to April 25. The political news was unimportant. Trade more active. Gold had declined to 76s. 6d. The mails had been landed in Melbourne, by the ship Royal Charter, in 59 days from Liverpool.

Later from Texas.

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMSHIP LOUISIANA.

By the arrival of the steamship Louisiana on Saturday morning from Indianola and Galveston, we have Galveston papers to the 21st ult., and papers from all parts of the State as late as dec.

We learn from the Galveston News, of the 31st ult., that the Legislature has given the Galveston, Houston and Henderson Railroad Company, further time to complete the first section of twenty-five miles than was allowed by their charter.

We clip from the same paper the following items:

The bill creating a Court of Claims, which passed the Senate last winter, has passed the House with an immaterial amendment, which has been concurred in by the House, this day, so that the bill now only awaits the Governor's approval. This bill provides that a single Commissioner, with the assistance of a clerk, shall decide upon all claims against the State, of whatever kind, either for land or money, originating under the laws of the Republic.

The signs of rain fall very frequently, and we are forced to conclude that our citizens are rather wicked, or their prayers for copious showers are of little avail. Taking the sand for a rain-gauge, we have not had half an inch of the fluid these two months, and barely enough to wash from the leaves their coats of dust.

However, it is raining again, as we write, but whether it will result in a copious shower or merely a drizzle, "this deponent sayeth not."

Business on the wharves has been active for a few days, there being six vessels discharging cargoes from the North. Most of these vessels will have to return in ballast, as there is but little freight in port for shipment.

A locomotive—the James H. Stevens—was landed yesterday from the ship Fannie, from New York. It is for the Tap Rond, connecting Houston with the road from Harrisburg to Richmond.

The pilot boat Steller, while anchored in the roads, outside the bar, yesterday, was struck by lightning and her foremast shivered. Fortunately no one was hurt; the crew only were aboard and were all below asleep. The boat sustained no injury.

"A bill to encourage the improvement and navigation of the rivers and other navigable waters in Texas by making appropriations for the same," has passed both Houses of the Legislature, and only awaits the signature of the Governor to become a law. It is spoken of by the Texas papers as being a very important and popular measure.

A bill has been introduced in the Lower House of the State Legislature making an appropriation for the support of Texans wishing to emigrate to Kansas. It is intended as a movement to checkmate the Northern emigrant aid societies.

The San Antonio Texan, of the 24th ult., has the following in regard to weather and crops:

We have had rain in many parts of Western Texas of late, but owing to the drought there will hardly be half a crop.

The Victoria Advocate, of the 26th, says:

During the week this vicinity has been favored with occasional showers, which have cooled the atmosphere, and revived such vegetation as was not too far gone for recovery. Cotton is doing well. The worm that threatened it some time ago having entirely disappeared.

LATE COIN.—The Brazos (Waco) Statesman of the 25th inst. states that several farmers have commenced planting corn since the late rains, with expectation that they will be able to raise enough for bread.

Relating to Indian operations, the Austin State Times has the following:

About two months since, Col. Lee, with a command of cavalry and ten or fifteen Indians commanded by Capt. Jim Shaw, made an expedition against the Northern Comanches. The operations were directed to those Indians to be found on the upper Colorado and its tributaries. Several days ago, Capt. Shaw and the Indians returned to Fort Belknap. He reports an encounter with the Comanches. Two warriors were killed in the fight, and a squaw made prisoner. They also took nine horses from the red rascals. It was a small party returning from Mexico.

Dissatisfaction is said to exist among the Indians in regard to the division of the horses. They went out at their own request, and did good service. Jim Shaw has been robbed frequently, and he wanted to get revenge.

The steamship Mexico, Capt. Lawless, arrived last night, bringing Galveston papers of last Saturday, the 2d inst.

From the News we clip the following:

HEALTH, WEATHER, ETC.—We publish to-day the list of interments for the month of July. The deaths have been fourteen infants and nine adults—total, twenty-three. The health of our city never was better at this season, and we have every reason to believe that it will continue so throughout the fall. We had a good rain yesterday, which was greatly needed, and we are now enjoying cool breezes, with the thermometer ledicating a moderate temperature, for the months of August.

MORE NEW COTTON.—We learn that R. & D. G. Mills received to-day, by way of the Harrisburg Railroad, seven bales of new cotton, from the plantation of Judge M. S. Stith, Wharton county, and sold the same at twelve cents. The cotton is of excellent quality, long staple, fine quality and well ginned, and, but for some large leaf, would class good middling.

LOUISIANA ITEMS.—A gentleman writing to the Baton Rouge Comet, from the parish of Avoyelles, says:

The crops of cotton and corn in this section are very fine. We understand the caterpillar or army-worm has made its appearance in our sister parish of Rapides, on many plantations, and we may therefore expect to have our crops cut very short."

The Plaquemine Gazette, of the 2d, says:

Within the past few days we have been blessed with several fine growing showers, which has somewhat revived the appearance of the drooping plants in our gardens. Yet the earth is dry, and crops are suffering for the want of rain.

Our parish is remarkably healthy; we hear of no sickness in Iberville.

TERMS—$2 00 per annum, in advance.

NEW ORLEANS:

SATURDAY, AUGUST 9, 1856.

HEALTH.—The patient of yellow fever, reported last week as in the Hospital, died. Besides that case we have heard of none in the city. We have received the official returns of the Board of Health of the interments last week, by which it appears they were but 91.—This is the best report we have ever known at this season of the year in New Orleans.

N. O. MEDICAL AND SURGICAL JOURNAL.—This able journal is published bi-monthly, each number containing 144 pages of reading matter, edited by Dr. B. Dowler. The July number is before us. It seems to us that in this line of literature the South has attained to her just equality and independence. The terms are $5 per annum. We advise all our readers who are interested in medical science, practice or jurisprudence not to be without it.

A WHOLESOME LAW.—Our City Council have done themselves the credit and their constituents the justice, to suppress the "utterance" of certain vile sheets—as the "Police Gazette" and "Life in Boston." These papers have their contributors here who deal in defamation upon the fairest characters. The newsboys were selling them briskly on the streets. But our Mayor and his police have promptly done away the nuisance. A newsboy, Mike Kelly, was detected selling one of the forbidden sheets last week—arrested, brought before Recorder Stith, and in default of paying $50 fine, sent to the Work-House for two months.

NEW ORLEANS SCHOOL OF MEDICINE.—This institution starts with prudent energy and under a talented faculty.—To the old Medical College it will give, what it needs—the benefit of competition that will quicken its paces. The place and facilities can afford two. Is it wise that our future Doctors should go out of our latitude to learn to cure our diseases? Here they are taught by physicians, skilful and practiced, who have not learned at second hand the nature, symptoms and treatment of the ills our climate is heir to. We are glad to learn that young men are heeding these suggestions and increased accommodations are being prepared for them. This School of Medicine has advantages over the other in location and equal hospital privileges. See the Advertisement.

NEW GERMAN CHURCH.—"The German Presbyterian Church," on First street, between Annunciation and Laurel street, Fourth District, will be dedicated on Sabbath next, at 4 o'clock.—We are obliged to Rev. Mr. Munzonmaire, the pastor, for an invitation to attend and take part in the services. This is a neat frame house, with steeple, 70 by 32 feet, and with grounds cost $6,000. A membership of 104 has been gathered. We are glad to see our Presbyterian friends entering this field so promisingly.

HEAVY LOSS.—Rev. Francis Walker, pastor of New Wakefield Circuit, near Mobile, had his house and furniture consumed by fire, two months since. Not even wearing apparel was saved. He estimates the entire loss at $4,000.

QUARANTINE.—The commercial interests of our city seem to prevail over any precautions against disease. The steamship Star of the West was stopped at quarantine last week, direct from Havana. She ran the quarantine. The Board of Health had the Captain arrested and held to bonds in $10,000. Last year in a similar defiance, the Captain got off. The custodians of New York health are more careful. On the 2d inst. a steamer from Havana arrived there and was put in quarantine for thirty days.

WATER MELONS.—Our friends Messrs. Walker 95 Magazine street, have ameliorated the hot season, with delicious fruits. They deserve well of the country. They have our thanks for special favors. Their melons are the best of the season.

Industry is the lever that prized a world out of chaos; duty the power that moves it.

It is one of the worst of errors, that there is any other path of safety besides that of duty.

Upon the sweetest rose grows upon the sharpest prickle, so hard labor brings forth the sweetest profits.

CENTENARY COLLEGE COMMENCEMENT.

A friend who had the pleasure of attending, makes a glowing report to us of the occasion 29th and 30th ult. Having received no letter as yet, we make up a brief account from other sources.

Rev. C. K. Marshall preached the Commencement sermon in the absence of Dr. Keener Sunday 11 A. M., and also at night. Mr. Sigur who was expected to deliver the address to the Literary Societies—was not present—much to the disappointment of a vast and brilliant assembly. In the absence of Mr. King, R. Nugent, Esq., delivered the address to the Alumni, which is well spoken of.

Wednesday, the ceremony of laying the corner stone of the centre building of the College began about 12 o'clock, in the presence of a large concourse. The brick work of this handsome building has already been completed up to the second story. A place was, however, reserved for the corner stone, in the southwest corner, some twenty feet from the foundation, where the beautiful block, with its treasures enclosed, now stands out conspicuously.

This ceremony was conducted in the best style by Rev. C. K. Marshall. His speech was written and occupied an hour and a quarter in delivery. We hope to see it published. But a higher honor than making a fine speech awaited him—it was doing a fine thing.—The subscription following amounted to between twenty three and twenty four thousand dollars. Before the day closed the amount was carried up to twenty five thousand dollars. This with the sum in hand, will build and furnish.

The music from the students' amateur band is said to have been excellent, as it always is.

The following graduated, a class of nineteen: T. W. Compton, (first honor,) Miss.; T. P. Clinton, (first honor,) La.; J. C. Stafford, Miss.; J. W. Barrow, Ala.; J. S. Billiu, La.; K. A. Cross, La.; T. P. Caillouet, La.; R. S. Dunn, A. F. Drake, Miss.; James M. Fly, Miss.; Jas. E. Gibson, Mo.; J. C. Griffith, La.; W. H. Knight, La.; G. S. Mayo, La.; Robert J. Perkins, La.; Chas. M. Pilcher, La.; Wm. G. Richardson, La.; J. H. Brigham, La.; J. B. Tarlton, La.

REV MR. SPURGEON.

An American house is about getting up a volume of sermons with likeness of this young Divine, who has risen on foggy London as a new light. He is said to posses the experience of Wesley, the spirituality of Leighton, and the quaintness of Rowland Hill. A letter writer says:

"During the year 1855, Mr. Spurgeon's Sunday morning sermon has been regularly published in the course of the succeeding week for one penny, or two cents, and some of them have reached as high a sale as 60,000 copies. These fifty-three sermons are now republished in a neat volume, with a preface by Mr. Spurgeon, in which he states that he has documentary evidence that every sermon has received the seal of God's blessing, in having been employed as an instrument in the conversion of sinners to Christ. The volume is certain to have an immense sale; and from its circulation in every corner of the world where the English language is read, there is every reason to hope and believe that it will be productive of great good."

We shall see. Much humbug has been made on this preacher and his popularity. Our own countrymen are about turning a penny on it. Just before bringing out a work of this sort the plan is to get a clever scribbler to prepare the way—to get the public ears erect. The American house, (Blakeman, Sheldon & Potter, or some such firm,) sent us a long letter signed BETA, with request that we publish it, and a copy of the forthcoming work was to be sent as a consideration!

Tribute of Respect.

The following course was pursued by the third quarterly meeting held for Cedar Creek Circuit, Alabama Conference, at Warrenton, 19th July, 1856, on the announcement of the death of Rev. James P Robbins. The Conference appointed a committe of one to draw up suitable resolutions expressive of their feelings, whereupon the following was adopted:

Resolved, 1st, That we recognize the hand of God in the mysterious providence of removing our beloved Brother Robbins to his reward, and that we bow submissively to the Divine will.

Resolved, 2d, That in the death of Rev. J. P. Robbins the church has lost a faithful and useful local preacher, and community an amiable citizen.

Resolved, 3d. That we deeply sympathise with his bereaved family in the loss of a loving companion and father.

Resolved, 4th, That we most heartily commend the bereaved family to the sympathies of community and protection of Almighty God for succor.

Resolved, 5th, That the above be published in the New Orleans Christian Advocate, and that a copy be sent to the family.

DUGALD CARMICHAEL, P. E.

E. HEARN, Sec'y.

THE SECRET OF MATRIMONIAL HAPPINESS.—Preserve the privacies of your house, marriage state, heart, from father, mother, sister, brother, aunt and all the world. You two, with God's help, build up your own quiet world; every third or fourth one whom you draw into it with you, will form a party and stand between you two. That should never be. Promise this to each other. Renew the vow at each temptation. You will find your account in it. Your souls will grow, as it were, together, and at last they will become as one. Ah, if many a young pair had on their wedding day known this secret, how many marriages were happier than alas they are!

THE UNITY OF THE MORAL LAW.

If one swallow does not make a summer, one sin makes a sinner. There is a hard and bold statement of St. James, in his own style, that many minds revolt at—

For whosoever shall keep the whole Law, and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all.—St. James, ii, 10.

Yet, though so much in advance of the mind's first view, this doctrine, upon examination, will square with justice and equity. Every one has his pick of sin. It would take a long time and a long course to run down every item of the law—to break every commandment in detail. Few, if any, have ever had the opportunity. Fewer the inclination, for some sins are a check upon others. Like poisonous serpents they bite, and devour each other."

On this point how men deceive themselves and are filled with their own ways! The miser shudders with pious horror at the spendthrift. Each

Compounds for sins he is inclined to,
By damning those he has no mind to.

One transgression is a test of obedience. The will of God falls before that of the creature. The breach is made—the line broken over—all authority defied. Nothing is now safe.

A writer in the Christian Witness carries out an illustrating line of thought:

"The position of the apostle is this, that the violation of the whole law is comprehended in the transgression of one of its precepts. This is true, because the law is one and indivisible. There are many precepts, but one law, of which the precepts are the members. They bear the same relation to the law, that the limbs do to the body. When one attacks my arm or my head with a murderous weapon, it is not merely my arm or my head that is wounded, it is myself that suffers. In like manner, when one of its precepts is violated, it is the law which is wounded in one of its members. And as man has a centre from which his limbs radiate and his life-blood flows, so the law has a centre, from which every precept issues; and it is from thence that every precept derives its life, its power and its obligation. Remove the central power from the human frame and the extremities must perish, because that central power pervades its every part, dispensing life and health and beauty. And you may often as surely destroy all these, by assailing the extremities as by aiming a blow at the very issues of life; as the puncture of a pin has often caused death. From the body of laws which regulate our moral nature, remove the central power, and the essence of all, and you have divested its individual precepts of all obligation. They are dead to us. The essence, the feature of obligation, as one and indivisible, pervades every precept; and which ever precept I violate, however minute and trifling in appearance, I do violence to that one element which pervades the whole law, just as the life-blood circulates not only through the arteries, but the smallest capillary veins of the body.

But, in the parallel which we have drawn between the law and the human body, it is necessary to make a distinction, which is, altogether, in favor of the position taken by the apostle in the passage now under consideration. If the invisible and mysterious centre of each human being suffers when one of its members is assailed, its life is not always, at least immediately menaced. It is otherwise with the moral law; violate one precept and you threaten the very existence of law. For all precepts, as obligatory, are equal. All the commandments are equally absolute. In the human frame some parts are more noble than others. But in the law all parts are equally noble, and consequently, every violation of its precepts is an aim at its very life.

Practically and in all cases, one sin is not followed by the same consequences as another sin. In this is a great difference. But in the principle, none. In this point of view, one transgression is equal to any other transgression, and in each, generally, to a greater or less degree, the elemental principle of sin realizes itself in the actual consequences".

BIBLICAL DEPARTMENT IN MCKENDREE COLLEGE.—Rev. H. Sears, agent of McKendree College, in a letter published in the Central Advocate, says: "A Biblical department was established in McKendree College by the Board of Trustees, at its annual meeting in 1856. This was done in accordance with the advice of the General Conference of our church, recommending that such a department should be established in all our institutions of learning. This is really the theological department of the institution. It was established for the benefit of those who are led by the spirit to the work of the ministry; and at this time the department demands our most serious attention. It has hitherto been but a nominal affair, but we cherish an ardent hope of its soon becoming a reality in its practical operations. We need a professor in this department of great practical experience, of sound integrity, and ardent zeal for the cause of God and the church. The chair should be filled with such a man as soon as possible."

RECOGNITION IN HEAVEN.—I must confess, as the experience of my own soul, that the expectation of loving my friends in heaven principally kindles my love to them while on earth. If I thought I should never know them, and consequently never love them after this life is ended, I should number them with temporal things; and love them as such; but I now delightfully converse with my pious friends, in a firm persuasion that I shall converse with them forever; and I take comfort in those that are dead or absent, believing that I shall shortly meet them in heaven, and love them with a heavenly love. —[Baxter.

THE LOVE OF STRIFE.—I never loved those salamanders that are never well but when they are in the fire of contention. I would rather suffer a thousand wrongs than offer one. I would rather suffer a hundred than inflict one. I will suffer many ere I will complain of one, and endeavor to right it by contending. I have ever found that to strive with my superior is furious; with my equal doubtful; with my inferior sordid and base; without any, full of quietness.—[Bishop Hall.

LETTER FROM BATON ROUGE.

BATON ROUGE, July 26, 1856.

Editor Advocate: You will no doubt be gratified to learn that at the close of Mrs. Read's school exercises on last evening her old friends and patrons were ready to award another chaplet wreath to a brow now decked with many. The late session has been one of the most prosperous. The examination commenced on Tuesday and closed on Friday evening with a happily arranged exhibition. Of the proficiency of the young ladies and Misses I might say much, were not my own daughters of the number; but of the accomplished principal, Mrs. R. and her able assistants I can say in behalf of the parents and guardians present "we desire no change."

It will gratify you as her friend to know that almost every portion of Louisiana has a representative in her school, and even Mississippi is well represented. I was happy to find that all or nearly so of the last session will return in October and others will come with them; thus promising the next to be the most numerously attended of any of her successful sessions.

At the conclusion of the exercises His Excellency Gov. Wickliffe made a few felicitous remarks which did him as much honor as the compliments he paid the young ladies and their teachers were merited. A PATRON.

CORRESPONDENCE.

EUTAW, Alabama, July, 24, 1856.

It has been my pleasure to attend a meeting in Eutaw, (Rev. W. Shapard, pastor,) which has just closed, after two week's protracting. Many promising youths shared the blessings of grace. About 16 professed to be converted to God, the greater portion of whom are children of praying parents.

J. M. PATTON.

HAVANA CIRCUIT, Alabama Conference, July 31.

We have enjoyed a gracious revival at each of two protracted meetings held recently on this circuit. We had not many accessions. Several conversions and the most earnest desire and labor for perfect love that I ever witnessed; our members are really moved upon this subject, and it is to be hoped that God will grant to many the enjoyment of this priceless blessing. A revival going down this deep is absolutely needed among us, and from the signs of the times and the recent gracious experiences obtained, we are led to work for just such a one. It cannot come too soon or extend too far. Perhaps practical and continuous preaching seconded by definite and earnest prayer upon this subject may do much to accelerate its advent. We are likewise doing our best to furnish a comfortable parsonage for our successor in which we have reasonable success. W. E. M. LINFIELD.

PERRYVILLE CIRCUIT, ALA. CONFERENCE.—Rev. E. T. Nabors writes July 29: "We have had good meetings, seven conversions and as many additions to the church. At another appointment we raised a subscription large enough to build a church. At our last quarterly meeting, Brother R., a local preacher, proposed to be one of fourteen to give ten dollars each to raise the missionary assessment of this circuit. I have no doubt of his success."

Anecdote of John Sunday.

"I understand," said John Sunday, the converted Indian chief, to a congregation which he was called to address at Plymouth, England, in the year 1837, "that many of you are disappointed because I have not brought my Indian dress with me. Perhaps, if I had it on, you would be afraid of me. Do you wish to know how I dressed when I was a pagan Indian? I will tell you. My face was covered with red paint. I stuck feathers in my hair. I wore a blanket and leggins. I had silver ornaments on my breast, a rifle on my shoulder, a tomahawk and scalping-knife in my belt. That was my dress then. Now, do you wish to know why I wear it no longer? You will find the cause in 2 Cor. 5: 17: 'Therefore, if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature; old things are passed away; behold, all things are become new."—When I became a Christian, feathers and paint "passed away." I gave my silver ornaments to the mission cause. Scalping knife "done away." "That my tomahawk now," said he, holding up at the same time, a copy of the Ten Commandments in the Ojibwa language.—"Blanket done away." "Behold," he exclaimed, in a manner in which simplicity and dignity of character were combined, "behold, all things are become new!"

READING AND THINKING.—Always have a book within your reach, which you may catch up at odd minutes. Resolve to edge in a little reading every day, if it is but a single sentence. If you can give fifteen minutes a day it will be felt at the end of the year. Thoughts take up no room. When they are right they afford one pleasure, with which one may travel or labor without any trouble or incumbrance.

Letter from a Fayre Ladye.

(Our Kate Greenwood has gone a slight-seeing again in the old country. She writes, as only one of her sex can, of the sights seen. Says the preface, "I have tried to make you see Warwick Castle, and this detailed account of its wonders and associations has given me much pleasure." We charge the railroads, coaches and all conveyances to be careful of their passenger, and the "lions" to show themselves. She has a fine eye and a graphic pen.—ED.)

WARWICK, July 6, 1856.

My Dear ——: On our way to London we have stopped here to have a passing peep if no more at Kenilworth, Warwick Castle and Stratford-on-Avon. We left Manchester at 9 o'clock this morning, and are now safe in this old-fashioned tower, looking out upon wonders that are in themselves a sight to me.—Old red-tiled roofs, very small-sized and small-paned windows, and the fronts often very picturesque from the oak beams black with age, showing plainly on the surface, and the plaster with which the interior niches are filled are discolored too from the same cause. In some of them it is all quite fresh in and above, owing to their having been covered for many years by an outside coat of plaster, from a change in fashion probably, and this has only lately been removed. Others are yet to go through the same process.

Our road led us over the tops of the houses in old Coventry—the identical Coventry of "Peeping Tom" fame, and I could not help fancying that one of the cozy houses we then saw was the one from which he tried to see the "goode and fayre ladye" Godiva as she rode by with only her long swinging hair for a covering, but of course this must be mere imagination. I wish I could remember from what it was that the Lady Godiva relieved the poor of the town by this heavy trial, but I only know it was a very high tax on some necessary.

Warwick Castle, from which we have just returned, is a noble building, and to me was intensely interesting as being the first that I had ever seen. The entrance is through a thick and massive gate-way, having in the olden times borne the portcullis, (this means a sliding iron barred gate, which drops from above) and two strong oak gates besides. One of the portcullises is now shut every evening, but of the other there is no remnant excepting the grooves and holes where the doors once went in.

Coming through this the eye first is greeted by a long sweeping road, cut through rock on the outside and earth on the inner side. Long streamers of ivy droop down, and wild flowers grow in all possible crevices. In many places the ivy has covered the wall entirely, and then it is most refreshing—after the gleam and heat outside to be walking through this wall of dark stirring green, with fine trees arching over head, and in the far prospective the gray towers of the Castle rising up. There were two excavations in the rock sufficiently large to shield a dozen men from sight, and here it was that part of the garrison used to lie concealed to repel any of the enemy who, in time of seige might force their way through the gates and portcullises. A little sally port too, was to be seen close by—this little gate in the wall did not seem large enough for helmeted and mailed warriors to go through, as many of them have done.

Another gate-way, similarly defended, admitted us to the court yard of the castle, but before entering we paused to admire the deep ditch which was the old moat, but now it is covered by a fine smooth turf and many trees have grown up the sides—the drawbridge too is gone and is now replaced by a solid earth walk. So here again the imagination was called in play to fill the deep ditch with water and replace the bridge and portcullises. A beautifully kept lawn now occupies the centre of the old court, and just opposite the gateway the dim old tops of the first built portion show themselves, but a dense grove of trees hides most of them from our view, and they are not shown to visitors. Its date moreover is A. D. 915, and it may possibly be older. At it I gazed with most interest, for it is certain that some of its stones had echoed to the heavy tread of the King-maker Warwick.

This tower I have told you is opposite to the gate-way. On the right hand as you enter is the wall, with an opening to the present garden, and on the left the castle proper, part of it quite fresh-looking from recent repairs, but still a great part of it is left as it used to be in architecture. On each side of the gateway at the two angles of the wall which forms the square, are two fine towers. The left-hand one which we were not shown, is about 800 years old at least, the other bears the date of 1180 or 81. Into this tower we went and found it very stony and exceedingly strong, having seven stories in it, in all space enough for a thousand men. The first flight of old worn spiral stairs led us to a little door-way, through which we emerged into a walk on top of the wall itself, and sheltered on the outside by a thinner piece of wall, into which are long slits for especial and queer little holes for the cross-bows and arrows, and here in the time of siege, the garrison often amounting to one or two thousand men, would stand, and each pick off their man in almost perfect safety to themselves. While others in the tower above could see through similar spy-holes the whole land around, and order the cross-bowmen from point to point as most needed. But now tall trees are lacing their branches in and out of the openings, and the ambitious ivy has covered some of them entirely. So thick are these walls that two of us could walk abreast with ease, and our guide said that in some parts of the wall below little chambers were to be seen. On the top of the tower we were shown the now leaded trough through which the besieged used to pour melted lead upon the besiegers when the latter were sapping the walls. How barbarous those days were. But we are not much better I fear.

From the top of this tower we had a wide extended view over the pleasant wooded and undulated country, and we could trace the course of the Avon for miles by its fringe of basket-willow trees. The entrance to the mansion is very modern, but we were happily disappointed by finding ourselves in the old Baronial Hall, with its fine carved oak ceiling lofty and grand, and the good hospitable fire-place of the olden times—a fire-place inside which two or three chairs might be placed without danger or discomfort to either fire or sitter. Then too there were the large-hearted and broad-seated windows, looking out upon a fine sweep of lawn and park in the distance, and just beneath the gentle Avon, with its soft murmur and idle flow—excepting where a little dam gave it life enough to turn the wheel of a little mill once used to grind corn for the garrison, but now rented out for £300 a year—how each castle had to be its own provider and helper in those times. Why, even the stables were once inside the very walls, and for all these various uses the ground enclosed was none too small.

Just above the mill the crumbling moss-covered arches of an old bridge stand, adding much to the picture, while from the lower angle of the wall the graceful, rich and honored Cedar of Lebanon shows some of its branches as they reach out from their allotted space.

There are two or three of these trees now growing here, the seed of which was brought by the Crusaders from the Holy Land, and they seem to flourish as well as if they were favored by their and brightened by the sun of their proper home. At sight of them I stopped to dream of the loved and holy land, and in fancy saw the groves of Lebanon and heard the murmuring of the wind among their sweet-tongued leaves, and saw the Crusaders (whom I cannot help loving) both on their rejoicing onward journey and on their more mournful homeward one, and I felt glad that some were enthusiastic enough, after every disappointment, to wish for a memorial of the Land of our Saviour in their far-off homes. Honor to the Warrior who planted these seeds!

The floor of this hall or large audience-chamber was paved with tile—not the ancient but in imitation of it—and on the wall were hung suits of armour, shields, halberds, cross-bows, spikes and many other old weapons. Conspicuous among them was the helmet of Oliver Cromwell, and the silver sword-hilt of "The Pretender." Of the authentically life these relics there seemed no doubt.

The next room was a 'drawing-room, hung with fine pictures and filled with rare tables and cabinets, some inlaid with precious stones, some of most rare and beautiful wood, etc. Specimens of the beautiful enamelled Limoges China were lying all about—fine antique busts and curiosities without number, at all of which we only glanced, although they were worthy of a close inspection, as our time was limited.

The next room was wainscotted with red cedar, had a slightly aromatic smell and the furniture was all in harmony and color. Here we again saw rare and beautiful things, and here were hanging fine portraits of Elizabeth, the ugly old Queen; Mary Queen of Scotts, Henry VIII, a fat stolid looking man; Charles II, Cromwell, etc., etc.; all of them by the best painters of their day, but all having a queer look in their old, inconvenient State dress. Ignatius Loyola hung against the wall and seemed little like the crafty man that he was. The Earl of Leicester, of Amy Robsant memory, Earl of Essex, Sir Walter Raleigh and many others were here, many of them painted by Vandyke and Holbien, etc.

The next room was the the green drawing-room, so called from its walls being painted a fine pale green, with panels and gilt mouldings. In the panels were set more exquisite paintings, the frame forming the moulding and the effect was very fine. Some of these paintings were by Teniers, Murillo, Hogarth, etc.

The next one was Queene Anne's State bed-chamber, with all its old furniture preserved, threadbare and faded though it be, even to the satin bed-quilt, with its stitchings of blue and red flowers. Above the head-board was the coronet in blue satin, and against the walls hung the tapestry of the day, (from Flanders I think this came,) and in its dimmed colors and drooping stitches we could trace out most awkward and stiff plants and impassible windows and doors. It represented the grandeur of Versailles when made in 1640, but I doubt its ever being anything more than an unnatural caricature. The next and last room in this range was a pretty little boudoir, having a pleasant and wide prospect beyond and beneath the cedars of Lebanon in all their fullness, and the Avon gliding close by.

Out of this we stepped at the side into a long low arched way, built in the thickness of the wall and running the whole length of the building, 333 feet; and at this end finished off by a magnificent portrait of Charles I, on a white horse, by Vandyke. A very strong light fell on it, and at a distance the horse seemed to be stepping out of the canvass. It was wonderfully beautiful.

We next went into another little room built out of the thickness of the wall and filled with mere beautiful rare things, and from this we went into the chapel, which has a very fine window in it given by Queen Elizabeth to the Earl of Essex, but beyond its age was not remarkable. In a little vestry close by was the tomb of Guy the famous Warwick, and his identical helmet and sword now almost gone with age and rust. From here we went next into the dining room, and slid silently over the polished oak floor and saw another fine chimney, but the great show here was a carved side-board, made of an oak lately cut down at Kenilworth, which was marked by the Earl of Leicester 1575, showing its great age. The carving of this is very beautiful, representing scenes in the novel of Kenilworth. We had only seen now about one-half of the lower floor, but "the family were down" no more could be shewn, but this was no matter of regret, as up-stairs all is modernized.

I have forgotten more than I have told you, but this is enough of Warwick Castle. I had hoped to tell you of Kenilworth in this letter, but must wait till my next.

Yours, K.

Count Them.

Count what? Why count the mercies which have been quietly falling in your path through every period of your history. Down they come every morning and every evening, as angel messengers from the Father of lights, to tell of your best friend in heaven. Have you lived these years, wasting mercies, treading them beneath your feet, and consuming them every day, and never yet realized from whence they came? If you have, Heaven pity you.

You have murmured under affliction; but who has heard you rejoice over blessings? Do you ask what are the mercies? Ask the sunbeam, the rain-drop, the star or queen of night. What is life but a mercy? What is health, strength, friendship, social life, the gospel of Christ, divine worship? Had they the power of speech, each would say, "I am a mercy." Perhaps you never regarded them as such. If not you have been a dull student of nature or revelation.

What is the propriety of stopping to play with a thorn bush when you may just as well pluck sweet flowers, and eat pleasant fruits?

But we have seen enough of men to know that they have a morbid appetite for thorns. If they have lost a friend they will murmur at the loss, if God has given them a score of new ones.—And somehow, everything assumes a value when it is gone, which man would not acknowledge when he had it in his possession, unless, indeed, some one wished to purchase it.

Happy is he who looks at the bright side of life, of providence, and of revelation. Who avoids thorns, and thickets, and sloughs, until his Christian growth is such that if he cannot improve them, he may pass among them without injury. Count mercies before you complain of afflictions.

THE SOUL.—What makes the soul so valuable? Its immortality. When endless years have run on, the soul will exist—amazing thought! Will it never tire? Will the etherial pulsating existence never grow heavy? Will the wheel never be broken at the cistern? Never! The soul will endure as long as thee throne of God! As heaven's wall shall gather no mosses from age, neither will the soul become decrepid; and in all the multitudes of heaven not one shall be seen leaning upon his staff for very age! What! like the angels, never grow old! to be always the same through dateless centuries as when first created! But cannot she annihilate herself? Oh no! the soul's literal suicide cannot be performed!—No Judas Iscariot can find a sulphurous tree, or jutting wall, which, in Gehenna's cavern or burning fields, may afford him suspension between life and death.—The soul must live on.—[Rev. Dr. Andrews.

THE HOLY SPIRIT.—The Spirit is not had upon courtesy of man's will, but by the outpouring of God's grace. The chief way of the working of the Spirit is to work faith and love, and to build up Christians by faith and love.—[Lightfoot.

Fitness for Heaven Necessary.

We need not only a title, but a fitness for heaven. A title to a property must be a perfect one, or it is no title at all. If there be a flaw in it, the right of inheritance is gone. But the fitness for the enjoyment of a property may be more or less complete. Two men may have a title to equal properties; but one may be much more fitted for the enjoyment of it from his previous habits, dispositions and information than the other. It is so with the future rest. We have all of us, if Christians, the equal pass-word; that pass-word which needs but to be mentioned, and we range the whole universe; we become free of heaven and earth in "Christ and him crucified." But each of us may have different degrees of fitness, from the convert of yesterday to the martyr that seals by his blood the principles that he has been taught by grace. But more or less such fitness is required. In fitness for it we shall grow. Our daily life shall be a constant struggle to put on all excellency, and to be made meek by the spirit of God for the kingdom of heaven. These two are inseparable. —[Ex.

MUSIC.—Let taste and skill in this beautiful art be spread among us, and every family will have a new resource. Home will gather a new attraction.—Social intercourse will be more cheerful, and an innocent public amusement will be furnished to the community. Public amusements, bringing multitudes together to kindle with one emotion, to share the same innocent joy, have a humanizing influence; and among these bonds of society perhaps no one produces so much unmixed good as music. What a fulness of enjoyment has our Creator placed within our reach, by surrounding us with an atmosphere which may be shaped into sweet sounds! And yet this goodness is almost lost upon us, through want of culture of the organ by which this provision is to be enjoyed.—[Dr. Channing.

A religion without benevolence, is like a stove without fire. It warms no one, feeds no one—is useless. Yet there is too much of this religion at the present day. Too many churches are cook stoves; but there is no fire in them, no pots or kettles boiling food for the hungry; no loaf nor pudding in the oven. They are cold as ice. Formality, fashion, and ceremonies have taken the place of food, of humanity, and christian love.

DESULTORY STUDY.—A person enamored by the charms of universal knowledge, and flying from the pursuit of one science to another, is like a child gathering shells on the sea-shore. He first loads himself indiscriminately with as many as he can carry; but when tempted by others of a gayer appearance, he throws the former away; thus he continues throwing and rejecting, till, fatigued and bewildered in his choice, he throws all away, and returns home without a single shell. Such is reading and study, without some definite object.

"The best means of keeping near to God is the closet. Here the battle is won or lost."—[Payson.

"In this valley of sorrow and strife,
Prayer shall rise with my earliest breath;
It shall mix in the business of life,
And soften the struggles of death."
[Cunningham.

"As the heart panteth after the water brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O God. When shall I come and appear before God."—[David.

A solemn and beautiful thought is expressed in the following:

It is related of a well-known divine, who, when living, was called "The Prince of Divines," that when on his death-bed, he was dictating words to an amanuensis who had written—

"I am still in the land of the living."

"Stop!" said the dying man, "correct that. Say—

"I am yet in the land of the dying, but hope soon to be in the land of the living."

Beautiful thought! This is a dying world.

We need not quit the world and abandon its busy pursuits, in order to live nearer to God:

We need not bid for cloistered cell,
Our neighbor and our work farewell;
The trivial round, the common task,
May furnish all we ought to ask—
Room to deny ourselves, a road
To bring us daily nearer God.

INFANT BAPTISM.—Since the world began, God never formed a covenant with his people, which did not include their posterity; the covenant with the Hebrews at Mount Sinai included the "little ones;" and by the express declaration of God, the covenant of grace between God and believers includes their children."—[Dr. Hodge, of Princeton.

MARRIAGES.

On the 10th of July, by Rev. B. R. Thompson, at the residence of Dr. T. H. Davidson, Mr. ERASTUS WINBURN, of Limestone county, to Miss LAURA CHARLEYELLA GATES, of Robertson county, Texas,

On the 13th July, at the house of Wm. Henderson, Esq., Union Parish, La., by Rev. A. Cargill, Mr. JOHN C. HARBER and Miss REBECCA STEWART.

There were present in good health to witness the ceremony and bless the bride, her grand father and grand mother, her great grand father and great grand mother.

DEATHS.

Died—Of scarlet fever, near Gainstown, La., on the 26th June, GEORGE W. WILSON, son of Dr. A. and MARTHA B. WILSON, aged four years, five months and six days.

Died—In Montevallo, Alabama, on the 9th May, 1856, Mrs. MARY SUMNER, born 10th January, 1830.

She had been a professor of religion for many years, and a member of the Methodist Church. Though reasoning in her religious profession, she displayed remarkable decision and firmness of Christian principle. Before embracing religion she was fond of worldly, fashionable pleasure, but this on her profession of religion was promptly renounced. Her worldly sufferings were borne with patience; and when questioned as to her religious condition, she said her faith in Christ was firm, and that she was resigned to the will of her Heavenly Father.

T. C. WEIR.

Died—At Greenwood Seminary, Tenn., on the 17th July, ELLEN, daughter of Telemachus and Mary Ann Hutchins, (both deceased,) in the 15th year of her age.

She was born July 30th, 1840, in Claiborne county, Miss. In 1854 she entered Greenwood Female Seminary of which institution she was in attendance at the time of her death. She early sought religion and adorned its profession. Since 1854 she was a member of the church. Her last words were, "I'm not afraid to die."

SPECIAL NOTICES.

Notice—There will be a Camp Meeting at Amity Camp Ground, (Methodist,) nine miles East of Sharon, Madison county, commencing on Thursday before the third Sabbath in August. Preachers and people geoerally are invited.

Notice.—There will be a Camp Meeting held on Swan Lake Circuit, about eight miles from Lake Providence, La., near Swan Lake, commencing August 22d, and embracing the fourth Sabbath of August. A general invitation is extended to brethren both of the ministry and laity.

N. A. CRAVENS, P. E.
WM. G. McGAUGHY, P. C.

Notice.—The Suggsville Camp Meeting, Clarke City, Ala., will commence on Friday, September 19.

W. K. NORTON, Pastor.

A pamphlet has been published in England by Mr Anderson, the well known machinist, on the management of steam boilers, in which he says that the pressure within in a boiler is much greater than is generally supposed. With a pressure of fifty pounds per square inch, it amounts to 7,200 pounds on every part of the surface exposed to the steam, amounting frequently to many thousand tons in the boiler, thus accounting for the enormous havoc made by explosions. The joints are weaker than the solid parts; good solid plates will withstand from 56,000 to 60 000 pounds per square inch of sectional area; the joints will give way at about 34,000 pounds, which shows the importance of seeing that the rivets and other fastenings are always in sound condition. Mr. Anderson divides explosions into four classes, namely: from want of strength, deficiency of water, heating of plates, and a variety of other circumstances.

It is a curious fact in science that glass resists the action of all acids except the fluoric; it loses nothing in weight by use or age; it is more capable than all other substances of receiving the highest degree of polish; if melted several times over and properly cooled in the furnace, receiving a polish which almost rivals the diamond in brilliancy. It is capable of receiving the richest colors produced from gold or other metallic coloring, and will retain the original brilliancy of hue for ages. Medals, too, imbedded in glass, can be made to retain forever their original purity and appearance.

A destructive fire occurred in Boston on the afternoon of the 29th ult. By falling walls Chas. A. Warren, a fireman, was killed, and three others badly injured. The bodies of a man, woman, and five children were taken from the ruins so defaced as to defy recognition. It is rumored that several other lives have been lost. Property to the amount of $75,000 was destroyed.

Blue Mass, and all other mineral compounds in the shape of pills, have been laid aside to make room for a better production from the vegetable kingdom in the shape of Hostetter's Stomach Bitters. These celebrated Bitters are entirely vegetable, and thus combination of such a nature as to guarantee perfect safety in being used by both young and old, male and female—the latter in particular have received the most salutary benefit from the use of these Bitters, when all other treatment from the most skillful hands have failed to restore them from a state of debility to perfect health. Magnetic Telegraph.

FOUR DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMSHIP ATLANTIC.

COTTON UNCHANGED.

BREADSTUFFS FIRM.

BY THE NATIONAL LINE.

NEW YORK, August 4.—The United States mail steamship Atlantic, from Liverpool on the afternoon of the 23d of July, has arrived at this port.

Commercial Intelligence.

The news from the United States had no effect upon the Cotton market, which remained firm at previous rates. The sales for the three days previous to the departure of the steamer amounted to ——, of which speculators took 2000 bales and exporters 4500. The quotations are unchanged.

BREADSTUFFS.—The market is firm with moderate business doing. Flour shows a slight advance on higher grades, and a decline on the lower.

WHEAT.—Better grades are 1d. higher. Lower grades have declined 2d.

CORN.—Transactions are small, but prices are firm. The stormy weather had unsettled the market.

PROVISIONS.—In Beef and Pork there was a better demand though prices were unchanged.

Consols for money were quoted at 93¾.

General News.

Our accounts of the Spanish insurrection are conflicting. It is said to be suppressed in Madrid, but has its head quarters at Saragossa, where Espartero's partisans have secured the garrison.

It is reported that the Cortes had assembled and legally proclaimed liberty and a Constitution.

Louis Napoleon has ordered troops to the frontiers of Spain.

NEW YORK, Aug. 5.—Advices from Florence mention negotiations between the governments of Rome, Naples, Florence and Modena, for the purpose of forming a confederation under the patronage of Austria.

The London Times intimates that the proposition of Mr. Dallas in regard to Central America is likely to prove satisfactory.

Failures in England.

John Mann, cotton broker, Liverpool; Joseph Wright & Co., spinners, Stockport; Low & Lane, Manchester; Dexter & Co., and four other houses have failed. Their liabilities are large and assets small.

Kentucky State Election.

LOUISVILLE, Aug. 4.—The whole American ticket is elected by 2100 majority.

In Glasgow, Frankfort and Shelbyville the American ticket has received majorities varylag from 100 to 120.

In Lexington, all the American ticket is elected except Marshall—the Democratic candidate having 80 majority.

Missouri Election.

ST. LOUIS, Aug. 5.—The result of the election in this city is as follows: For Governor—Benton, 5,836; Polk, (Democrat) 2,577; Ewing, (American) 1,461. For Congress—Blair, (Bentonite) 5,538; Reynolds, (Democrat) 1,974. Blair's majority over Kennett (American) will reach about 500. The prospect is that the whole Benton ticket is elected in the county.

Kansas Affairs.

CHICAGO, Aug. 4.—Advices from Leavenworth to the 30th ult., state that Lane's company had not entered the Territory. General Smith threatens to proclaim martial law if he attempts to enter. The Territorial authorities have commenced to levy taxes and trouble is anticipated in consequence, as both parties refuse to pay.

Domestic Markets.

NEW YORK, Aug. 4.—Flour buoyant. Southern $8 to $9; Wheat 5 cents higher; Southern White $1 85½. Mixed Corn 66c.; Whisky 37½; Sterling Exchange 9½.

CINCINNATI, Aug. 4.—Flour $6 to $6 25; Whisky 25c.; Lard Oil 90c.

River Intelligence.

LOUISVILLE, Aug. 4.—There is 3½ feet in the river to Cincinnati; scarcely any water on the falls.

VICKSBURG, August 4.—The Lucy Robinson passed down at five and the Southern Belle at six o'clock this morning.

BUSINESS.—We cannot iterate or reiterate that business is dull for the season of the year, because there are transactions occurring almost every hour in the day. If they do not apply to one thing they do to another. There are transactions in cotton, though they may be very limited; there are operations in tobacco, either for large or small sums; there are sales of sugar and molasses, though they may be on the infinitesimal order, yet it does not show that the valuable association of gimlet rangers is extinct—far from it, its honorable members still cling to the hope, that the crop of sugar may reach 120,000 hhds. We hope so too, though if we were permitted to divulge all that is communicated to us, we should recommend that highly respectable body, which we have for months in and months out observed so industriously at work on the sugar landing of our city, to seek some other mode of making expenses. We admit that the recent favorable weather has inspired in some degree the hopes of the sugar planter; at the same time it must be taken into consideration the real obstacles of the season are to be encountered. However, our wishes, our hopes, in fact our prayers are for the developement of the resources of Louisiana.

The most interesting item of yesterday was the actual receipt of a bale of cotton, of this year's growth, being the first bale of the season—acknowledged as such—from the borders of the Mississippi. The present bale is from Carroll parish. We intimated that two bales before have been received. This surmise has not yet been removed, though why it should be attempted to conceal it is somewhat a mystery. But n'importe, we have only to remark that the first bale of cotton actually admitted, of the growth of 1856, as having been received via the Mississippi river, was from the plantation of Mr. Chambliss, of Carroll parish. Whether he is a Fillmore man or a Buchanan man we do not know. But there is no mistake, no doubt, no evasion on one head, that what he sends to market as the first bale of cotton is an unadulterated product of the soil. It may be native and it may not be; but our impressions at this moment are that Mr. Chambliss will say it is a native product, and if it commands twelve and a half cents per pound we will guarantee that Mr. Chambliss will say "all right."

There was no rain yesterday. The sun was tolerably warm between 11 A. M. and 2 P. M. The health of the city is in the highest degree of the most favorable character. While the weekly mortuary returns in Northern cities denote a large increase, the returns of this city denote a decrease, and within the scope of our memory we never, at this season of the year, recorded a more auspicious and favorable prospect for health, business and prosperity, than at the present moment.—[Crescent of Wednesday, 6th.

The French doctors have discovered, recently, by various experiments instituted by them, that ice is safer and better to use in surgical operations than chloroform. By the application of pounded ice and common salt to the diseased parts, thus causing numbness and insensibility, a surgeon lately succeeded in removing a tumor of considerable size, without causing the patient any pain, and occasioning very little loss of blood. If ice can thus be successfully substituted in the place of chloroform, in surgical operations, it will be of great value in saving patients from the risks involved in the use of chloroform.

TRINOS AT NORFOLK AND PORTSMOUTH, VA.—The two towns continue to enjoy excellent health. There is no appearance of any epidemic disease, but quarantine regulations are rigidly observed. New flour is selling in Norfolk at ten dollars per barrel. Capt. R. W. Baugh, formerly a midshipman in the United States Navy, and subsequently Sheriff of Norfolk county, died in Portsmouth on Sunday, the 27th ult. Isaac M. Bagley, a prominent citizen of the same town, died on the 26th ult. The Mayor of Norfolk has opened a complaint book.

Alvin C. Bradlee, the referee in the Forrest divorce case, made his report on the 24th ult. It provides for the payment of Mrs. Forrest's costs, and orders Mr. Forrest to give security for the payment of alimony, and affirms, in all respects, the judgment of the court.

AMERICAN SHIPPING.

Precise statistics concerning our early American shipping we have not at hand. They can be found in the volumes of the Massachusetts Historical Society—an institution that has contributed much towards collecting and preserving the important facts attendant upon the early growth and development of matters connected with our national infancy.

The first craft of any size launched in the "Province of Massachusetts," was a two-masted, naval rigged vessel, which, when fairly under way, plowed the waters so fleetly as to elicit from an admiring beholder the exclamation, "Goodness gracious! how she skunes!" and ever since, that style of craft has been called a schooner.

Advancing in their calling, the people of those States whose shores are washed by the Atlantic; whose fields are shaded by oaks as tough as any on Dodona; and their hill tops crowned with pines as beautiful as those of Mount Ida; have been building greater and still greater Alchemonts of the deep; and loading them with the products of our soil, cereals, manufactures and raw materials of every kind, for other nations, to whom nature has been more niggardly, to work up into articles of use and luxury.

The calling, like all callings when well improved, has been productive of profit and power; so that now, hardly two hundred years from when the pine tree flag was first unfurled, its starry successor circles the globe and flaunts in every breeze that sweeps under any constellation of either hemisphere. From the odd little craft that skunned along, we have increased our vessels until we have surpassed and excelled the maritime importance of nations that were old before we were young.

Statistics which demonstrate these facts are easily attainable. There is scarce an ocean disaster reported without the addenda, "passengers taken off by American ship ——;" or a wreck noted, unless accompanied with, "seen in lat. —, lon. —, by American ship ——." If there is a discovery made of new guano islands, in some terra incognita, by H. B. M. subjects, they no sooner land to raise the cross of St. George, than they see thirty or forty industrious Yankees loading the "Sally Ann, of Marblehead," on the opposite beach; and if a discovery ship is lost, exploring the North sea, it in all probability is found and towed back to civilization by some returning whaler, fitted out at Nantucket.

This spirit of daring and well conducted enterprise has had its natural conquests—for enterprise, like animals, grows from what it feeds upon, if the food be nutritious. It has been so with our commerce; until no star is too remote for a guide, no wind too strange for a motor, no waters too distant to be a support, nor no port so wild as not to be a haven to the peaceful cruisers of American commerce. Every branch of commerce, from that which is comprised within the "raging" canals, to that which circles the globe, is improved and increased.

The highways and byways of the world have been ransacked, and continue to be. When the voyages are long, and years must be spent in their successful prosecution; great clippers clothed with white wings of duck, from the mainsail to the sky-scrapers, and an endless continuity of jibs and every other conceivable cut of canvass that will save a puff of wind, depart to return only after a long future, when they shall have been tried by the wrath of Neptune and Eolus, and despite both have gathered up profits for their venturesome owners. It is this enterprise and this daring, founded on well understood laws, and conducted in accordance with sound theories and practice, that has made us the sovereigns of the seas.

The last official publication we have seen, placed American tonnage at five millions four hundred thousand tons! a great figure and surpassing that of England, whose commercial marine is stated at five million two hundred thousand tons—or two hundred thousand tons less than that of ours. If the average tonnage of the different vessels was rated at one thousand—ranging as they do from hundreds to thousands—we should have a fleet of five thousand four hundred vessels of a thousand tons each! If this tonnage is figured in clippers of two hundred tons each, and the vessels were placed on an equatorial line about the globe, each skipper might speak to the one before and the one behind him, around the globe, by raising his voice a little above the nautical pitch! This, we are aware, is an unusual way of computing naval supremacy, but for general comprehension, we submit that it is superior to either our own or the British styles of measurement. To follow it out, we might give the number of vessels and voyages and the tonnage of each vessel that would be necessary to transport Great Britain bodily into this zone—to make a solid highway from here to Nicaragua; how long a time it would require, and how many river and lake steamers we should be able to send down for the purpose of filling in the crevices. The figures are vast enough, however, in their outline, and require no additions to prove that our national maritime pride is well grounded.

OUR CITY.

We are seriously of opinion that the fly-away population made a great mistake this year in leaving the city, so far as purposes of comfort or recreation were concerned. We mean those who are now deriving fitful and often dangerous recreation at Northern cities and watering places—railroad smashes and steamboat burnings occasionally adding variety to the perpetual inconvenience and turmoil of traveling, and the welcomes at the havens of rest being smiling and sincere in strict mathematical proportion to the rig of the visitor and the quality of his trunks. There may be a certain amount of pleasure in spending the summer in such a manner, but we hardly think it compensates the trouble, risk and expense that it entails upon its devotees; and we are certain that the stay-at-homes are enjoying themselves far better than the fly-aways.

Our city has been, and is blessed at the present time, with a degree of health equal to that of the largest city in the Union, and superior to that of a great many. We have passed through our hottest weather, and are now enjoying the temperate sunshine, delicious breezes and balmy, beautiful nights, that are ever the accompaniment of mid-summer in this climate. Though the din of commerce has to some extent ceased, there is still considerable activity on the levee and in other marts of trade, and the business streets, during business hours, wear an aspect of life and activity that would scarcely be credited by those who annually migrate to the North, and derive their ideas of our summer appurtenances and pastimes from the croakers that have ever been the curse of our city. Building operations, the unerring index of a city's growth and prosperity, are visible in every quarter. Costly stores, elegant mansions, churches, and other public buildings, the rearing their clean, pretty heads on every side, and repairs and improvements are progressing extensively among buildings that one would think had no need of such attention.

The omnibusses are just as crowded, and the other vehicles about as numerous and noisy, and as apt to get locked in the narrow streets, as they were last spring. The ladies go a shopping as eagerly, and promenade as charmingly as ever. And the broad, shaded streets and public squares present each evening, save when a summer shower intervenes, pictures of life, beauty and joyousness, as rich as the eye of man could desire to feast upon.

NAVAL.—The Secretary of the Navy, it is said, has ordered Commodore Paulding, with the officers and crew of the frigate Potomac, now at the Brooklyn navy yard, to proceed to Philadelphia, to take command of the United States steam frigate Wabash, which has been made the flag ship of the Home squadron.

An effort is being made to construct a telegraph from Chattanooga to Knoxville, Tennessee.

The negro cook, George Wilson, who so brutally butchered the captain and mate of the schooner Eudora Imogene, on the 27th November last, suffered the severest penalty of the law on Friday, the 25th ult., in the jail-yard attached to the court house of White Plains, Westchester county, New York. The prisoner made no confession of his guilt, but on the contrary, maintained his innocence to the last.

There was an extensive fire in Williamsburg, on the 28th ult., caused by the explosion of a boiler used in the Excelsior Sugar Refinery. The fireman was badly scalded, and his life is despaired of.

Some stables in the rear of the refinery caught fire, and from thence the flames extended along the block, north and south, and before it was subdued, property to the extent of $50,000 was destroyed.

Thirty-Fourth Congress—First Session.

WASHINGTON, July 28.—Senate—The Senate refused, by a vote of 14 to 24, to order the engrossment of the bill appropriating $75,000 to test the practicability and usefulness of Richardson's Atmospheric Telegraph.

House—The House proceeded to act on the various amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to the Army Appropriation bill.

Mr. Barbour's amendment was read: "That Congress hereby disapproving of the code of alleged laws communicated, claiming to have been passed by the Territorial Legislature of Kansas, and disapproving of the manner in which the said alleged laws have been enforced by the authorities of the Territory, expressly declare that until said alleged laws shall be confirmed by the Senate and the House of Representatives as having been enacted in accordance with the organic law, by the people of Kansas, no part of the military forces of the United States shall be employed in their enforcement, nor shall any citizen of Kansas be required to act as the posse comitatus of any officer acting as marshal or sheriff of said Territory; and such laws are regarded as null and void."

The amendment was rejected—yeas 88, nays 89.

The House then concurred in Mr. Sherman's amendment "Provided that no part of the military force of the United States shall be employed to aid in the enforcement of the alleged laws of the Legislative assembly of Kansas convened at Shawnee Mission, until Congress shall declare whether the laws are valid or not, and passed by a Legislature chosen in conformity with present organic law. And until Congress shall so act, it shall be the duty of the President to use the military force of the United States to preserve the peace, suppress insurrection, repel invasion and protect the persons and property of citizens therein; and on the highway of Missouri and elsewhere against unlawful seizure and search; and that the President disarm the present militia, recall all the United States arms, and prevent armed men from going into the territory and disturb the public peace or enforce real or pretended laws."

The vote stood yeas 91, nays 86.

WASHINGTON, July 30.—Senate.—The Senate took up the bill to regulate the compensation of members of Congress.

Mr. Callamer proposed a substitute: "That they shall receive for their attendance at the sessions twenty-five per cent. additional to what they are now entitled to by law. The bill was referred to the Committee on Finance.

House.—The House discussed the bill providing for a settlement of the claims of officers of the Revolution and the widows and orphans of those who died in the service.

SCHOOL ACCIDENT.—The Vicksburg Whig, of the 30th ult., says:

We regret to learn that the dwelling-house of Capt. B. T. Edwards, about six miles east of this city, was blown down by the severe blow we had on Monday evening. Mr. Edwards was crushed beneath a falling chimney, and when taken out was found to have had one leg broken, besides being seriously bruised otherwise. The wonder is that he escaped with his life. Mr. Edwards had just added a second story to his house, which was covered in, and had only one coat weather-boarded. The result was that the whole mass was thrown down by the violence of the blow. Had the inhabitants of the house been closed up, it is probable that no damage would have been done, as the wind was not so violent as to blow down a house not so exposed.

HOMICIDE.—We learn from the Jimmy South, of the 24th inst., that Mr. Wm. Spence, tavern keeper at Pontotoc, killed Mr. Andrew Thompson on Sunday evening, the 20th, about an hour before sundown. The Coroner's jury agreed that it was justifiable homicide.

HEATED AN LEXINGTON.—The Advocate of the 30th ult., says:

We are happy to announce that the health of our town has improved a great deal in the last ten days. About two weeks ago there were sixty or seventy cases in town. There was scarcely a family in which there was not one member sick at least. Lexington has generally been a very healthy place. So much sickness can doubtless be attributed to the superabundance of all kinds of fruit.

The Court House in Port Gibson was struck by lightning on the 23d instant.

We understand, says the Natchez Free Trader of the 1st inst., that Dangerfield, the famous "war horse" of Gen. Quitman, was taken from his residence at Monmouth, about a month ago. Dangerfield is almost sacred property. He has gone through glorious service, and during the terrible fire at Monterey, he was shot from under Gen. Quitman. His renowned rider was unhurt, but he was left on the ground supposed to be mortally wounded. He recovered, however, and the General brought him home and gave him his liberty for life.

IMPORTANT DECISION.—The Jackson Flag, of the Union, of the 30th ult., reports the following:

In the High Court of Errors and Appeals, on Monday, a decision was rendered in the case of Green versus Weller, involving the question whether the act abolishing the separate Courts of Chancery was passed by the legislature according to the requirements of the Constitution. Judges Fisher and Handy (the majority of the court) held that the act was constitutionally passed, and that the amendments are now part of the supreme law of the State. Chief Justice Smith delivered an able and elaborate dissenting opinion. So the Superior and District Chancery Courts are abolished, and the Equity business transferred to the Circuit Courts.

The High Court adjourned on Monday evening until the regular fall term. The Judges have performed a vast amount of labor during the year, and well deserve a respite.

CROPS IN VIRGINIA.—The Richmond Whig, of the 30th ult., has the following under the above caption:

We continue to receive alarming accounts of the corn and tobacco crops in the greater portion of Eastern Virginia. The drought and the chinch bug are nearly co-extensive. A failure of the tobacco crop might be endured; though that would be a severe visitation under the burden of double taxes; but corn is the staff of life to man and beast in Old Virginia.

The following letter from Buckingham speaks for that region:

"JULY 26, 1856.—The crops are in an alarming state. There has been no rain, and the corn is in a dying condition, and the tobacco is either dead or dying. There can be no crop made of either without speedy and copious rains."

NOBLE CONDUCT IN A SLAVE.—The Huntsville (Ala.) Advocate, of the 24th ult., relates the following:

One day last week a son of Mr. Porter Bibb, (Porter,) went down the well; he was prostrated by carbonic acid gas in it. Baylor, (a favorite servant,) went down to save him; he put a rope round Porter's body, and felt himself overcome by the gas. Porter was drawn up and saved with great difficulty. Baylor was rescued as soon as possible, but sad to tell, animation could not be restored. He died to save his young master! The boy who brought Baylor up was also nearly overcome by the gas. It was not known that gas was in the well until Baylor went down and was prostrated by it.

The Huntsville (Ala.) Advocate of the 30th ult., says:

Flour is very scarce in town at this time. A good supply of a good article would find a ready sale. Corn meal is also scarce.

The crops are suffering greatly for the want of rain. No general rain has fallen for six week, and the weather has been hot, with dry winds. The corn crop is cut short at least one half. Cotton is also suffering. Vegetation generally is parching and drying up. Rain! oh, the rain! is the cry by all.

DEFINITION OF A "FAST" WOMAN.—The New York Mirror has a very sprightly correspondent at Newport who, under the signature of "Belle Britan," keeps them well posted in all that is going on. In a recent letter she gives the following definition, which is worthy of being pasted on the fly leaf of Webster unabridged:

By the way, I overheard a funny conversation last evening, between a gentleman and a lady who were promenading behind me, from which I learned the definition of a "fast woman." Two people were discussing the attractions of a young lady, who receives a good deal of attention here from the beaux—(such as we have)—when the gentleman remarked that he had not yet been able to discover the charms of the fair one in question. "O," said the lady, "she is fast, and that's what makes all the gentlemen like her." "But what does that mean?" inquired the gentleman a little roguishly. "Why," said the lady, "a fast woman is one that you can say anything to." I thought I should have dropped.

MISSISSIPPI CENTRAL AND TENNESSEE RAILROAD.—The Memphis Appeal, of the 26th ult., says:

We learn from Gen. Neely, of Bolivar, who is at present in our city, that about six miles of rails are now laid on the Mississippi Central and Tennessee Railroad, and the work is progressing at the rate of half a mile per day. This speed will take the road to Bullvar by the middle of September, when passengers and freight cars will be put on the track. The General has made arrangements with the steamer Ingomar to bring up the balance of the iron for the road.

A new method of laying down the T rail, by which it answers the same purpose of the continuous or endless rail, has been invented. The ends of the rail are matched or mortised, forming a compound joint, so that they slide into one another, forming a lock or brace, and making it equally as firm as any other part of the rail, and entirely preventing the ends from setting, which causes such a noise or chucking on the cars. It has been tested and said to work well. Mr. Hilliard, formerly a railroad man, is the inventor.

Explosion on the Steamer Empire State on Long Island Sound.

We condense the following account of the above-named disaster from the report in the New York Tribune, of the 28th ult:

For the particulars of this shocking affair we are indebted to Mr. Wm. W. Harding, one of the proprietors of the Pennsylvania Inquirer, who was a passenger on board, but fortunately escaped injury. The Empire State left Fall River for New York at 7½ o'clock, Saturday evening, with 225 passengers. She arrived at Newport at 8¼ o'clock, and left again in a quarter of an hour. Everything appears to have gone on as usual up to near 10 o'clock that night, save that it is said the boat was running at a very rapid speed, and it is further asserted that the smoke stack was red hot for some time previous to the explosion. At a quarter before 10 o'clock, when most of the passengers had retired for the night, a terrific explosion occurred, shaking the boat to her centre, and spreading consternation and dismay among her passengers. The shock of the explosion had hardly subsided before a dense volume of steam filled every part of the vessel.

The alarm among the passengers may be better conceived than described. Most of them having retired for the night, seized their life-preservers and rushed into the saloons in their night clothes. In a few seconds the saloons were filled with a dense body of steam, and the frantic passengers rushed wildly to and fro through the suffocating vapor, seeking to reach the open air. As it was impossible to see the way thither, they had to feel it out, stumbling against each other and over sofas and chairs at every step. Supposing, from the steam and smoke, that the boat was on fire, and unable from the darkness to see the true condition of things, for some time the passengers continued to blindly rush from one part of the boat to the other, giving vent to their fears in loud shouts and screams, and imprecations, that rendered the general confusion more appalling. Then came, loud above all the din, the agonizing shrieks and groans of the wounded, to swell the horrors of the occasion.

Capt. Brayton promptly caused the engine to be stopped, and then dropped anchor and proceeded to investigate the extent of the disaster. Upon examination it was found that the steam-chest around the starboard smokestack had exploded about on a level with the upper deck, forcing the steam all through the boat with terrible force. Wherever the scalding vapor touched it blistered, and as the result of the casualty, it was found that a large number of people were scalded with more or less severity. Out of those, six have died, and sixteen others are suffering untold tortures, many of them being doubtless injured past recovery.

As soon after the accident as practicable the boat was put ashore for Fall River, to land the injured for medical treatment.

Mr. Brockway, the engineer of the Empire State, says the boilers of the boat are one year old, and were built at the Morgan Iron Works. They are a combination of the mud tubular boilers, and have been subjected to hydraulic pressure, as a test, and certified as safe, this year, by the Massachusetts Inspector, under a pressure of 37 lbs. At the time of the accident there were only 31 lbs on. Mr. Brockway himself, although uninjured, was within thirty feet of the boiler and had a very narrow escape with his life. When the accident occurred the night was clear and calm, and the sea almost motionless.

This boat seems to have been very unfortunate. Once she was turned to the water's edge; about a year ago her piston flew up, knocking out the cylinder head and scalding a number of persons, some fatally, others very seriously; only the other day she struck on the rocks in Hell Gate, and was forced to go into dry dock and repair, and now comes this disaster to cap the climax.

A MAN KILLED BY HIS OWN COFFIN.—The New York Daily Times, of the 28th ult., relates the following singular story:

On Saturday night last, a man who resided in Twenty-ninth street was killed in a most singular manner. The following are the particular circumstances, as far as our reporter has been able to learn them—for, in consequence of the opinion entertained concerning his relatives by the deceased, what was a man of considerable wealth and respectability, they have made great efforts to keep the particulars from the public ear. It appears that nearly a year ago the deceased, who was fifty-three years of age, became strongly impressed with an idea that, when he should die, the parsimonious disposition of his relatives would lead them to put him in a cheap coffin, while he had a strong desire to be buried in one of polished rosewood, lined with white satin and trimmed with silver. Soon after this strange idea got possession of his mind, he discovered an elegant coffin in one of the principal warehouses, which suited him. He purchased it for $75; had it sent to his residence at night fall, and stowed it away in a small closet adjoining his bed-room, where it remained until the time of the accident.

How it occurred is not known to certainty, for the first intimation the family had of the lamentable occurrence was from a servant, who, on going to call him to breakfast, found the door wide open and the deceased lying upon the floor, dead, with his coffin at his side. She screamed, which soon brought the family, and on raising the body the skull was found crushed in upon the brain. He was discovered about 8 o'clock yesterday morning, when, to all appearances, he had been dead several hours. On examining the closet, a bottle containing a quantity of sherry wine was found, and as Saturday night was excessively warm, he is supposed to have gone to the closet in order to procure the wine to use with some ice-water he had on a small table by his bedside. It is thought that he must have sought for it in the dark, and by some mistake upset the coffin, which stood nearly upright. Becoming sensible that it was falling, he probably made an effort to get away, when he fell, and the outer end struck his head with sufficient force to fracture his skull and cause almost immediate death. The inquest will be held with all possible secrecy. The unfortunate impression of the deceased concerning his relatives is a sufficient reason for withholding the names of the parties.

NOTICE TO MARINERS.—A new light house has been erected on Gay Head, entrance of Martha's Vineyard Sound. The tower is built of brick, and is thirty-five feet high. The keeper's houses are of brick also, and the center of the tower is twelve feet in front of the center of the houses. The color is the natural color of the brick.

The focal plane of the light is one hundred and ninety-one feet above the level of the sea; and the distance at which it will be visible from the deck of a vessel fifteen feet above the level of the sea is at least twenty nautical miles.

The illuminating apparatus is a revolving Fresnel lens of the first order, showing a bright flash every ten seconds.

This light will be exhibited for the first time at sundown, December 1, 1856; from which date the revolving light shown at Gay Head at present will be discontinued.

A light house will be built during the present season on Big Island, in the St. Croix River, otherwise called Neutral Island and St. Croix Island. The structure will be built of wood, and the tower will be on the top of the keeper's house. The color will be white.

The light shown will be fixed, of the natural color, and the illuminating apparatus will be a Fresnel lens of the fifth order.

The center of the light will be about forty feet above the level of high water, and the light will be seen in good weather about eleven nautical miles.

Notice giving the latitude and longitude will be published before the light is placed in operation.

The light house will be lighted for the first time on the night of Monday, the 2d day of February, 1857, and will be kept burning during every night thereafter.

DECIDEDLY RICH.—The Columbia (S. C.) Times, of the 28th ult., relates the following:

It will be remembered that on account of a caning at the Metropolitan Hotel, by Mr. Vicks, who thrashed Stanwood severely, appeared in our columns a few days since. Connected with Mr. Vicks we have a tale to unfold which will take the abolitionists of Philadelphia feel very cheap.

It seems that when Mr. Vicks was about to leave North Carolina in company with Mr. Haywood on a Northern pleasure tour, he was requested by the State authorities to take with him a negro who had been sentenced to banishment from North Carolina for a glaring outrage upon the laws of that State. Mr. V. consented and on his arrival at the Hotel in Philadelphia he registered his name Vicks and servant. Soon after the abolitionists appeared and used every persuasion to induce the negro to abscond; and he informed Mr. V. that they had offered him $50 to run off. Mr. V. advised the boy to demand $100. The amount was paid and the banished negro who was taken to the North to be left there, received and unexpectedly and is now residing among a class of people altogether worthy his association.

W. D. Porter, in the New York Herald, points out a new way to discover murderers. He says:

The following method will in many cases detect the perpetrators of a murder: It is well known that all objects are actually painted or impressed on the eye. Should a person die by a violent death, the object before the eye, at the time, remains impressed on the retina. If the covering of the eye is scraped down thin, and a powerful magnifying glass applied, the image will be distinctly seen. This was the first discovery of the daguerreotype. Any scientific physician can do this.

FEVER IN FLORIDA.—The Tampa (Fla.) Peninsular, of the 19th inst., says:

The Hillsborough river is very much swollen, with a current that would grace the Mississippi. Hagler's and Bolles' bridges were carried away at the commencement of the freshet, and the rope by which the ferry-boat, at this place, was crossed, gave way a few days ago, and all attempts to stretch another have been ineffectual. Thus, it will be perceived, all means of crossing, save in small boats have been destroyed.

We have had but one mail in two weeks, and will, in all probability; not have another in a month or two.

Interesting times, these!

CROPS IN SOUTH CAROLINA.—We copy the following letter from the Charleston Courier of the 1st inst. It gives a sad account of the growing crops and the misfortunes which have befallen the planting interests in that State:

Mr. Editor: This has been an eventful season so far, and one long to be remembered. At first the weather was very cold, and we were almost "frost-locked" for nearly three months, with hail, rain, snow, sleet and ice. Then a dry spell, and after that a heavy washing rain; again a dry hot spell, and then the rain, when the water fell fourteen inches deep on the whole ground, over a large scope of country, pouring down in cataracts and washing off fences, mills, mill-dams and bridges, causing utter destruction to crops on the low grounds and doing considerable injury to the railroads. Now we have the army-worm, which has made its appearance in vast numbers, destroying vegetation in a most summary manner, leaving luxuriant grass patches as bare as a yard.

I traveled several miles along the valley of the Broad river, and saw signs of ruin and destruction all the way. Fields of corn are fast disappearing before the little greedy monsters, and they have commenced on the cotton in some places. How long this warm may continue its ravages, or what the result may be is unknown.

The prospects are certainly very gloomy at this time, as the worm may be the instrument of greater destruction and cause more distress than the freshet, from the fact of its ravages being more general, consuming alike the food of man and beast on the ridge, as well as the remnant which escaped the freshet in the valleys. Fortunately they cannot eat up the railroads, which may transport us supplies from some point of plenty.

The crops are suffering very much from drouth in the vicinity at present. Some refreshing showers might stay the hand of destruction by the worms.

From the New York Express of the 29th ult., we clip the following:

WILL IT EVER RAIN?—That is the question—the great question of the day—and the night—and the morning. It is put by our exchanges North, East, South and West, for all sections are now suffering alike and in common. The farmers are predicting all sorts of disasters for the harvest in consequence, and the market speculators, ever on the alert to make the most of a good opportunity, are putting up the prices of vegetables and other commodities likely to be unfavorably affected by the dr

"Would You be Young Again?"

"Would you be young again?" composed by a Scottish nobleman, Caroline Baroness Nairn, in 1842, when in her seventy-sixth year:

Would you be young again?
So would not I—
One tear to memory given,
Onward I'll fly.
Life's dark flood forded o'er,
All but at rest on shore,
Say, would you plunge once more,
With hope so nigh?

If you might, would you now
Retrace your way?
Wander through stormy wilds,
Faint and astray?
Night's gloomy watches fled,
Morning all beaming red,
Hope's smiles around us shed,
Heaven's sweet—stay.

Where, then, are those dear ones,
Our joy and delight?
Dear and more dear, though now
Hidden from sight.
Where they rejoice to be,
There is the land for me,
Fly time, fly speedily—
Come, life and light.

Repose.

BY BARRY CORNWALL.

She slept amongst her pillows soft,
(A dove, new wearied with her flight,)
And all around, and all aloft,
Hangs fulness and folds of virgin white;
Her hair outdarkens the dark night,
Her glance outshines the starry sky;
But now her locks are hidden quite,
And closed is her fringed eye.

She stepeth; wherefore doth she start?
She sigheth; doth she feel no pain?
Hush, none! the dream is near her heart;
The spirit of sleep is in her brain,
He cometh down, like golden rain,
Without a wind, without a sound;
He steers the deeper (ne'er in vain)
Like May, when earth is winter bound.

All day within some cave he lies,
Deformed from his mighty array—
But in the hush of evening skies
He comes in splendour and in play.
Two spells at night doth man obey;
By such he's wrought, from each he learns;
The magic lord of life is Day,
The other when starry Night returns.

She is Coming.

There has fallen a splendid tear
From the passion-flower at the gate,
She is coming, my love, my dear;
She is coming, my life, my fate;
The red rose cries, "she is near, she is near;"
And the white rose weeps, "she is late;"
The larkspur listens, "I hear, I hear;"
And the lily whispers, "I wait."

She is coming, my own, my sweet,
Were it ever so airy a tread,
My heart would hear her and beat,
Were it earth in an earthy bed;
My dust would hear her and beat,
Had I lain for a century dead;
Would start and tremble under her feet,
And blossom in purple and red.

TENNYSON.

I wonder if any of our readers can just now appreciate the following little poem:

How beautiful is the rain!
After the dust and heat,
In the broad and leafy street,
In the narrow lane,
How beautiful is the rain!

How it clatters along the roofs,
Like the trample of hoofs!
How it gushes and struggles out
From the throat of the overflowing spout!
Across the window pane
It pours and pours;
And swift and wide
With a muddy tide
Like a river down the gutter roars
The rain, the welcome rain!

ALL ABOUT GIRLS' NAMES.—If you are a very precise man and wish to be certain of what you get, never marry a girl named Ann, for we have the authority of Lindley Murray, and others, that "An is an indefinite article." [Exchange.

If you would like to have a wife who is "one of a thousand," you should marry an Emily, or Emma—for any printer can tell you that "Ems" are always counted by thousands.

If you do not wish to have a bustling, fly-about wife, you should not marry one named Jenny—for every cotton spinner knows that "jennies" are always turning.

If you have a wife named Cordelia, you should never drop any of your old acquaintances, for he who has the "dear" never eats.

If you marry one named Margaret, you may confidently expect that she will end her days on the gallows, for all the world knows that "pegs" were made for hanging.

Unless you would have the Evil One for a father-in-law, you should not marry a lady named Elizabeth, for the devil is the father of Lies. (lies.)

Many men of high moral principles, and who would not gamble for the world, still have not refused to take a bet.

The London Directory shows that there are several men in England named Salad. Let us fervently trust that one of them, at least, has a wife named Lettuce.

READING "A CLUB!"—"Tommy my son, what are you going to do with that club?"

"Send it to the editor of course."

"But what are you going to send it to the editor for?"

"Cause he says, if any body will send him a club he will send them a copy of his paper."

The mother came pretty near fainting, but retained consciousness enough to ask:

"But, Tommy, dear, what do you suppose he wants with a club?"

"Well, I don't know," replied the hopeful urchin, "unless it is to knock down subscribers as don't pay for their paper."

AN ISLE OF RAIN ON THE ATLANTIC.—We have been struck with the passage of Lieutenant Maury's "Physical Geography of the Sea," in which he computes the effect of a single inch of rain falling upon the Atlantic Ocean. The Atlantic Ocean includes an area of twenty-five millions of square miles. Suppose an inch of rain to fall upon only one-fifth of this vast expanse. "It would weigh," says the author, "three thousand and sixty thousand millions of tons, and the salt, which as water, it held in solution in the sea, and which, when this water was taken up as a vapor, was left behind to disturb the equilibrium, weighed sixteen millions more tons, or nearly twice as much as all the ships in the world could carry at a single cargo each. It might fall in a day; but occupy what time it might in falling, this rain is calculated to exert so much force—which is inconceivably great—in disturbing the equilibrium of the ocean. If all the water discharged by the Mississippi during the year, were taken up in one mighty vapor, and cast into the ocean at one effort, it would not make a greater disturbance in the equilibrium of the sea than would the fall of rain supposed. And yet, so gentle are the operations of nature, that movements so vast are unperceived."

MAKING THE BEST OF IT.—A Yankee out walking in Virginia, at Wheeling, while (to himself a talking) experienced a feeling—strange, painful and alarming for him in regard to his knees, as he suddenly discovered he was covered over with bees! They rested on his cuffs, and perched upon his nose; they colonized his peaked face, and swarmed upon his clothes. They explored his swelling nostrils, dived into his ears; then crawled up his trowsers, and filled his eyes with tears. "Did he yell like a hyena? Did he holler like a bear? Was he scar't and did he 'cut and run?' or did he scatter—scream? No'er a one! He wasn't scar't a bit—not he—nor screech—nor hollers—but he hired 'em for a quarter a piece right, and sold 'em for two dollars.

That house will be kept in a turmoil where there is no toleration of each other's errors, no lenity shown to failings, no meek submission to injuries, no soft answer to turn away wrath. If you lay a single stick of wood on the fire, and apply fire to it, it will go out; but add another and there will burn, and half a dozen and you will have a blaze. There are other things subject to the same conditions. If one member of a family gets into passion, and is let alone, he will cool down, and possibly be ashamed and repent. But opposing temper to temper; pile on the fuel; draw in allies of the passion, and there will soon be a blaze, which will scorch them in all its hurtling heat.

THE UPPER RIVERS.—We clip the following river news from the St. Louis Democrat of the 26th ult.:

The Mississippi opposite this place is rising, having risen two feet since last Friday evening. The rise is from the Missouri, and is likely to disappear [illegible], unless the copious rains we have been [illegible] for two days should also have fallen extensively up the rivers, and cause a greater rise than anticipated. We need not repeat the condition of the Illinois and upper Mississippi. Suffice it to state, that no [illegible] had taken place in them at latest accounts. Yesterday arrivals Saturday and yesterday [illegible] the Illinois, one from the Missouri, two from the Ohio, one from above the rapids, etc.

SENDING A HORSE BACKWARDS.—The Paris correspondent of the Boston Post says, an English horse [illegible] backwards down Cherry Elephant the other day, at the corner of the Canal de Lanjeuse Bazaar, by means of a sweep. Cost—him the docile animal [illegible] five-eighths of a sou in five minutes and [illegible] seconds. A sporting item worth [illegible].

My Intimate Friend.

"Save me from my friends!" There is wisdom in the exclamation—but what are "one's friends" at large compared with the one particular individual, who, under the name of friendship, has taken out letters patent for the express purpose of doing us all the mischief in his power?

My intimate friend belongs to the same club as myself, and manages to get himself invited to share my dinner, three times a week, to say the least; on which occasions he shows his friendship by telling me plainly that champagne is necessary for his digestion.

My intimate friend gives me a bad dinner whenever he entertains my at his lodgings because, as he says, between friends there needs no ceremony—and then drops hints about "the feast of reason and the flow of soul."

My intimate friend borrows money of me alone because, as he observes, he would not hurt me by applying to any one else; and forgets the golden maxim that "short accounts make long friends."

My intimate friend is always ready to be my second in a duel; and is so tenacious of my honor that he will never hear of a, compromise, though older and better men than himself have professed themselves satisfied.

My intimate friend rides my horse instead of keeping one, because Orestes and Pylades and Damon and Pythias were not better friends than we are, and consequently such trifles ought to be common between us.

My intimate friend would think me very ill-natured did I not present him in all the different circles that I frequent, although, being better favored than I am, the consequence is that he dances with all the handsomest girls, and I am employed to take the old ladies down to supper.

My intimate friend is so solicitous about my gentlemanlike appearance, that he left me no peace till I employed his tailor, his hatter, and his shoemaker, all of which functionaries supply him gratis for the sake of his good word among his dear friends.

My intimate friend insisted on giving a ball at my house, because, he said, a rich man like myself ought not to receive so many civilities without a return. He would undertake all the trouble, and write all the invitations. The consequence was that he entertained all his friends at my expense, and I offended many for not having invited them.

My intimate friend would know all the secrets of my heart; and I confided to him that I was in love with a charming girl, of whom I gave a very love-like description. He insisted on being introduced to the family, as he would be delighted to forward my suit by all the assistance in his power. My intimate friend soon made himself at home in the house, and held sketches for Caroline, while I was talking with her mother—as he said, I had better not pay my attentions too openly, till I was sure of her parents' sanction.

My intimate friend has a knack of bringing forward all the subjects on which I am least informed, to show off his superior attainments. Thus, after teazing me for half an hour to sing, which he assured my friends I could do capitally if I chose, he got himself solicited to take part in a duet with Caroline, who was delighted with his abilities.

My intimate friend took charge of all my letters to my lady love, which he could easily give her unperceived, as nobody suspected him—all of which he most faithfully consigned to the fire, assuring me that my addred did not dare answer them, though she had read them with great satisfaction.

My intimate friend was always at her house. He rode with her and danced with her, all to forward my interests, while I was enjoined to be absent—not to spoil the whole plan. In short, he made love for me, proposed for me, and finally married her, no doubt for my sake; and to prove the excess of his friendship, and being now rich through her means, and no longer in want of an intimate friend, he has forgotten our intimacy and-blotted my very person from his memory. So much for friendship!

THE NORTHMEN IN AMERICA.—We copy from the Philadelphia Ledger the following interesting article:

The controversy which raged so long as to whether America was visited by the Scandinavians or not, before its discovery by Columbus, has been determined finally, as all know, in the affirmative. So late as the appearance of Irving's "Columbus," the question was still an open one, and that author felt himself even authorized to decide in the negative. But since that period, the researches of the Danish antiquaries have left no doubt that the Northmen landed on this continent, more than eight hundred years ago; that they even colonized it for a time, and that something of their blood and language, however inconsiderable, must have become incorporated with the red man's race and tongue, when the colonies were finally abandoned. But, by all writers, these settlements were conceded to have been confined to North America. No one suspected that the Scandinavians had ever penetrated, in their adventurous voyages, to the West Indies or to South America. But, within the last two years, this theory has been broached on philological grounds, and from two distinct quarters—one, the Abbe de Bourbourg, whose researches have been made in Guatemala; the other, a Swedish gentleman, lately resident in Brazil. The latter, especially, asserts that the language of the Peruvian Incas was Swedish. The name of Inca he considers merely a corruption of Inga, the founder of the royal Scandinavian race of the Inglings, celebrated in an ancient Saga. A letter on the subject, from the pen of Mary Howitt, makes a conspicuous figure in the last London Anthenæum.

These analogies in tongues, however, are perilous things. If, as there is reason to believe, most of the languages in the world had a common origin, the roots of many words must be similar in not a few. A century ago, it was the fashion, on this and other accounts, to attribute the colonization of America to the ten tribes of Israel. Quite as plausible a theory, we have no doubt, could be constructed, tracing the dominant caste, at least, in Peru, if not Mexico, to the ancient Scandinavians, by the simple process of collecting, in one imposing array, all such words, customs and institutions as were common to the Northmen and the Incas, and rejecting the ten thousand others that were dissimilar. Antiquarian research, we regret to say, has advanced but little, since Scott, in one of his earliest novels, made Majoribanks discover a Roman encampment in an old ditch, till the gaberunzie dispelled the dream by saying he "minded the diggin' on it." Crude theories, founded on one-sided investigations, are substituted for that large, wide and thorough induction, by which only can truth be attained. We have no doubt that, in the course of time, and as the antiquities and ancient tongues of these continents become more completely understood, an approximation at least will be made to unriddling the great problem. "Who first settled America?" It is not impossible either, though scarcely probable, that the Scandinavians will be found to have had a hand in it. But, as yet, both the data and the careful analysis, to solve this sphinx, are wanting. The Bacon of this new field of discovery has not yet arisen.

SYDNEY SMITH ON SWEARING.—Sydney Smith, when traveling in a stage coach one day, long before railroads were dreamed of, was terribly annoyed by a young man, who had acquired the polite art of swearing to such an extent that he could not help interlarding his discourse with it, as though it were a constituent part of the language. 'As there was a lady present, the matter was doubly annoying. After enduring the young man's displays for some time, the "wag, wit and wicar," as one of his cockney admirers called him, asked permission to tell the company a little anecdote, and thus commenced: "Once upon a time (boots, sugar-tongs and tinder-boxes) there was a king of (boots, sugar-tongs and tinder-boxes) England, who, at a grand ball, (boots, sugar-tongs and tinder-boxes) picked up the Duchess of (boots, sugar-tongs and tinder-boxes) Shrewsbury's garter (boots, sugar-tongs and tinder-boxes) and said: 'Honi soit qui mal y (boots, sugar-tongs and tinder-boxes) pense,' which means in English, 'Evil be to him who (boots, sugar-tongs and tinder-boxes) evil thinks.'—This was the origin of (boots, sugar-tongs and tinder-boxes) the order of the garter."

When Sydney Smith had concluded, the young gentleman said: "A very good story, sir—rather old—but what the devil has boots, sugar-tongs and tinder-boxes to do with it?"

"I will tell you my young friend, when you tell me what 'd——n my eyes,' etc., have to do with your conversation. In the meantime, allow me to say, that's my style of swearing."

When Lord Elgin was in Portland, a dinner was given to him. He said to one of the committee:

"This takes me by surprise. Must I make a speech?"

"It will be expected, sir."

"Tell me, I pray you, what you have of which you are proud? Any public works? Any public men?"

"It is the birth-place, sir, of Longfellow, the poet."

"Does he reside here?"

"He does not. He was born here. His brother Samuel still lives here. We are accustomed to speak of him as a townsman, and are very proud of him."

"Thank you, sir, thank you."

Elgin was called. Elgin rose.

"Portland, we know you! Your fame has reached across the Atlantic! for yours is the proud honor to have given birth to America's greatest poet—the world-renowned Samuel Longfellow!"

The Emperor Napoleon lately invited M. de Persigny, the French ambassador at London, to dine with him, and afterwards witness a display of fireworks from the balconies of the Ministry of State. M. de Persigny once shared the Emperor's prison, and was his companion in exile and misfortune, after the failure of their revolutionary schemes. To this invitation the ambassador replied that his wardrobe was in London, and that unfortunately the only coat he had in Paris was the one then on his back, and he thought it hardly fitting for the occasion. Thereupon the Emperor offered to lend him one. M. de Persigny thanked him, took the cloak, and, as he was about to put it on, noticed on the right side of it the cross of the Legion of Honor (the grand crosses are worn on the right side, and the ambassador was only a grand officer.) He called the Emperor's attention to the circumstance, and hinted that the decoration ought to be removed. "Let it be," said the Emperor, "you will be a Grand Cross in to-morrow's Moniteur."

OUR RELATIONS WITH SPAIN.—Ion, the Washington correspondent of the Baltimore Sun, in a letter under date of the 29th ult., has the following in regard to our relations with Spain:

Our relations with Spain have become quite interesting, if not critical, as appears from the dispatches lately received from our minister, Mr. Dodge. The government cannot, with safety, make any concessions, which would seem to compromise the nations dignity. The Cortes censured the government for having allowed and paid the claim on account of the Black Warrior affair, and in consequence of that, the government has refused our demand for the adjustment of pending other claims. The latest accounts show, however, that the government has failed to conciliate the Cortes, to which body the insurrectionary movement is attributed.

The Richmond Despatch has the following about the Virginia gold mines: The proprietor of the Quartz Gold Mines in Orange, is about shipping 50 tons of ore to England, to be tested by parties there negotiating for his mine. The United States mines, owned by Col. Thos. Hunt, of New York, are about being opened by Col. Morgan. The washings of refuse sand at the Vanclusc mines have yielded $15 per ton. The Mitchell mine in Spottsylvania, has been valued at $150,000 by a party from the North. The Gardiner mine in the same county is yielding well.

SHOOTING IN COLUMBUS, GA.—The Enquirer of the 29th says:

On Saturday night, at a house of ill-fame in this city, Charles Barrow was dangerously shot by Murtin Watson. We learn that the difficulty grew out of a quarrel about one of the women of the house, and that Watson shot Barrow with a pistol, lodging four buck-shot in his body. Barrow is alive, and hopes of his recovery are entertained. Watson has so far avoided arrest.

Otis Tufts, the extensive steam engine builder, of Boston, has failed for $300,000.

There were only sixty-six deaths in Boston during the week ending on the 27th ult.

A dispatch dated Provincetown, July 30th, says that a letter from Green Island, in the Straits of Bello Isle, mentions a terrific storm which occurred there on the 1st ult., driving twenty-nine vessels ashore at that place. Three vessels were also lost off Dog Island, with all on board—only one vessel rode out the gale. Three hundred and fifty men were living in tents on Green Island.

There were 100 deaths in Brooklyn the week ending on the 26th ult., of whom 78 were minors.

AN EXPERIMENT.—A poor student had no means of procuring fire-wood during the last hard winter; so he was obliged to break up and burn piece after piece of his furniture.

"What are you doing there?" asked a fellow student.

"I don't like my quarters," replied he, "so I am moving out by the chimney!"

"If you ever think of marrying a widow," said an anxious parent to his heir, "select one whose first husband was hung: that is the only way of preventing her throwing his memory in your face, and making annoying comparisons." "Even that won't prevent it," exclaimed a crusty old bachelor; "she'll not only praise him, but say hanging would be too good for you."

Like the rainbow, peace rests upon earth, but its arch is lost in heaven. Heaven bathes it in hues of light—it springs up amid tears and clouds—it is a reflection of the eternal sun—it is an assurance of calm—it is an emanation from the distant orb of immortal light.

At the Fourth of July dinner in Boston, the following toast was offered: "Yankee Doodle—the tune to which our fathers marched to victory. May their sons, as they commemorate Yankee Doodle-doo, never forget what Yankee Doodle did."

Several newsboys have been arrested in the city of New York for selling newspapers on Sunday. The people of Gotham are becoming entirely too good to keep.

The library of the late James G. Percival, poet, numbering over seven thousand volumes, says the Madison (Wis.) Patriot, is to be sold by the administrator. The Patriot suggests that the State of Wisconsin should purchase it and place it in the library of the State Historical Society.

A Thrilling Adventure.

A merchant, who, wishing to celebrate his daughter's wedding, collected a party of her young companions. They were circled around her, wishing much happiness to the youthful bride and her chosen one. Her father gazed proudly on his lovely child, and hoped that as bright prospects for the future might open for the rest of his children who were playing among the guests. Passing through the hall of the basement he met a servant who was carrying a lighted candle in her hand; without the candlestick. He blamed her for such conduct, and went into the kitchen to see about the supper. The girl soon returned, but without the candle. The merchant immediately recollected that several barrels of gunpowder had been placed in the cellar during the day, and that one had been opened.

"Where is your candle," he inquired. In the utmost alarm.

"I couldn't bring it up with me, for my arms are full of wood," said the girl.

"Where did you put it?"

"Well, I'd no candlestick; so I stuck it in some black sand that is in the small barrel."

Her master dashed down the stairs, the passage was long and dark; his knees threatened to give way under him; his breath was choked; his flesh seemed dry and parched, as if he had already felt the suffocating blast of death. At the end of the cellar, under the very room where his children and their friends were revelling in felicity, he saw the open barrel of powder, full at the top; the candle stuck loosely in the grains, with a long red snuff of burnt wick; this sight seemed to wither all his powers; the laughter of the company struck upon his ear like the knell of death. He stood a moment unable to move. The music commenced above, the feet of the dancers responded with vavacity; the floor shook, and the loose bottles in the cellar jingled with the motion. He fancied the candle moved, was falling; with desperate energy he sprang forward. But how to remove it! the slightest touch would cause the red hot wick to fall into the powder. With unequalled presence of mind he placed a hand on each side of the candle pointed toward the object of his care, which, as his hands met, was secured in the clasping of his fingers and safely moved away from its dangerous position. When he reached the head of the stairs he smiled at his previous alarm, but the reaction was too powerful, and he fell into fits of the most violent laughter. He was conveyed to his bed senseless, and many weeks elapsed ere his nerves recovered sufficient tone to allow him to resume business.

COUPLIN'S WAIT.—Joseph Landers and Mary Webb called on Wednesday evening on Counsellor Holstein and requested him to merry them. Mr. H. informed the parties that he was not a magistrate and desired them to delay the matter until morning. Miss Webb said she could not think of such a thing—that she had come out to be married and that she was not to be fooled. Mr. Holstein, discovering that the young lady was becoming desperate, sent for Justice Parsons. The Justice arrived and tied the knot—Mr. Allen acting as groomsman and Mr. Holstein doing the part of bridesmaid. After the ceremony was concluded Charles W. Mink, Esq., addressed the bride and groom in a few brief remarks, and advised the pair to leave immediately for Kansas, a portion of the country wonderfully in want of live women at the present time. Mr. Mink, having finished his remarks, presented the young lady with an ivory rattle—a present more suggestive than welcome. The bride blushed and said, "thank you," and immediately went behind her fan to cough. The ceremony over, Miss Webb asked the magistrate what he ohanged. The Magistrate replied, "anything you please." Miss Webb asked if two dollars would do. The justice said "certainly." Miss Webb immediately out with her porte monnaie and handed the contents to the Justice. The justice counted it and said, "eleven and ninepence." "Possible! Send a boy down to the boat and I'll give you the other four and three pence." The magistrate said "all right." The bride and groom then left the office in company with a boy. Near the Columbia street bridge the party went on a canal boat. Miss Webb rushed into the cabin, got the four and three pence and handed the same to the boy. Boy handed over certificates. Miss Webb said "impudent woman in York State—kiss me, Jo." Joseph replied, "stop your fooling," and goes into the back cabin. Miss Webb follows Joseph and locks the door. Boy returns to Holstein's office and hands over the money. Mr. Mink moves that the justice expends the proceeds in coffee and oysters. Vote put and carried unanimously. Party orders up coffee and oysters and enjoy themselves for an hour, hour and a half or two hours. They separate with an understanding that they have had a delightful little time and all caused by a young lady anxiore to get married and "have the thing off her mind."

"DONE BROWN."

"DONE BROWN."—A leap-year story is told by the St. Louis Herald, which shows that it is not always best for a bachelor to look—long—before he leaps. Here is the story:

There is a certain fashionable boarding-house in St. Louis, where a handsome young widow was boarding. The lady we will call Widow Cheerly; she has a fortune of some $30,000, left by her deceased husband, and no children. Three young clerks—Smith, Brown and Jones, who formerly boarded at this boarding-house, called upon the landlady on New Year's day. The Widow Cheerly was in the room, and saw the young men approaching. She immediately dressed herself up in her "bridal array," called the landlady and inquired their names. The lady informed her, when she remarked, "I intend to have one of those young men for a husband." The landlady smiled incredulously, and then went down into her parlor to receive her visitors.

The widow followed immediately, and without waiting an introduction, approached Smith and said: "Will you consent to become my husband?" The young man blushed, and backed out. The gay widow then addressed Mr. Brown, who "jumped at the chance," and the twain were made one. The next morning, when Brown awoke, he began to think, as he was out of employment, that he was in a fix; and, while he was resolving in his mind whether it would be better for him to run off or to commit suicide, his wife awoke, and said, "My dear, have you any objection to collecting a few bills?" Thinking she supposed he had some money she him, he muttered, "No, not when there is any money owing me." "I do not mean that, my dear. Get up and go to my bureau drawer, and there you will find bills to the amount of five hundred dollars, for the rents due me for the past month. You will please accept the money from me as a new year's gift."

Brown found that he had been "done Brown" in a most satisfactory way, and has been happier than most lords ever since.

Not long since, a "Friend" who rejoiced in the name of Comfort, paid his devoirs to a young and attractive Quaker widow named Rachel H. Either her griefs were too new, or her lover too old, or from other causes, his offer was declined. Whereupon a Quaker friend remarked: "That was the first modern instance he had known where Rachel refused to be Comforted." The anecdote is remarkable as being the first Quaker pun on record.

WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE.

THIS extraordinary medicine has three distinct and invaluable properties. It simultaneously destroys worms, invigorates the system and purifies the blood. Every description of worm which infests the stomach and alimentary canal, is immediately extirpated by the medicine, which at the same time has a healing effect upon the irritated internal surface. It is perfectly harmless, and may be given to the most delicate infant. Nothing can be more genial than its effect on the general system, and it has never been known to fail in a practice of twenty years' duration.

☞ Be particular and remember the name "Winer's Canadian Vermifuge." This is the only article that can be depended on. For sale in New Orleans, wholesale and retail, by

WRIGHT & CO.,
Nos. 21 and 151 Chartres street, sole proprietors.

☞ Sold by all the Druggists. au9 1l

NEW ORLEANS
SCHOOL OF MEDICINE,

SITUATED on Common street, opposite the Charity Hospital. The regular course of Lectures in this institution will commence on Monday, the 17th November, 1856, and continue five months.

FACULTY:

A. FOSTER ASTON, M. D., Professor of Physiology.
THOMAS PENISTON, M. D., Professor of Clinical Medicine and Auscultation.
SAMUEL CHOPPIN, M. D., Professor of Surgery.
ISAAC L. CRAWCOUR, M. D., Professor of Chemistry and Medical Jurisprudence.
EDWARD SMITH, M. D., Professor of Materia Medica and Therapeutics.
JOHN M. W. PICTON, M. D., Professor of Diseases of Women and Children.
D. WARREN BRICKELL, M. D., Professor of Obstetrics.
CORNELIUS C. BRARD, M. D., Professor of Anatomy.
ANTHONY A. PENISTON, M. D., Adjunct Professor of Anatomy.

The dissecting room will be opened on the 15th October, and clinical instructions will be daily held at the Charity Hospital from that time till the end of the regular course of lectures.

The proximity of the College to Charity Hospital will prevent all loss of time in going from one to the other.

It is the intention of the Faculty to demonstrate practical Medicine and Surgery at the bed side as much as possible. In addition to the facilities for this purpose afforded by the Hospital, a Dispensary will be established at the College for the examination and treatment of such patients as may not wish to enter the Hospital.

Here the students will be required in turn to put up prescriptions, apply dressings, etc. Indeed every effort will be made to render the course of instruction in this institution as practical as possible.

The College is situated in a quiet part of the city, and will be spacious and well ventilated.

The Professors will take pleasure in aiding the students to procure cheap and comfortable board and lodging.

Annual fees for the full course of Lectures $108
Matriculation fee (paid but once) 5

The ensuing scholastic year will commence on Wednesday, the 1st of October.

The Institution has entered on its sixth session under the auspices of the same Principal. A sense of duty, interest and pleasure reads his future connexion with the Institution permanent and perpetual.

The apparatus, Chemical, Philosophical and Astronomical, is large and well selected.

There is a numerous cabinet of minerals and fossils in connexion with the Seminary.

There is a library of more than one thousand volumes accessible to the pupils, which will shortly be increased several hundred volumes.

The number of musical instruments, pianos, harp, guitars, etc., is always sufficient to meet the wants of the department.

The institution is furnished with a large and excellent collection of maps, charts, diagrams, plates, globes, etc.

The grounds of the premises have been enlarged and the entire premises tastefully enclosed.

UNIFORM.

The Trustees and Principal at a meeting lately held, adopted a uniform for the following reasons:

1st. To secure economy in dress. It is impracticable to secure it otherwise.

2d. Our young ladies are of diverse pecuniary conditions, as is but to be expected where such a number are thrown together, and this diversity is published to the world by the different styles and quality of dress on all public occasions.

3d. On public occasions we have often, as well as the young ladies, been mortified to hear this diversity remarked.

4th. Without a uniform, there being no rule in the article of dress, the region of whim and caprice is left boundless, and the trouble of satisfying these endlessly diverse fancies in every article, is burdensome and annoying in the extreme. For the above and other good reasons, we have adopted a uniform, and commend it to our patrons and the public. It must be regarded as a law of the institution.

15,000 ACRES OF LAND FOR SALE.

THE lands are situated in Morehouse parish, Louisiana, and in what is known as the "Bastrop Grant." They are of the richest quality of alluvial soil, unsurpassed in fertility by any lands in the South, and fully capable of producing from one and a half to two bales, or fifty to sixty bushels of corn to the acre. They lie near the Ouachita and Bear rivers—good navigable streams—and likewise in convenient distance of the route of the Vicksburg, Shreveport and Texas Railroad, now in course of construction, and known to be a rapid and profitable work. A portion of these lands are highly improved and in a flourishing state of cultivation; the country in which they lie is very healthy, the water is excellent and abundant, and altogether they will be found to possess greater advantages and present inducements to purchasers than any lands now offered for sale in the Southern country. They will be sold in quantities to suit purchasers, and on the most favorable terms. Titles perfect.

For further particulars, inquire of the undersigned, either personally at his residence in Prairie Jefferson, Morehouse parish, or by letter addressed to Point Jefferson, Morehouse parish, Louisiana. [jun12 1y] JAMES H. BRIGHAM.

MOTIVES.

Various motives gather around every point of my life and claim the control of my conduct. Between these conver- ent motives I have the power of choice. I feel competent to say under what motives I will act, to accept and reject whatever motives I please. In this power of choosing consists my lib- erty. Having chosen my motive, I may be unable to do what I propose, but this impotency does not in the least limit my freedom. The whole gamut of freedom, human and divine, is includ- ed in this one thing, namely: The power to select motives. Morality is there- fore possible only on the condition of a self-selected motive. And inasmuch as the sphere of moral life is identi- cal with the sphere of freedom, and the sphere of freedom with the sphere of self-selected motive; it there- fore follows that the perfectness of every system of morality is to be determined by the controlling motive of that sys- tem, the Christian not excepted.

There is a certain fundamental ten- dency or higher principle that makes good good, and evil evil, independent of the manifold forms in which the good and the evil appear in life. The forms in which the good clothes itself are so various as to have caused the French encyclopedists to despair of reducing to unity, and led them to believe that there is no positive system of morality suited to all times and countries.—Nevertheless, we do presuppose such unity, and upon the strength of this presupposition call certain actions good, others bad. The phenomenal va- riety of moral life issues out of this transcendant unity. This central fun- damental tendency, lifted above the limitations of real life, in virtue of which the whole life is morally qualified, we call "the real principle of morality."

The first essential to a practical re- alization of true morality, is a complete conformity of the governing motive of the real life with this real principle of morality. An action is good in propor- tion as its motive is in conformity with the higher law or real principle; in other words "sin is transgression of the law;" righteousness is conformity, in motive, to the law. The progress of moral life is marked by a constant ap- proximation of the actual and subjec- tive motive to oneness with the real prin- ciple of morality. When it can be af- firmed that the motive which directs my life is identical with the real prin- ciple of morality, then am I perfect in the moral life, not before.

In determining what this real princi- ple is in the teachings of Jesus, we de- sire the further inquiry, under what motive his disciples should live; for as we have seen, the very essence of morality consists of the identity of in- ward motive with objective law.

Now, this much is certain; fear and hope are not mentioned in the teachings of Jesus, as constituting the real princi- ple of morality. They are mentioned as accidents of the Christian life, re- sulting from the divine promises and threatenings, but are not enjoined as duties. Reward and penalty are not held as factors of God's moral govern- ment, awakening the sinner from his deep slumber and strengthening the heart of weary pilgrims, but never as motives from which should proceed the whole Christian life. They are not the two main pillars of the moral system of Jesus," but stand as monitors to repel from sin and persuade to virtue.

On the other hand love is mentioned as constituting this real principle. Love to God and the neighbor is the great command, including all the law and the prophets. To a fulfillment of the law, a complete identity of the inward mo- tive and this real principle is necessa- ry, for the law itself is love, and "love is the fulfilling of the law."

The error of Jewish legalism consisted not in a superficial view of the contents of the divine law, and a consequent erro- neous motive of the moral life. Fear and hope, retribution and reward, were the prevailing factors of the Jewish legalism. The excellence of Christianity consists of an advance from the old Jewish stand-point of fear and hope, to the higher eminence of love. Insert fear and hope in your system of morali- ty, as real principles of the moral law, and therefore as proper motives of the moral life, and you may have a Judais- tic or Confucian morality, but not a Christian. Love, as the final generali- zation of all law, dwells in lone and pervasive majesty in the bosom of Jesus and his invisible church, and shares dominion with neither fear nor hope, holds fellowship with neither the trembling paleness of the one nor the jubilant shout of the other.

The argument so far may be stated thus: Since the true moral life consists in an identity of the actual and subjec- tive motive with the real principle of morality; and since love in the moral system of Jesus is this real principle, it therefore follows that love is the only motive that comes within the plane of christian morality.

Jesus led a perfect moral life because his governing motive was identical with the ground principle of morality, life with law, life with love. He insin- uates this higher identity when he says "I and my Father are one," for the real principle of the law—love, is a synon- yme of God; according to John "God is love." From Bethlehem to Olivet he spoke of love, he acted lov- ingly, he was love.

In his words love is always made the pivot of Christian life. "If ye keep my commandments, ye shall abide in my love, as I have kept my Father's commandments and abide in his love." As the love of the Father was the centre of the moral life of Jesus, so the love of Jesus should be the centre of the moral life of the Christian. "He that hath my commandments and keep- eth them, he it is that loveth me;" and "he that loveth me not, keepeth not my sayings." Love to Jesus is the living ground of keeping the command- ments. I could never love a being who kept me wakeful with menacing wrath. I love my divine Saviour, therefore I fear nothing at his hand; "perfect love casteth out fear." Nor do I love him because he has gone to prepare a place for me; on the contrary, he has gone to prepare a place for me, because I love him.

In the writings of the apostles, love is the starting point of Christian growth. "But speaking the truth in love, may grow up into him in all things which is the head, even Christ."—Love is here the starting-point of growth into Christ. For love, as the enfolding germ from which is evolved the development of the Christian, See Eph. III, 13: 19; 1 Cor. VIII, 3, XIII, 1: 7; 2 Cor. V, 14: 15; 1 Tim. I, 5. and the first Epistle of John throughout. Individual virtues are traced to love as their true and only motive in the following passages: Rom. XIII, 8: 10; Col. III, 14; Jas. II, 8.—Thus love is made to encompass the whole Christian life.

The young man who came to Jesus inquiring the way of salvation, (Matt. XIX, 16: 21,) had kept the command- ments from outward and Judaistic mo- tives, fear and hope, which could claim no identity with the real principle of the divine law, as Jesus interpreted it, but enjoyed a real identity therewith, according to the Jewish interpretation. He was a strictly pious young man ac- cording to the Jewish notion, and ex- pected our Lord to prescribe certain outward duties, the doing of which would lead to salvation. Our Lord calls to his attention a fact, namely: Salvation is to be obtained by no out- ward morality, bottomed on hope of re- ward or fear of pain, but by fellowship through love with the eternal Good, and a keeping of the commandments conse- quent on this fellowship of love with the eternal Good.

Jesus exposed the disparity that exist- ed between the motives of the young man in keeping the law, and the living con- tents of that law as christianity would interpret it. To make this exposition more emphatic, he applies a practical test, "go sell all that thou hast and give to the poor."

If a reading of Lachman and Gris- bach, on the 17th verse be correct, this interpretation, otherwise almost unques- tionable, becomes abundantly evident. The reading referred to is, "Ti me erotas peri tou agathou; eis estin o agathos;" "Why askest thou me concerning what is good? He who is good is One." No one who will read Tregelles on the "printed text," p. 133, will hesitate to declare this the most probable reading. If this be a correct exposition of Matt. XIX, 16: 22, the conclusion can- not be avoided, that on the admission of hope and fear, as motives of the Christian life, Christianity is vacated and Jesus leveled with Judaism. "For the law came by Moses, but grace and truth by Jesus Christ." The law, which was nothing more than specific appli- cation of the doctrine of retribution, appealing to hope and fear as motives of the moral life, was done away by the incoming of grace and truth, which were nothing less than the unfolding of man's redemptive relations, and the consequent elevation of his moral life to a higher motive, love.

These three propositions are evident from the above: 1st, There is but one motive of the christian life recognized in the teachings of Jesus and the wri- tings of the apostles, and that motive is love. 2d, Separated from this motive, Christianity loses its significance and becomes mere Jewish moralism. 3d, Whatever position fear and hope may assume in the Christian system, they cannot rise to the dignity of motives.

Our third proposition is threatened and apparently jostled by the inquiry: May not hope and fear, as motives, co- exist in the christian consciousness by the side of love, as a motive?

We might silence this question with a metaphysical argument, viz: A motive is that ultimate truth upon which the mind settles in the process of deciding the outward conduct. Whatever truths may have come in between the beginning of moral thinking and this ultimate, whatever influences may bear upon and help on this final determination, none of them can be called a motive, except this ultimate fact, upon which the moral life is pivoted. It is therefore impossible to conceive of two coexistent mo- tives. The conception contradicts and utterly annihilates the fact upon which the conception proceeds, and is there- fore self-destructive.

But, waiving metaphysical subtilty, we say the unholy alliance of fear and hope with love, as motives, leads to a selfish and secular christianity, and thus to no christianity at all.

Love can exist only in a being capa- ble of devotion to self, for it is the vol- untary surrender of self to God. Its purity is marred just in proportion as the subject joins with this voluntary surrender, the ultimate good of self.—Once admit a selfish prompting as the basis of devotion to God, and it recoils and becomes devotion to self. If fear and hope be the ultimate truth upon which my life is based, then love may come in as subsidiary, but cannot be- come a part of this ultimate, without destroying it or being destroyed by it. If hell and heaven be the postulates of christian morality, then God and love may come in as understrikers, and all religion must drop into brute fear of hell and epicurean hope of heaven. Love expires, a bleeding sacrifice be- neath the enthronement of hope and fear as motives of the christian life.—Once give up christianity as a religion of love, "standing equally above the hope of reward and fear of pain, in time and in eternity," and we cannot stop short of making the New Testament an evangel of unmitigated selfishness. What is the difference between serving God through hope of reward and fear of pain, and that shrewd hypocrisy which makes the merchant join the church for the purpose of increasing his sales of calico and tape? In the one case the selfish good is to come after death, and in the other before.—In both, selfishness reaches to the bot- tom and pervades the whole life. If fear and hope be the "two pillars" of christianity, then is christianity selfish- ness.

Fear and hope are types of man's secular or earthly life. If they be the "two pillars" of christianity then is christianity bottomed on the earthly and secular. The soul that serves God through hope of heaven and fear of hell, when death comes, will find its destiny pronounced, and then nothing will be left but angelic fruition in heaven or diabolical resignation in hell. The "pillars" of christian life being knocked out, the christian life must fall, and death becomes the apostasy of the sons of God. If fear and hope be the "pillars" of christianity, the eternal withers be- neath the moral teachings of Jesus, and the cross becomes a symbol of secular- ism. But all holy love remains the synonyme of God, and like him immor- tal, and therefore the only buttress of an unsecular christianity. But com- bine hope and fear with love as motives, which is metaphysically impossible, and christianity is eternal, just in pro- portion as it is abstracted from fear and hope and based upon love; and if love after all is to lift christianity out of mere secularism, if christianity be christianity, just in so far as it is unsec- ular, then are we fitted for the heavenly state, then are we true christians, just in proportion as we stand upon a love transcending alike the servile fear and hope. It all comes to this: Christiani- ty, as an unsecular system, cannot be based on secular "pillars;" fear of hell and hope of heaven are secular, for they eventuate in the article of death.—Christianity is eternal and must have something eternal to stand upon; love is eternal and dwells with God in ever deepening ardor; love is therefore the only basis of an unsecular christianity. If fear and hope be the "pillars" of christianity, then is our holy religion secularism.

But what is the position of fear and and hope in the christian system? We do not advocate an unfeeling stoicism. We do not exclude them as emotions; we do as motives. We stand upon love as the only motive, and bid our hearts rejoice in hope or tremble in fear. As for ourselves, we will live above this rejoicing and trembling in the eternal embrace of love. We stand upon the outer edge of our moral being and say to hope and fear "Keep your places as preparatory to the christian life of love, but do not vitiate with your presence the territory of christian mo- tive, that belongs to love."

Hope and fear are factors of God's moral government, which, as motives, belong to the pupilage of man's moral history. Their position, like that of the old dispensation, of which they are synonymes, is pedagogical. The law of retribution was imminent in the Mosaic era, as a necessary preparation for the law of love in the Christian.—God must be seen as Governor before he can be received as Redeemer. The old Testament preceded the New, retri- bution is the key to the former, love to the latter; one was a preparation for the other. Now and then a high-souled Job of the old Testament rises above the law of retribution, and antedates the era of love, but is spoken down by conservative Bildads; as in our day cer- tain theologies are striving to push back man's moral life to the Bildadism that tormented Job. Fear and hope are factors of the moral government of God, preparatory to christianity and love; but when this last is come they are done away and cease to exist as motives. Fear and hope begin the moral redemption of man; love ends it. "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom." Yes, the beginning of that wisdom that leads up to love as the fulfilling of the law.

Every man has his Jewish age, where- in fear and hope are school-masters to bring him to Christ. The thunders of Sinai must jar the abyssmal deeps of individual depravity, that every man may be prepared for the unfathomed love of Calvary. Jesus combined the Mosaic lesson of retribution with his own lesson of love, that the former might lead up to the latter. After hope and fear have done their part as prepara- tory, then are they dismissed from the sphere of moral life, and love is en- throned as the soul of moral being.—He who lives from hope of reward and fear of pain, lives a Jew; he who dies without having attained the altitudes of love, dies a Jew.

We have not room to discuss the va- rious scriptures in which fear and hope are mentioned, but leave them to the candor of the reader with one sugges- tion, namely: The mere mention of a fact in the moral government of God, (as "he that believeth shall be saved, he that believeth not shall be damned,") does not make that fact a motive of the christian life.

From the dilemma of selfishness and secularism, into which this heaven and hell theology is thrown, there is but one refuge. Spiritualise the idea of heaven and hell, as do the Unitari- ans in their late book of "Regeneration," by E. N. Sears, and make the former a synonyme of love, the latter of sin or hate. Then hope of heaven becomes love of love, or a longing after higher circles in the life of love; and fear of hell becomes disgust and loathing of sin, a moral shrinking from moral ruin. This would vindicate an unholy and untruthful interpretation of the ethics of christianity from the charges made against it. But there is no use of talk- ing; this pampered theology which falsifies the beautiful morality of Jesus, and flatters its own self-righteousness by charging every body else with "un- scriptural sentimentalism," would pre- fer death by hanging on the gibbets of human reason and divine revelation, to life and safety in a Unitarian fort.

But we need not fly thither for refuge. Let heaven and hell remain where or- thodox geographers have placed them; but let us, who name the name of Christ, serve God independently of either, through pure love of His holiness. Let us exult in the hope of heaven, but suf- fer it not to form the motive of our moral life. As to fear of hell, there is much more of it in our modern pulpits than was ever dreamed of on the rock- based pulpit of Jesus. Finally, hope deepens into gloom; fear quivers into paleness; but love kindles with ardent bliss eternal. Love is the giving up of self to God. When love is perfect the soul sustains a relation of sponta- neousness with God—

> "And is enabled to fulfill
> All motions of the one pre-eminent will,
> Which stirreth unto will and act our natures
> As human souls do stir the fleshly creatures."

LONG PRAYERS.—Speaking against long prayers, Elder Knapp says:—"When Peter was endeavoring to walk on the water to meet his Master, and was about sinking, had his supplication been as long as the introduction to some of our modern prayers, before he got half through he would have been fifty feet under water."

CORRESPONDENCE UP THE RIVER.

The Return—Emotional Monopoly—Pre- existence—Shrinkage—The Grave Yard and little graves—A time of vow-paying and altar-building—Sunday School and Church—A Group—The old Roof Tree —The Broken Charm.

When the grown man returns to the place of his nativity and early boy- hood, after a lapse of more than a de- cade of years, years of growth and change to him, that place is invested with an interest which must be peculiar to himself. Others cannot feel it, they cannot know it. It is a world of emo- tion, partly sad and partly pleasant, which the unselfish heart monopolizes from necessity. Leaving the cars and and the more public highway of dust and travel, the stage puts such an one down in the sequestered village where every tree, fence and house are familiar. The people are for the most part strange. Here and there a face and form that is recognized. But none recognize the long absent, not even a dog, wags his tail for joy; and the new generation of children playing about the old school-house, pause in their sports only long enough to satisfy them- selves that it is a stranger. The co- temporary boys and girls have ripened out of remembrance, the old have reach- ed decrepitude, and the strong and mature are amongst the elders.

Amid all this strangeness, and not- withstanding the manifold changes, the identity of objects and persons come slowly into the mind until their oneness is complete. So distinct is the child- hood being and the scenes and persons interwoven in it, that it now seems like a pre-existence, an island cut off from the main of life by the years between. That island, being in the presence of scenes which helped to make it, emer- ges from the depths of memory, clad in smiles and hopes, and when the lapsed years are added on, it becomes an in- tegral part of one unbroken life. This process completed, then the past reap- pears like a picture from which the dust and cobwebs have been brushed, and whose features have been retouched.—The lakes, ponds, fields and woods at first look diminutive. There is a time when the world's centre is just where we are, and when a few miles make the circuit of its explored provinces.—The miles then are more than leagues, and all objects are proportionably large. Travel and time dispel the illusion, and objects seen through older eyes, shrink into insignificant proportions. Com- pared with our early conceptions of them, and with the wide, wide world, they are wonderfully small. So it would be probably, with one who should return from the wide expatiations of eternity, to the earth where his being begun, and for the same reasons.

The burying ground is a place of mournful interest; the burying ground where the dead sleep in their kindred dust, and where the green sod is over them, moistened by the dew and made bright with sunbeams. Verily it is mournfully pleasant to be in a grave- yard of friends and kindred. The names are too familiar. We know them all.—Some only in the traditions of the fath- ers, and others as having died long ago. But many of them were school-fellows, neighbors, friends, kindred. Here in one plot is a row of little graves, four in all, with little head and foot-stones to mark them. Of the last one but a single fearful memory is left. The babe that seemed asleep, the tiny coffin, the gentleness and care with which its oc- cupant was put in, the wringing hands and sobs of one who wept more than any of us; the crowd of people who came and took the coffin and the baby and their return no more. This is the picture which time has not effaced. The next one is of peculiar interest to just one other. He was one of two who saw the light at once and were rocked in the same cradle. One was taken and the other was left. It is like anoth- er self under the sod, and strange, strong yearnings are excited to see one so doubly near and yet so totally unknown. More than a score of years he has spent in the silent land. Long and weary years to his cradle-mate, but bright and all glorious to him. Of the other two, maternal story says that they were blue-eyed children, who, like buds in sweetness and beauty, dropped into their grave. Connected with their names are treasured mementoes of au- burn hair nicely curled, and carefully kept, and other memorials, besides the mounds which are here. Dear, dear dust! Thankful for the life and im- mortality revealed in the gospel, the sad heart turns away and rejoices in the light which it sheds upon the graves of those who engross its affec- tions.

Is it not a time for vow-paying and altar building, when any voyageur re- turns to the sanctuary where his fath- ers worshipped, and where, despite the indifference and wildness of boyhood, the word of God made its first indelli- ble impression? Amongst the multi- form instruments which work out the soul's regeneration, those which bear upon its earliest consciousness are most effectual. Not that these consummate the work, nor that they are more pow- erful, but that without them all after influences would be impotent. To meet in the same Sunday-School, which is the same in the sense that a river is whose waters are flowing on evermore, and to find ones-self in the identical church, at the identical hour, and on such a Sunday morning as many of them used to be, is to find ones-self like them that dreamed. From the pulpit, which once impressed like the throne of Jupiter Tonans, each well-remember- ed pew is scanned, and many are the vacant places, none the less vacant be- cause filled by strangers. Some of the absent are where the last paragraph left them, in the grave-yard, and others have found homes and graves in distant lands. A few seats have their original occupants, sitting just as they sat long ago, and listening under slightly varied circumstances. The parents' heads are nearly white and the children no longer children, are men and women, surroun- ded with families of their own. One family group is as it was with an ex- ception, the old people and the two daughters make all now. Their eyes are filled with tears and they are over- come with emotion. The pride and stay of that family was an only son and brother who now sleeps in the cemetery of New Orleans. In early manhood he fell a victim to the prevailing scourge which sweeps away so many of our young men, and throws a life-time shadow over the thresholds that they leave behind. The last envy which lingers in the heart is felt towards them whose treasures of affection death has spared; and that faith must be strong which checks the rising imputa- tation, and without a murmur submits to the election that providence has made.

From these emotions and scenes, let such an one as we have imagined, pass to the very roof-tree under which he was born, and let him stroll over the fields and woods of the old farm. Every spot and thing is a remembrance and fruitful of associations. With a heart wild with excitement, he explores the old house from cellar to garret, exam- ines barns, stables and sheds minutely; climbs the apple trees whose fruit he ate and whose sprouts were terrible; un- til wearied, he throws himself upon the grass and reposes in the ample shade of trees which his own hands have planted. It seems a desecration to find strangers in the old home and the loved ones gone, all gone. The noble dog that chased the cars when we went away, and pined for weeks when his young master did not return, is dead; the ancient geese "that gabbled o'er the pool," and the ducks that quacked in chorus with them, are no more. The weather-cock on the barn's gable still looks the wind in face, and the petit wind-mill beneath it plays as briskly as it played in days of yore. There is the trout brook running briskly, clearly, and as young as ever. The changes are in living things, all living things, but inanimate nature maintains its wonted aspect, and even art withstands the tooth of time better than the hands which execute it.

> "Art is long and time is fleeting,
> And our hearts though stout and brave,
> Still like muffled drums are beating
> Funeral marches to the grave."

The charm of home with the long absent is broken, and all its pleasant associations cannot long interest. The prolonged visit which expectation planned is only half filled when we turn away perhaps forever, and hardly feel a pang at parting.

TESTIMONIAL.—The members of the congregation of Trinity M. E. Church, Thirty-fourth street, on Monday evening, June 31st, says the Advocate and Jour- nal, presented to their late pastor, Rev. Prof. Mattison, a valuable gold watch, as a testimonial of their regard for his services during his connection with that church. The Rev. Dr. Foster, the pres- ent pastor, accompanied the presenta- tion with an appropriate address, which was responded to by Professor M. Af- ter these exercises the sale of pews commenced. The highest price obtain- ed was $860. On Tuesday evening the sale was resumed, and quite a number of pews were rented. This new and beautiful church starts under favorable auspices.

Truth is the flower that seeds the garden of heaven, and candor the work- man who tills it.

FOUR DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

ARRIVAL OF THE EMEU AND ATLANTIC.

The British and North American steamship Emeu, from Havre July 22d, and the Collins steamship At- lantic, from Liverpool July 23d, arrived at New York on the 4th inst., bringing dates up to the time of their sailing.

From papers brought by these steamers we extract the following intelligence:

Great Britain.

The members of the British Cabinet had their an- nual dinner at Greenwich on the 19th of July; and it was thence inferred that Parliament would be pro- rogued in the course of the following week. The House of Commons appears to be in haste to sepa- rate. On the 18th it adopted fourteen bills, and re- jected nearly as many. It was thought probable that the session would be closed on the 27th. It is said that the ceremony of prorogation will be performed by commission.

The London Standard's correspondence from Al- dershott gives the following details in regard to the disturbances recently announced by telegraph:

"Serious disturbances have taken place, on the nights of the 17th and 18th, between the German troops and the 41st regiment, disturbances which, we regret to say, have had fatal results. The cause of the quarrel is at present unknown; but, for some time there has been an alarming state of excitement in the camp. The soldiers of the 41st rushed into their bar- racks and seized their bayonets; the German troops were armed with their sabres, and the result, I learn, has been the death of two German soldiers, and the wounding of several men on both sides. General Crumbie, the brigadier on duty, accompanied by his adjutant general, soon appeared upon the ground. An inquest will be held to ascertain the causes of this deplorable occurrence."

The United Service Gazette announces that the paralysis by which Lord Hardinge has been attacked since he fell in the Queen's saloon, affects half his body. He is consequently almost helpless, and has lost the use of his right arm. He enjoys, neverthe- less, his full mental powers, and is cheerful, notwith- standing his malady.

[From the London Times, July 19.]

THE CENTRAL AMERICAN QUESTION.—We cannot but feel that the justice of the British construction has been acquiesced in by the Government of the United States, when we learn what are the proposi- tions which Mr. Dallas is, it is said, empowered to make. He will, if we are correctly informed, propose the establishment of San Juan as a free port under Nicaraguan sovereignty, reserving to the Republic of Costa Rica the right of the river San Juan, as may be necessary; the Mosquito Indians to be concentrated in a definite territory, which shall leave clear the mouth of the river San Juan and the town; but their rights to be guaranteed, and an annuity for a term paid to the chiefs; the Bay Islands to be restored to the State of Honduras, but Belize to remain a British possession, with the same territorial limits as in 1850.

By this arrangement we merge our separate protec- torate of the Mosquitoes into what may be called a general American protectorate, and we give up the Bay Islands, to which a doubtful occupation had given us an uncertain and still questionable claim.

On the other hand, we avoid urging the United States to abrogate the treaty of 1850, which would expose this part of the world to many evils, which the treaty, inconclusive as it may appear, has dimi- nished.

We fully establish the neutrality of Central Ameri- ca, and raise a moral prohibition against any future filibustering or annexation. That we lose anything material by such an arrangement no one can believe; but still the arrangement should be clearly under- stood to be a compromise, in which the country does not give up its construction of the treaty, but only makes concessions corresponding to those of the American Government in abandoning its own extreme views.

A fifth point in the proposal of Mr. Dallas is that the Central American States shall make grants simi- lar to that promised by Honduras respecting any actual or prospective plan for a communication between the two oceans. If the consent of these republics can be obtained to such an arrangement, it will, no doubt, be a great advantage to the cause of civilization, and cause us less to regret the temporary differences which have ended in such a result.

France.

The senatus consultum concerning the regency of the Empire has been sanctioned and promulgated in the Moniteur.

In the absence of the Emperor from Paris, most of his Ministry having also gone to the summer water- ing places, there is little political intelligence from France.

Italy.

Serious disturbances have broken out at Cesena, in the Papal States, the dearness of provisions serving for pretext.

The position of the Austrian General Crenneville in the Duchy of Parma daily becomes more painful, and it is said that he has several times written to Vienna to solicit his recall. The Emperor Francis Joseph has addressed an autograph letter to the Duchess to jus- tify the conduct of his Generals.

On the 6th of July, a popular demonstration took place at Naples, with cries of Vive la Constitution! vivent les alliés! Several persons were wounded, and the police made numerous arrests.

A Republican conspiracy has been discovered at Tarentum, the city of the Two Sicilies, where ultra Royalist opinion counts the greatest number of adhe- rents. Arrests have been made. It is rumored that the King of Naples thinks of abdicating in favor of the Duke of Calabria, if affairs turn out badly. The Duke, who is a son of Christine of Savoy, would re- establish the constitution of 1848.

The Russian Ambassador at Rome is said to have arranged all difficulties with the Holy See, touching the nomination of the Roman Catholic Bishops for Poland.

Spain.

Saragossa, Barcelona, Logrono and Bilbao are in insurrection. Order prevails at Madrid.

The Madrid Gazette of July 14th contains the de- cree putting Spain under martial law. It is preceded by a preamble, in which it is urged that recent ex- cesses had rendered indispensable the adoption of a new system and of repressive measures.

Marshal Narvaez, who has recently been exiled in France, is expected to return to Spain, to take ad- vantage of the present position of affairs.

The Paris Constitutionnel, of the 21st ult., (morn- ing) says:

"We regret to announce that the direct communi- cations by telegraph with Madrid are interrupted. No news has reached us later than the 17th. The advices received by her before yesterday respecting the critical situation of Saragossa are unhappily confirmed. In- telligence dated Thursday evening has been received at Bayonne, announcing that all Arragon has pro- nounced against O'Donnel, and that Gerrea, at the head of the garrison and the people, was master of Saragossa. It is added that the Cortes have gone to hold their session in that city, where eighty-five mem- bers, the great majority of the assembly had arrived. This is serious news. We trust that it is exaggerated, at least so far as the number of deputies assembled at Saragossa is concerned."

On the other hand, we read in the Messager de Bayonne:

"In consequence of the events which have just oc- curred at Madrid, the Government has by telegraph arrested en transitu thirteen millions of francs ship- ped to Bayonne on the 12th. These funds will remain at Vittoria until further orders."

These thirteen millions of francs had been sent to Spain by the Credit Mobilier.

Marshal Espartero does not appear to have quitted Madrid. Some letters say that he is under surveil- lance in the house to which he retired after having left the hotel of the presidency of the council. An- other correspondence pretends that, on the contrary, he has shut himself up and refused to take part in events. This latter correspondence comes to the Agence Havas, under date of Madrid, July 17th:

"The Government triumphed completely on the evening of the 16th. Gen. Espartero has remained shut up in his hotel, taking no part in what occurred. On the 16th, the number of killed and wounded was about 200. At the head of the new ayuntamiento figures the Marquis de Perales, formerly Governor of Madrid. The first measures of the new Government are conciliatory and moderate."

The Paris Presse publishes the following dis- patches:

"BARCELONA, July 19th—Evening.—Tranquility is re-established. The militia have been disarmed and dissolved.

"Junguera has pronounced against the new govern- ment."

MOBILE ITEMS.—First Bale of New Cotton.—The Advertiser of Sunday morning says:

The first bale of cotton of the new crop was re- ceived here by the steamer Fairfield yesterday. It was grown on the plantation of Mr. J. M. Gonder, in Lowndes county, Ala., and was shipped at Benton, consigned to Messrs. Harrison & Bostwick. It is of good color, a little cut in the ginning, and classes about middling fair. It has not yet been sold. The first bale in 1855 was received on the 5th of August, (from Marengo county,) and in 1853 and 1854 on the 7th August.

One moment! what an effect it produces upon years! One moment! virtue, crime, glory, shame, woe, rapture rest upon it? Death itself is but a mo- ment, yet eternity is its successor!

NEW ORLEANS:

SATURDAY, AUGUST 16, 1856.

HEALTH.—Never better. Dr. Austin informs us that on Monday last there were fewer admissions into the Hospital, by three, than has occured within the last twenty years.

WHAT, NO NEWS!—So remarked a friend on visiting our sanctum the other day and receiving a reply to his question—"What's the news?" This does not indicate deadness in the church, but healthful life rather. No schisms to record, no startling heresies, no exciting quarrels and piped wars. Preachers have nothing to do but preach the gospel and keep up wholesome discipline and attend to the benevolent claims of the church. The people have nothing to do but grow in grace, get sinners converted, build their meeting houses, endow their institutions and attend worship. O, what a blessed state of things! Now have our churches peace—while many others, alas, are torn and disquieted. Let us improve the season. News about revivals—that is the best. Let us have it.

SOUTHERN METHODIST QUARTERLY.—The number for July has reached its subscribers before this. To them we need not speak of its merits or interest. But to those of our people and other people, who not de take it we say that they are losing more than the value of the subscription $2 per annum. Plenum sed.

MOTIVES.—This article though long, will repay perusal and provoke reflection. It is well to search the motives upon which our moral life is "bottomed;" whether love is the alone motive of the Christian—or with hope and fear shares dominion. The author has high views of the moral perfectibility of man through Jesus, and his ability is even more manifest. He is a young man, polished by education and full of thought, and with characteristic bravery is disposed to display the points of apparent difference between himself and the "pampered theologies," and to indulge a needless tone of defiance. But he is taking practical lessons in circuit riding with one of the old men—being the junior of Rev. E. Hearn on Cedar Creek—and will doubtless come around right with 'orthodoxy,' and become a regular mill-horse-track Methodist preacher of the best sort. Heaven and Hell! They are, if not motives, mighty factors. And the only successful ministry uses them. There is much in the article that appeals successfully to christian consciousness and could have sprung only from it.

ANNALS OF SOUTHERN METHODISM.—Several copies of this admirable annual for 1855 are now for sale at McGinnis' 36 Camp street. It is important to the church that the author have sufficient encouragement to continue this series, from year to year. Any one who feels any interest in its varied matter, will get more out of it than the worth of one dollar.

COLLEGE AND SCHOOL ADVERTISEMENTS.—We have a number of these and refer our patrons to them with confidence.—Consult our Directory—if you want a good place to send your sons or daughters to for instruction—mental and moral.

We have the satisfaction of knowing that these advertisements, in our columns, have been the means of securing many students to those Institutions, in preference to others, we would not be so willing to vouch for.

As this is an advantage to the Institutions themselves we suggest to those having charge of them the wisdom of advertising in the Advocate. Nor must they think hard of paying our very low rates. The printer must live.

CONVICTED UNDER A SONG.—The Texas Christian Advocate vouches for this case, at a protracted meeting—

"At the same meeting Mr. G—— was convicted from hearing Rev. Dr. C. Wells, sing "Give me Jesus" etc. He left the stand, returned to the woods (as he afterwards said) believing that he was ruined without Jesus; that night he was happily converted to God." Why not? God is not restricted in the use of means; and no question this has been honored much in conviction of sinners and comfort of believers. The talent of singing can be put to good account in His service. Would that it were more generally cultivated.

LIBERALITY OR JUSTICE.—The Government street Presbyterian church of Mobile, Ala., pay their pastor, the Rev. Dr. Mandeville, an annual salary of $3,000. He has lately received from the people of his charge permission to travel for three months, and a present of $500 to pay his expenses.

BROOKS AND BURLINGAME.

BAD EXAMPLES, BOTH.

The attempted duel between Messrs. Brooks and Burlingame, has occupied a a larger share of public attention than the merits of the parties to such an affair deserve. But in its bearings on public and private morality, it is an incident that should not be passed over lightly. It is a sad mark of the low standard of morals that is recognized by too many of our politicians and their constituents.

The whole country has been demoralized. From the time a heavy cane was used by a member of the lower House of Congress upon the uncovered head of a member of the upper House, while the latter was sitting, writing, in the Senate Chamber, on account of words spoken in debate, to the last duel note passed between the principals and their friends, a baneful influence and scandalous example have been at work.

Mr. Sumner we suspect "possums" with his sore head—makes the most of it, that Black Republicanism may make capital. He goes about adorned with bandages, and his bloody shirt rouses public meetings. That was an untimely and unlucky and impolitic blow, to say the least. The South owes Mr. Brooks no thanks for it. His violence lost her some good friends and gained her none. As a native of that State, and proud of her chivalry and traditions, we speak the more freely. Calhoun served South Carolina and the South, but not that way. The treatment which the vile-mouthed creature, occupying a seat once honored by Webster, seemed to conrt, he unfortunately got. Was it wise to make a martyr of him?

Besides all this; the cudgeling, challenging, dueling code is not right. Can the government be administered upon it? Can Christianity approve it? Let thoughtful people take care how they seem to endorse these things.

Testimonials have been got up for Mr. Brooks, in bad taste. A gold headed cane was forwarded by a public meeting in Hinds county, Miss., with this inscription, "This one will not break."

Indeed it is understood that Mr. Brooks has collected quite a curiosity shop—he has preserved in heaps the abusive letters poured upon him by every mail from the North, couched in language the Five Points might vainly emulate, and side by side with them the complimentary votes of Southern meetings, gold-mounted canes, goblets, tankards and pitchers without number. Among the rest a walking-cane with the words "Use knock-down arguments," is presented by Northern Sea Captains sailing out of the Southern ports.

Urged by feeling rather than reason, the South is in danger of standing "second" to her chivalrous but misguided member. The North too must "second" the dodging Burlingame. And so, as a people, we are all to be in for it.

Christian father, beware how you set these matters before your sons. Beware lest the lesson of your life be counteracted in their minds by your acquiescence in the violence and sin of high places. Bring your general principles to bear upon this series of acts as steadily as though your State Legislature or village or county were the scene of them. It is wrong, all wrong. The telegraph may be burdened with dispatches giving the status of the Brooks and Burlingame affair. It may be the theme of flippant and brave editorials and letter writers. It may be the talk of the street corner—the toast of the wine table. But if your principles are right, it is all wrong, grievously wrong, and if pursued, ruinous.

The sterling merits of those Southern statesmen who in wisdom, vigilance and dignity manage our federal interests in these threatening times, are quite eclipsed by the vulgar notriety of Mr. Brooks. This is a political injustice and a moral evil.

The youth of the land and the hope of it are in danger of taking up false and pernicious views. To be a good shot—to give the lie in debate—to cane an opponent—to conduct a challenging correspondence, will come to be considered the perfection of honor and statesmanship. The christian pulpit and press have been teaching that duelling is a barbarity, a murder. It is against God's law, by intention and act. It is a false standard of courage, for more courage is required to decline than accept a challenge. It is a miscalled code of honor. As the fear of God is the beginning of wisdom, so the fear of man is the consummation of all folly. And shall we go back from all this, because the offence is done in Washington and the offenders are Congressmen? God forbid.

THAT DEAR OLD SOUL.—"There are three classes into which all the women past seventy that I ever knew were to be divided: 1. That dear old soul; 2. That old woman; 3. That old witch."—[Coleridge.

WANTED.

AN OLD ADVERTISEMENT RENEWED.

A friend looking over the Advocate a fortnight ago, read alond the following paragraph:

AN OLD ADVERTISEMENT OF 1568.—"Wanted, stout, active man, who fears the Lord and can carry two hundred weight."

"Yes," he remarked, "such a man has always been in demand—he is wanted now, in 1856."

Take care of your health. Train your children and school your pupils in reference to bodily robustness. "Stout" is an item of the advertisement—not large but bravely strong, as that word was understood three hundred years ago.—What is the use of a mind well disciplined and well stored, but fixed in a diseased, complaining body? Like a strong engine in a shell of a boat, it can't be worked at half its power lest it shakes the timbers to pieces. Mens sana in corpore sano is what is wanted.

He must "carry two hundred pounds," sometimes a little more, and not stagger under it. There is responsibility to be borne by somebody. WANTED, a man that won't shirk—that can be relied on—that don't go about pulling and whining of his sacrifices.

It is not required that he weigh two hundred. But in any case he must carry more than his own weight.

Activity is requisite. Not an aimless bustling about—but to be on hand wherever wanted. The Lord wants not simply preachers but laborers for his vineyard.

One has well said, "The measure of our endurance is the measure of our manliness."

What man can do, and how he can endure, before the tendons give way and the immortal part confesses its mortal copartnership, like the ductility and mallability of metal, can be told only after trial. That there is steel somewhere in man, and a touch of divine endurance, every one's experience attests. In some there is that strongly woven granulation and fine fibre which can hardly be parted by any power; which may be woven round and around, like thread, without sundering. In others, there is the brittleness of glass.

Read by the light of one's personal experience how divinely grand and heroic do some of the great world martyrs stand out upon the page of history.—Beaded drops may be rolling in hot channels down their cheeks, and an agonized corrugated front make their brows as mountainous as the Alps and its valleys; a groan may find faint utterance, but naught can wring from them anything more than the preface and inscription to the historia non scripta of their suffering. Such men may go under, like others, but when they do, depend upon it, something of the true, noble, manly principle of primitive heroism, goes with them.

WANTED, for the home missions—for foreign missions—for the District, the Circuit, the Station. WANTED for the professorial and editorial chairs. WANTED for stewards and class-leaders.—WANTED for the heads of Christian families and for many a private station.—WANTED for the bench and the bar.—WANTED for the State and the army. Mark.—It is indispensable that "he fears the Lord." Faith makes the highest order of heroes. A supreme regard to God, and that alone, will direct, consecrate, sweeten, sustain and reward his doings and sufferings. Duty done, as unto the Lord; is well done.

WANTED—SUCH A MAN.—Steady employment—good wages.

THE MISSOURI MOB.

We were right in correcting a telegraphic report, a month ago, that an Annual Conference of the M. E. Church, North, had been mobbed in Missouri.—The facts have been a good while in getting out. Now they are out we give them from the Presiding Elder of the District, in a letter to the St. Louis Christian Advocate. He bases his correcting statement upon a letter that had appeared in the same paper:

The impression intended to be made by the quotation from this letter, is that the M. E. Church, South, is responsible for the difficulty at Rochester, in this county. This insinuation is absolutely and unqualifiedly FALSE and SLANDEROUS. I will give the facts in regard to the Rochester difficulty: Rochester has been one of the strongholds of Northernism in this county. Sometime in May, two members of the Topeka Legislature fled from Kansas and came to Rochester. The Southern men of the town and vicinity held a mass meeting, the proceedings of which I send you and wish you to publish. On the 10th of June there was a difficulty at Rochester between a young man named Simmons, pro-slavery, and a free-soiler named Hardesty, in which Simmons was shot by Hardesty, and died some eight days afterwards.—About a week after this was the day of preaching by Rev. Mr. Sellers, a North Methodist. He and his friends were waited upon the day before his appointment and requested not to preach. They would not consent. They were then told they should not preach, to which they replied they would. They were appealed to on the day of preaching without success. Sellers was taken from the storehouse in Rochester and tarred, but not feathered. During the excitement an old man named Holland, a Northern Methodist, was shot and killed. These are substantially the facts in the case, so far as I know. Efforts have been made in this country to fasten these difficulties upon Southern Methodists. In view of this I wish to state a few facts in this connection.

1st, Among the names published in the proceedings of the mass meeting at Rochester, there is not one Southern Methodist.

2d. In the town of Rochester and immediate vicinity, there is not a single member of the M. E. Church, South, so far as I know.

3d. On the day of the last difficulty in Rochester, when Sellers was tarred and Holland was killed, there was only one Southern Methodist present, a least I have heard but one, and that was Col. James McDonald, Mayor of this city, who was there to use his influence to keep peace and order, and not to abuse and mob any one.

EDUCATIONAL CONVENTIONS.

Two important meetings have been held lately. One met in Selma, Ala., July 23d. From the Mobile Advertiser we quote:

Dr. L. C. Garland, (President of the University of Alabama) was called to the chair, and Professor H. F. Larrabee was appointed Secretary. Some forty-odd members were present, consisting of teachers, superintendents of schools, professors in colleges, and others now or formerly actively engaged in education, from various parts of the State. Several interesting questions connected with education were discussed.

The Convention resolved itself into a permanent organization, under the designation of "The Alabama Educational Association." The regular meetings of the Association are to be held annually; the general control of its affairs in the interval is entrusted to a "Standing Committee," composed of the officers and five other members—all of whom are elected by the Association.

The following gentlemen were elected officers for the ensuing year: Landon C. Garland, L. L. D., (President of the University,) President; W. F. Perry, of Montgomery, (State Superintendent of Education) and W. T. Walthall, of Mobile, Vice Presidents; H. F. Larrabee, of Summerfield, Dallas county, Corresponding Secretary; M. J. Woodruff, of Tuscaloosa Recording Secretary; and J. T. Dunklin, of Selma, Treasurer.

The other members of the Standing Committee, are Professor John Darby, of Auburn, Messrs. D. F. Merrill, of Mobile, W. C. L. Richardson, of Dallas county, A. W. Richardson, of Wilcox, and E. J. McWhorter, of Montgomery.

Messrs. W. F. Perry, J. Darby and Rev. W. S. Barton were appointed delegates to the American Association for the advancement of education.

Other Committees were appointed; on text-books, to make arrangements for lectures and essays, etc.

The proceedings of the Convention attracted much interest among the citizens of Selma. Able and interesting lectures were delivered during its progress, by Professor Darby, on "Female Colleges;" by W. F. Perry, Esq., on the Common School System of Alabama, and finally at the close of the Convention, by Dr. Garland, on "American Colleges." These lectures were heard by large and attentive audiences.—At the close of the last, the following resolution was offered by one of the members from Mobile: "Resolved, That the thanks of the Convention be tendered to the President for the classical, eloquent, conservative, christian, and truly noble address, to which we have just listened; and that he be requested to furnish a copy for publication."

At ten o'clock on the evening of the second day the Association adjourned, to meet at Selma on the Tuesday after the third Monday in July, 1857.

The other met at same time in Richmond, Virginia, upon the call of Gov. Wise. It also was largely attended and its deliberations excited no little outside interest. These movements are in the right direction. It takes a good while to set things agoing, but they will go. We quote from the Delta:

There were no less than four Presidents of different colleges, and at least thirty Acting Professors of colleges present. The rest were alumni, and scholars and gentlemen of distinction interested on the subject of education. About them there was a total absence of cant, and although there were several reverend gentlemen in the Convention, and its proceedings opened with prayer, an air and tone of well known gentility and liberality of views pervaded their entire proceedings. I append a sketch of their proceedings. The Southern Literary Messenger, published in this city, it is understood, will contain in its next issue a full account of the Convention, with short sketches of the speeches made. It was stated that Virginia University was overflowing with students, many of whom should more properly be at high academies and colleges, preparing themselves by a more thorough discipline for its lectures. It was agreed that those who entered the University, after having first passed through some college, derived most advantage from its course. It was thought that no one younger than eighteen or nineteen should enter there.

One pleasing feature of the Convention was the entire absence of anything like sectarian jealousy, although there were Professors from Baptist, Presbyterian, Episcopal, and Methodist Colleges.

The subject of normal schools, for the education of Southern teachers for Southern schools was freely discussed and its great importance eloquently insisted upon. Prof. McGuffey, of Virginia University, was appointed chairman of a committee to report upon proper text books for Southern schools and colleges, and from his well known ability and familiarity with the subject there can be no doubt the matter will be admirably treated. There were present at the convention several gentlemen connected with private schools of much celebrity—located in different parts of the State—and from the scholarship and character of their students prepared for the University—standing to it much in the relation of the schools Eton and Rugby to the English Universities. The high standard of scholarship and strict discipline of these schools, it was asserted in the convention, had much effect in producing the recent improvements in the Colleges and University. Perhaps the most attractive feature of the convention was the simple and unostentatious mingling of Gov. Wise in its proceedings. He declined the delivery of any formal address, but participated freely in the discussions and evinced a familiarity with the improved systems of education in Europe, as well as of the wants of the South, that added quite as much as his eloquence to the interest of his remarks. Committees were appointed on different subjects, and the Convention adjourned to meet again in the autumn, when these reports will be received, and its proceedings published in a permanent form.

The Methodist Educational Institute whose annual meeting is in Nashville will find its work growing in public estimation. We hope it will keep abreast of this movement if not before it.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Our third Quarterly meeting for Waterproof Circuit, held at Wesley Chapel the last Saturday and Sunday in July was a season of mercy and success. Six persons joined the church and a general interest upon the subject of religion was apparent.

Circumstances prevented our protracting, but the following Saturday we commenced another meeting at the same place, which from its commencement was marked by a deep state of religious feeling pervading the large and attentive congregation. We protracted this meeting until Tuesday evening, having two services each day, besides altar exercises. Twenty three persons joined the church during this meeting. At the close Bro. Harp organized a Sunday-School and interested the late converts in this good cause.

The church is in an unfinished condition but the last day of the meeting steps were taken for finishing it in complete style, and at the least possible delay. We reckon the revival at Wesley Chapel, all things considered, one of the best on the district this year.

TAKING A DOG BY THE EARS.

This is a bad business, for the dog is a bad animal and the ears a bad hold. And bad as it is to hold on, it is worse to let go.

Such is the case saith Solomon, of the man that passing by, meddleth with a strife belonging not to him. He is "like one that taketh a dog by the ears."

Herein is an infirmity that certain generous souls, slightly touched with the atrabilions, suffer much for. They are disposed to resent in others whatever is uncongenial, and are seldom without a difficulty on their hands which the more prudent escape. These last observe another's weak point. One is vain, but they do not feel called on to mortify his vanity. Or puffed up, but it is not theirs to prick him and let out the wind. Peaceable relations are maintained. Without having specially flattered his weakness, the weak one counts them his "best friends." They do not shut their eyes to discovery of character, but lay it up; it may help to get along with that person, or perchance to use him, some day.

Not so with your social knight. He must abate this nuisance—stop this blatterer. The creature of pretension and groundless popularity shall not pass for more than his worth. He shall know that he is known. Nay more, he shall be shown up, too. Impatience at the sight of unmerited honor cannot be suppressed. Good intentions notwithstanding, society will give him small thanks for setting a fool's cap on the head of the creature that bestrides it. Or coming down to the level of our figure, society will leave him and the dog he has taken by the ears to have it out.

Mackenzie's Man of Feeling has it well:

"I have observed one ingredient, somewhat necessary in man's composition toward happiness, which people of feeling would do well to acquire; a certain respect for the follies of mankind; for there are so many fools whom the opinion of the world entitles to regard, whom accident has placed in heights of which they are unworthy, that he who cannot restrain his contempt or indignation at the sight, will quarrel with the disposal of things which is allotted to himself."

We quote from Solomon again:—"Strive not with a man without cause, if he hath done thee no harm." This rule of contest would considerably narrow the range of difficulties that vex life. It would be straining it beyond context and analogy to cite such a passage as justifying a selfish unconcern for all grievances but our own. An indifferentism that sees truth fall in the streets without a champion—and when the innocent and he that hath no helper cries, pleads non-intervention as a cloak of inhumanity and cowardice.

Peter and Paul gave warning to "busy-bodies in other men's matters." And the former lays down a simple recipe for him that would have any pleasure of his life and see good days, "let him seek peace and ensue it."

In every conference, convention, association, assembly and such like, there is work for some one to do, requiring promiscuous and self-sacrificing bravery. He must be incalculating of consequences—see with but one eye, and have large and morbidly developed combativeness. He is sometimes called the meat axe. In fact, he is the man that takes the dog by the ears. His is an interesting but thankless vocation. He plays the Solicitor General without fee; attacks abuses for which others are responsible; lampoons faulty officials; and whatever the case is, brings the indictment. Every body by turns, likes and dislikes him, and in time there is a general grudge. Sympathisers of to-day were sufferers yesterday, or may be to-morrow; they therefore look on at a distance. The end is that, though well meaning, he has soured his spirit, frittered away his influence, plagued his life, punished other people's enemies and multiplied his own.

Friendship is a heart-joy. It is also safety. There are times when the heart is stout and brave. The reformer lays about him boldly and with abandon—strikes right and left. If men don't like it, they can lump it. What cares he! In consciousness of strength he rather exults at the host arrayed against him. He fears not. He will stand alone!

But anon, a feeling of loneliness comes over him when the sympathy of his cast-off and defied fellow beings is wanted. A time of fearfulness and heart-sinking, when he wishes he had not an enemy in the world. A time of weariness of all this watching and warfare, when he would fain find refuge in the bosom of confidence and solace in love. The weakest and meanest foe adds to the sense of uneasiness and insecurity, and increases a felt conspiracy against his welfare, already exposed at too many points.

At such times self-inquisition will be made, not without self-reproach, whether some of these enmities have not been incurred without cause.

It is better to have a dog to be your friend than your enemy. And as the dignity of this sentiment will bear propping, we give that apocriphal authority, the Son of Sirach, for it.

New Books.

POSTHUMOUS WORKS OF THE REV. HENRY B. BASCOM, D. D. L. L. D., one of the Bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. Edited by the Rev. Thomas N. Ralston, A. M., Nashville: Stevenson & Evans. Vols. iii and iv. Price $1 each.

A brace of beautifully printed books have been laid on our table—they are the third and fourth volumes of Bishop Bascom's Works. The first volume contains a Lecture on Moral Science, twenty-seven Lectures on Mental Science, twenty-one Lectures on Moral and Political Philosophy, a Lecture on Natural Theology, and a Glance at the History and Philosophy of Letters. The fourth volume consists of twenty-one "Sermons and Sketches of Sermons, from the Pulpit"—all of them having the ring of the genuine Bascomian metal. The Lectures are very short, being the briefs used by the author in the course of his professional life. Some of them appear to date back as far as the time when he was professor in Alleghany College. This will account for the crude and loose statements in the Lecture on Slavery, the author's views on that subject not having been at that time matured. They subsequently underwent a great modification, as every one knows who has read his publications on that vexed question. Indeed the common sense of the reader will suggest that such must have been the case, or Dr. Bascom never would have been a Bishop in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. So notorious is this fact, that the editor has inserted the Lectures without note or comment. On certain other points the reader will perhaps dissent from the author—particularly in some of the Lectures on Moral and Political Philosophy. It must be borne in mind that the Lectures were left in the state of ipsissima membra—that on the Sabbath, for example, appears to be eked out by a fragment on reverencing the Deity—and the Introductory Lecture on Mental Science seems to be, for the most part, the recapitulation of a preceding course—all of them having been guarded, explained and enlarged in the lecture-room at the time of their delivery. It is due to both the author and the editor that these considerations should be borne in mind in the perusal of these posthumous publications. We can very readily believe the editor when he tells us that he had a world of labor to decipher, arrange, and transcribe the matter contained in the three volumes which have been brought out under his supervision. Indeed we are greatly surprised to find the lectures so complete. They evince the intellectual strength, verbal opulence and peculiar style of the lamented and distinguished author; and we doubt not thousands of readers will be grateful to the laborious and persevering editor for rescuing from oblivion the valuable remains of one, the singular eloquence of whose voice enchanted and overwhelmed admiring multitudes during life, and who, being dead, yet speaketh in these eloquent and instructive pages.

BAPTISM.—A Treatise on the Nature, Perpetuity, Subjects, Administrator, Mode and Use of, the Initiating Ordinance of the Christian Church.—With an Appendix, containing Strictures on Dr. Howell's "Evils of Infant Baptism," Plates illustrating the Primitive Mode of Baptism, etc., By Thos. D. Summers, D. D., 12mo., pp. 252; price 65 cents retail—30 per cent discount to wholesale purchasers. Nashville: Stevenson & Evans.

The agents have brought out another handsome edition of our book on Baptism. As the copyright of this work belongs to the Publishing House, and we, of course, have no financial interest in its circulation, we hope it will not be considered improper for us to bespeak for this edition a rapid sale. Its publication has elicited a vast number of replies in the shape of books, newspaper articles and the like; but, nothing has been said in answer to our arguments which demand any modification of the work as originally issued. We do not like to say much about our own book—the Bishops and editors of the church have spoken of it in terms a great deal more exalted than we should choose to employ; though the fact of our allowing it to be published is an evidence that we did not consider that any other work on the subject would exactly fill its place. The late editor of the Methodist Quarterly Review, the Rev. Dr. McClintock, has given the following brief digest of its contents and opinion of its character: "This volume differs from ordinary books on the subject, in treating at some length of the 'Administrator of Baptism,' and of the 'Use of Baptism'—points rarely noticed, or, if at all, very inadequately discussed, in the current treatises. It differs from them also, and very happily, in the clearness of its arrangement, in the aptness with which the joints of the discussion fit each other, and in the discrimination with which important points are brought out strongly, while minor ones are comparatively thrown into abeyance. The first chapter treats of the nature of baptism. Chapter ii. shows that baptism is of perpetual obligation in the Church, and chapter iii., that the Scriptures require it to be conferred upon infants as well as upon believing adults. This chapter is elaborated with great care, and is forcible and convincing, not only in its direct proofs, but also in its replies to Anabaptist objections. Dr. Summers takes the ground, clearly and strongly, that children are members of the Christian Church. The fourth chapter gives a rapid historical sketch of the various views that have prevailed with regard to the validity of lay baptism, etc., from the earliest period to the present time. Chapter fifth treats of the 'Mode of Baptism' at length, and with great ability. The sixth and last chapter, on the 'Use of Baptism,' is one of the most valuable in the book. Dr. Summers holds that baptism is not regeneration, nor its necessary condition or instrument, but that it subserves the threefold purpose of signifying to us the mercy and grace of God—of ratifying our title to covenant blessings, and pledging our discharge of the corresponding obligations—and of ministering to our sanctification. He rejects the Calvinistic theory, that only the children of believing parents are to be baptized; and shows, at the same time, that it is inconsistent with the fundamental principle of Calvinism as such. In an appendix Dr. Summers reviews Howell's 'Evils of Infant Baptism" with keen discrimination and some severity. We cordially commend this little volume as one of the best summaries of Christian doctrine on the subject of Baptism that has come under our notice."

CEREMONIES OF MODERN JUDAISM.—By Herman Baer. With an Introduction by Thos. O. Summers, D. D. Nashville: Stevenson & Evans—1856. 18mo—pp. 248.

Some portions of this work were published in the New Orleans and Southern Christian Advocates.—They were read with great interest, and the desire was expressed that they should be developed into a volume. This has been done in a very satisfactory manner. The value of the work is increased by several elegant and truthful pictorial illustrations. The author is a Jew—a Hebrew of the Hebrews—yet a sincere believer in Christ. As an educated Israelite, he is familiarly acquainted with the ceremonies of Modern Judaism; and as an enlightened Christian he knows what estimate to place upon them. He can appreciate the full meaning and force of our Lord's denunciations of the hypocritical Scribes and Pharisees for binding heavy burdens and grievous to be borne, and laying them on men's shoulders,—making broad their phylacteries and enlarging the borders of their garments—making long prayers and devouring widows' houses—paying tithe of mint, and anise, and cummin, and omitting the weightier matters of the law, judgment, mercy and faith—and making the Word of God of none effect through their tradition which they had delivered. He can also emphasize the inquiry of Peter, "Why tempt ye God to put a yoke upon the neck of the disciples, which neither our fathers nor we were able to bear?" It is devoutly hoped that this book on Jewish Ceremonies may fall into the hands of some of the author's "brethren after the flesh," that they will give it a candid perusal, and then compare the system which it unfolds with that of Jesus Christ, and of whom Moses wrote, and to whom "give all the people witness, that through his name whosoever believeth in him shall receive remission of sins." Let them come to him, with all their bondage of sin, as well as ceremonies, and he will emancipate them from both; and if the Son shall make them free, they shall be free indeed! How glorious must that liberty be to those who have been all their lifetime subject to such bondage as that of the Jews! The Christian reader will peruse this work on Jewish Ceremonies with uncommon interest. The author is a foreigner by birth—a native of Germany—yet he has acquired a critical acquaintance with our language, and uses it with as much facility and force as if it were his vernacular tongue. His familiar acquaintance with Rabbinical Judaism, and his deep sympathy with the house of Israel, notwithstanding his professional Christianity, make his testimony in the premises entirely reliable and peculiarly valuable. We have submitted large portions of his book to the inspection of a learned Rabbi, who assures us that he has found scarcely a point in it not one of importance—to which he could take exception. Indeed we know not how he could, as large portions of the work are faithfully translated from Talmudical writings which are accessible to the literati among the Jews; and other portions are derived from personal acquaintance with the religious customs of the Jews, the author in life being quorum pars. The contents are as follows: The Sabbath—Every-day Life among the Jews—Domestic Life—Marriages—Births—Scribe, Hazan, and Rabbi—Various Ceremonial Laws—Remarks on Jewish Character—Sickness, Death and Burial—New Moons—Passover—Pentecost—Fast Days—New Year—Feast of Gedeliah—Week of Repentance—Day of Atonement—Feast of Tabernacles—Feast of Lights—Feast of Esther—The Talmud—Rabbinical Literature—Conclusion.

PURITANISM—Considered with peculiar reference to the M. E. Church, South. By the Rev. W. J. Sasnett, of Emory College. Edited by Thomas O. Summers, D. D., Nashville, Stevenson & Evans. pp. 320—price 80 cents.

The agents have just issued a new edition of this valuable work. The circulation of a book like this tells well for the Church—it is a good sign. By the way, we see the Christian Advocate and Journal speaks in good terms of Progress, hating of course certain passages, as the book is true as steel to the South.

From the Richmond Christian Advocate.

Origin of the Passage "In the Midst of Life we are in Death."

Your readers doubtless remember the story of the great Robert Hall, who was preparing a sermon on these words, presuming that they were to be found somewhere in the Scriptures, but discovered that they belonged only to the burial service of the Church of England. But many have desired to know whence they were originally derived; and it was with peculiar pleasure that I was enabled to trace the origin of the whole passage in the Burial Service, which begins with these words, by means of the beautiful work, just published, the "Lyra Germanica." The preface says, "The hymn 'in the midst of life' was translated by Luther in 1524, is founded in a more ancient hymn of Notker, a Benedictine of St. Onll, who died in 912. He is said to have composed it while watching some workmen who were building the bridge of Martinbruck at the peril of their lives. It was soon set to music and became universally known; indeed it was used as a battle song, until the custom was forbidden on account of its being supposed to exercise magical influences. In a German version it formed part of the service for burial as early as the 13th century, and is still preserved in an unmetrical form in the burial service of our own Church."

The following is the metrical form of the hyme, as composed by Luther, which I doubt not your readers will be pleased to see:

"In the midst of life, behold
Death hath girt us round—
Whom for help then shall we pray,
Where shall grace be found?
In Thee, O Lord, alone.
We rue the evil we have done
That Thy wrath on us hath drawn.
Holy Lord and God!
Strong and holy God!
Merciful and holy Saviour!
Eternal God!
Sink us not beneath
Bitter pains of endless death,
Kyrie Eleison!

"In the midst of death, the jaws
Of hell against us gape,
Who from peril dire as this
Openeth us escape?
'Tis Thou, O Lord, alone.
Our bitter suffering and our sin
Pity from Thy mercy win,
Holy Lord and God!
Strong and holy God!
Merciful and holy Saviour!
Eternal God!
Let us not despair
For the fire that burneth there,
Kyrie Eleison!

"In the midst of hell, our sins
Drive us to despair;
Whither shall we flee from them?
Where is refuge, where?
In Thee, Lord Christ, alone!
For Thou hast shed Thy precious blood,
All our sins Thou makest good,
Holy Lord and God!
Strong and holy God!
Merciful and holy Saviour!
Eternal God!
Let us never fall
From true faith's hope for all,
Kyrie Eleison!

TEMPORAL BLESSINGS.

Wish for them cautiously,
Ask for them submissively,
Want them contentedly,
Obtain them honestly,
Accept them humbly,
Manage them prudently,
Employ them lawfully,
Impart them liberally,
Esteem them moderately,
Increase them virtuously,
Use them subserviently,
Forego them easily,
Resign them willingly.

Providential Mission of Religious Denominations.

History is diviner than we are apt to think; the wanderings of the human spirit after truth are not all delusion and loss; extremes, however terrible, have instruction in them which could never otherwise be realized; and antagonisms of opinion have displayed or called forth a mental tension with which the world could ill dispense. It has been the providential mission of one party to maintain the validity of divine authority in religion; it has been the mission of another, to advocate the claims of reason and the light that is within us; it has oftimes been the aim of a third to reconcile the claims of the two, and bring the Christian world into harmony and peace. By few, comparatively, has it been seen that we should pursue the ascendancy either of authority or of reason at a dear rate; yea, that it were an unfruitful repose to contemplate a perfect reconciliation of the two before the fullness of the time has come; but that in their very antagonism we have the secret spring of real progress, and that, in the continual separation effected by the reason, we are marching onwards to an ever higher, broader and more catholic unity, in the clear comprehension of all that is truly important in divine authority.—[Morell's Philosophy of Religion.

DEATHS.

Died—In Macon county, Ala., on the 9th July, 1856, S. T. WIMBERLY, infant son of T. and Henrietta Wimberly, aged 1 year 7 months and 7 days.

"Suffer the little children to come unto me and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of God."

WM. H. NEAL.

Died—On the 29th July, in Carroll county, Miss., Mrs. MARY L. PURCELL, after a lingering illness, aged about thirty years.

In early life she embraced religion and joined the M. E. Church at Tuscaloosa, Ala., and continued a steadfast and consistent member of that church, and a zealous and uncompromising disciple of her Saviour. Her last illness, though severe, was patiently borne. She gave evidence of her preparation for the solemn change and received in hope of a glorious immortality. Her husband is left a disconsolate companion, her bereaved children have been and desolate friends mourn, but not as those who have no hope: Farewell beloved and departed spirit, for a while. Farewell. J. H. A.

OVERFLOW OF LAST ISLAND.

Terrible Loss of Life.

Mr. Starr S. Jones, of the Opelousas Railroad Express, yesterday afternoon brought us the melancholy news of the complete overflow of Last Island and the destruction of every house and probable drowning of every person on the Island. He says that the steamer Star, which was lying there at the time of the gale, went ashore on the Island and bilged near where Bergah's Hotel had stood. As there was, at the time of the gale, upwards of one hundred and forty human beings on the Island, we await further intelligence from them with the greatest anxiety. We must confess that we entertain very little hopes for their safety; unless they succeeded in getting on the wreck of the Star, they must have all perished. Their position, too, on the wreck would be extremely perilous, as but few persons could remain long on a wreck completely swept by breakers in such a gale as that of Sunday and Monday. Immediately on the receipt of the above intelligence at Tigerville, the former Major Aubrey left for the scene of the disaster with the hope to arrive there in time to relieve those who were supposed to be clinging to the wreck of the Star.

Mr. Jones also informed us that it was reported at Tigerville, that the Island of Caillou had suffered a terrible disaster, and that every soul on it had perished; but leaves for there this morning.

LATER.—We learn from a gentleman from Last Island, who escaped in a sail boat, that many persons were on the wreck of the Star, some of whom had their limbs broken, and all were suffering for food and water. Mr. Thibedoux, Widow Claiborne Thibedoux, Mr. Scaddy, Mr. Ellis, one of the Mr. Muggah's, and Mr. Hart, were known to be lost. There was two feet water on the Island, and several sail boats that had started for the relief of those who were clinging to the wreck of the Star, were supposed to be lost. Many prominent citizens of the State, with their families, are supposed to have been on the island, we shall await further intelligence with much anxiety.

A FISH STORY.—From the Mobile Tribune we copy the following:

PORTERSVILLE, August 8, 1856:

Yesterday, the men in hauling the seine caught a monster in the form of a saw-fish. They tied a rope to the saw and brought it in shallow water. Two miles, with ten to fourteen men, with all their strength could move it only a few feet at a time. After much exertion they got it in water a foot deep. Then began the measuring process. From the end of the saw to the end of the tail measured nineteen feet nine inches; from fin to fin, across the back, eight feet; depth, from back to stomach, three feet. Dr. Moore thinks its weight three thousand pounds; the liver alone weighed four hundred pounds, from which a barrel of oil was obtained.

A thousand eggs, from the size of a marble to twelve inches in circumference, were taken from it. It presented the appearance of a boat turned bottom upwards. Several pilot fish clung so tightly it was with difficulty that they could be disengaged.

We enjoyed seeing it skinned and dissected, feeling that such fish should not be allowed to swim even within two miles of our delightful bathing spot.

ERIE RAILROAD TELEGRAPH.—The Erie Railroad Company have established a line of telegraph between New York and Binghampton, Elmira, Dunkirk, and all other towns on the route of the railroad. The line consists of two substantial wires, one of which is appropriated to the business of the road, for which it is invaluable, and the other is for the transaction of general business for the public.

A negro woman died recently in Richmond, Va. after a brief illness, so brief indeed that it was thought expedient to hold a post mortem examination, and the result was the discovery of a pin embedded in the lungs. AMERICAN ANTIQUITIES.

Many will deem it almost absurd to speak of the antiquities of a country that had no historical, classical or popular existence four hundred years ago; a country that was not dreamed of when Charlemagne was in his glory, overthrowing thrones, remodeling nations, and establishing new bounds to old countries; a country that was written about as a terra incognita, an Atlantic, an Eutopia, by the great lights of the middle ages—by men who could quote Plato as readily as they could run through the alphabet, and who could sum up on their fingers all the eras and epochs of Roman greatness.

So far as the existence of America is connected with the history of Europe, it has no age. When viewed, however, in its other light, as a great hemisphere that has existed since the flood; that has been thousands of generations of men born and buried; that has had political histories, wars, revolutions, sciences and religions, even art and refinement in some rude measure, ever since the flood; if shows its claims to an antiquarian importance far surpassing that of Europe, Asia or grey haired Africa—because it was, probably, peopled when the Pharaohs were unborn, and had chronicles before the Jewish people went forth against the Philistines.

How far these speculations of its origin may, or may not be correct, will never be discovered. The monuments which should have preserved its chronicles have been pierced, with a comparatively slight and very modern exception, in those waves which never yield up the secrets once confided to them. Some few facts are all that now remain on which even the wildest speculations can base themselves for future investigation. These speculations, like all which are of any worth or usefulness, proceed upon grounds that have been explored, and rest on a solid foundation. What was—when the kingdom of the Montezumas was discovered—by a process of speculative logic, is made to account for what was long before; and to unfold a theory of probabilities, running back to the great deluge.

It is known that at the time when Cortes invaded the realms of the Mexic monarch, thirty knights could tilt with ease on the terrace roof of his palace; that his armories were filled with weapons almost as destructive as any to be found in the arsenals of christian rulers; that his granaries were furnished with provisions paid by tributaries, after the manner of the tithes of Israel; that three hundred servants were needed to tend the ayaries, stocked with birds of beautiful and gorgeous plumage and charming song; that his menageries contained beasts as terrible as any that ever graced the exhibitions of Roman triumphs; that his dwarfs were like children of Sir Geoffrey Hudson, and were even more hideous than the paintings on ancient vaults; and that the ladies compared advantageously in personal charms with the Georgian houris, whose beauty is said to have been so brilliant in the harems of Constantinople as to increase day light and pale the fires of artificial illumination. The master of all this magnificence changed his apparel, woven of the richest materials, four times daily, never putting the same garment on twice; and eating and drinking from gold—except on state occasions, when his table was laid with services of chohdan porcelain, far surpassing that of china or sevres—never twice using the same dishes.

The Parisian chefs de cuisines boast that they have six hundred and eighty-five different ways of preparing eggs. Even the poor heathen of American barbarism had thirty ways of preparing meat. Three hundred dishes were daily set before the monarch, and as silver chafing dishes had not then been invented, such as were required to be kept hot were placed in heated earthen stands prepared for that purpose. The dishes of ordinary use at the table of Montezuma surpassed in richness the varieties of Caligula's and Dioclesian's times. The carp was to them the most exquisite of fish—merely because it did not swim the Tiber; and peacocks tongues were the richest of meats, owing to their great rarity. Montezuma and his court fed on more substantial fare—on geese, partridges, quail, venison, pigeons, wild hogs, hares, rabbits, and above all else, dairy-fed baby, when the article was in season! Fruits of all kinds from temperate and tropic climes, graced the feasts; and drinks of a mild but stimulating character, pressed from the grape, orange, pine-apple, and other fruits, circulated freely.

In cold weather, enormous torches, flinging forth not only light and warmth, but aromatic odors beyond our pastilles, placed behind screens of solid gold, with curious devices upon them, lent an additional splendor and attraction to a scene truly royal and magnificent; a scene vieing in every respect with the barbaric splendors described by Milton:

"——When those who quested in Aspramont, Or Montalban ——"

had life and deemed themselves the world's rulers. The sovereign, like his torches, was protected by golden screens when eating; and did not, like the royal barbarians of Europe, feed in the public gaze. Instead of bungling clods for attendant waiters, he realized ancient mythology and had fair featured and long-haired Hebes and Ganymedes, as charming as any ever dreamed of by Grecian genius. These fair maidens ministered to Montezuma while he conversed with the gray haired courtiers and venerable counselors of state.

Bernal Diaz, an old Spanish historian and traveler, from whose curious commentaries we have gleaned these ancient reminiscences, remarks that "during the time Montezuma was at dinner, two beautiful women were busily engaged making small cakes, with eggs and other things mixed therein. These cakes were delicately white and were presented on plates covered with napkins." Another kind of bread was brought on plantain leaves, piping hot from the bakery, and much resembled our modern wafers.

After the monarch had dined he was presented by his attendant hourls with three ornamented canes, containing liquid amber mixed with tobacco; and, when the dancers and singers, and buffoons and story tellers had sufficiently amused His Majesty, he betook himself to his pipe and piped himself asleep. When the monarch's eyes were closed, and the poppy leaf had possession of his faculties, then the attendants seated themselves around the tables and disposed of the costly dishes—each of which, for richness, was worthy of an emperor's palate, and all of which in their aggregate were sufficient to supply the wants of the thousands who revolved like satellites around the central glory of the Inca.

From this it may be seen that before the saints fled from Leyden, or those who left Whitehaven had reached our shores, there was an American civilization and luxury which the peloces of the lands they left knew not of; that there was an advance and progress for the loss of which many things that we now have might have been cheerfully sacrificed.

THE LATE STORM.—The late storm—we might call it the present storm, for it still hangs over the city and environs—extended eastward on the lakes, but was not attended with that severity as to cause any damage. At Ocean Springs and Biloxi, on Sunday, the wind blew pretty fresh for some six or eight hours, attended with high water. At Mississippi City and Pass Christian it commenced blowing a twelve knot breeze on Saturday, increasing on Sunday morning to a good gale. The wind being from E. to E. S. E. On Sunday night there were several heavy squalls of wind with heavy rains. On Monday morning the wind hauled to the South, and blew very fresh all day from S. to S. S. W., affording yachtmen and amateur sailors at Pass Christian abundance of that desirable element for the occasion of the regatta. We think it blew some time during the day about 0 twenty knot breeze, or equivalent to scudding under the bare poles.

There was no boat from Mobile yesterday, consequently no Northern mail. This was not, however, owing to the storm, but because there was no boat at Mobile prepared by the contractors. N'emporte; we can overlook an omission on their part now and then, though they can pay a fine almost every day in the year and make money by the operation.

The favorite coast packet Creole continued her trips regular through the storm, though she did roll and pitch rather rough at times, and gave the wharf proprietors an evidence of her strength. But if a crowded boat ever arrived at Port Pontchartrain, it was the Creole on yesterday morning, from Ocean Springs, Biloxi, Mississippi City, Pass Christian and Bay St. Louis.—[Crescent of Wednesday.

SOME HOGS.—The number of hogs in the States of Ohio, Indiana, Michigan and Kentucky, at this time, is estimated at 10,943,334, which, at $3 a head, a fair average value of stock, would amount to $32,830,002. If fat when sold, they would average $10 a head, amounting to $109,433,340.

HOME CORRESPONDENCE.

The Storm at the Watering Places.

NEW ORLEANS, Aug. 12, 1856.

Messrs. Editors: Having just returned from a trip to Madisonville, Mandeville and Lewisburg—our Louisiana watering places—and hearing that accounts had been received from all parts stating the ravages done by the storm, I thought a slight record of its doings over the Lake would not be uninteresting.

I left the terminus of the Pontchartrain Railroad for a trip to Mandeville, intending to remain until Monday; on the fairy steamer Arrow, Capt. Chamberlain, on Saturday afternoon. We reached, after a pretty rough passage, our destination at the usual time, as also did the W. C. Young, in the same trade. During Saturday night the rain fell and the wind blew, giving indubitable evidence of the approaching storm. On Sunday morning the Arrow left at her usual hour for the city; but the Young, being a high-pressure boat, did not venture beyond the mouth of the Tchefuncta, through the wise forethought of Capt. Hoffman, her master.

During Sunday, at intervals, the wind blew almost a hurricane, and about one or two o'clock the Arrow returned, bringing a large number of excursionists from the city—who reported the lake very rough, and the countenances of all furnished proof that seasickness had been pretty general—intending to leave on the return trip of Sunday; but it was no use, the Captain would not leave with such a prospect before him, and all hands come to the conclusion to pass the night as well as they could on the boat and at the hotels. Monday came, and still the storm continued, and with it a storm was raised around the head of the worthy Captain Chamberlain, who obstinately refused to risk the perils of the lake, and many of the passengers became clamorous against him. Here was a pretty fix: business men, intending to enjoy a few hours of pleasure; young clerks with inexorable employers, having the keys of their stores with them; gentlemen of leisure and city dandies without clean shirts: and all water-bound, without any certainty when they would be able to get back.

All day Monday the storm continued furious, occasional showers being the only relief from the general monotony of the town, and, as if to render the thing more terrible, an ice-cream saloon adjoining the Planters' Hotel was blown to pieces, much to the consternation of the ladies. Night came, and still the Captain would not venture, and another night the disappointed excursionists were left to brood over their misfortunes. During the night, however, the storm lulled and this (Tuesday) morning, the Arrow cast off from her moorings for the city. We stopped at Mandeville and took on a great number of passengers placed in the same situation, if not worse than ourselves, but we dare not land at Lewisburg.

But let me cease this and sum up the damage. Madisonville was uninjured with the exception of the ice-cream saloon, though the river rose to a height exceeding the memory of the oldest burghers. At Lewisburg the damage was great. The wharf was entirely swept away; seven out of nine of the bath-houses were destroyed; the water overflowed portions of the town, and there is no telling to what further extent the damage is, as communication was necessarily interrupted. At Mandeville, eighteen bath-houses were swept away, though the wharf remained firm, and some of the passengers from that point informed me that the waves in front of the town rose to an enormous height beyond what had ever been seen there before, and rendering it utterly impossible for anything in the shape of a vessel to live.

The little Arrow sped on and rode the water beautifully, landing us at the railroad in time for the ten o'clock cars, much to the general satisfaction of our pleasure-seekers and relief of anxious friends who sought tidings from the absentees.

While writing, let me also in this connection pay a passing tribute to the Captain and officers of the boat and a hearty recommendation for the fairy steamer. Notwithstanding the intestine storm that gathered over his devoted head, Capt. Chamberlain stood his ground, and refused to risk anything from the storm, and maintained his determination until the necessity was over, proving himself to be a worthy commander and able seaman. The cases of many were extreme, but visionary thousands were lost by a few initiated individuals.

With this brief account I close, wishing a happy cessation of the freaks of the storm-king and subscribe myself yours, etc., A PASSENGER.

FIRES IN JULY.—The total destruction of property in the United States by fires during the month, will probably exceed $1,400,000. But some of the heaviest losses, as we learn from the New York Journal of Commerce, results from the destruction of steamboats, which have been singularly unfortunate, as will be seen by the following:

July 3d, at St. Louis, five steamers	$100,000
" 16th, Northern Indiana	20,000
" 20th, A. H. Larkin	100,000
" 20th, John Jay	10,000
Total	$440,000

The number of deaths in the city of New York during the week ending on the 2d inst., were 746, an acreage of 115 over the previous week. In regard to this increased mortality, the Evening Mirror says:

The increased number of deaths affords no ground for alarm, as it evidently does not arise from any epidemic disease. The number is mostly composed of children under five years of age.

The bill passed on the 2d inst. in the House of Representatives, making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defence, contains the following items:

Extension of the battery at Fort Jackson, Mississippi river, $10,000; repairs and extension of Fort St. Phillip, on the same river, $30,000.

Summary of Mexican Intelligence.

By the arrival of the steamship Texas, from Vera Cruz on Monday night, we have received files of papers from the city of Mexico up to the 2d inst. The following is all the items of an interesting nature which we have been able to glean from them.

Gen. Gadsden, U. S. Minister to Mexico, arrived in the city of Mexico on the 21st ult. The Extraordinary, of the 26th, says:

The General's arrival was quite unexpected on that evening. His friends were making preparations to give him a grand reception on the following evening. The demonstration would have been highly flattering to the American Minister, as many members of Congress, officials and ex-officials of the Government, with many of his own citizens, had made arrangements to go out in carriages and receive him outside the city. The General, however, with his usual go-ahead-ativeness, got ahead of his friends, and will now have the pleasure of their congratulations singly. We are glad to hear his trip home has much improved his health. As this was the chief object of his visit, we suppose he returns well satisfied with his absence from this city, and it must be gratifying at the same time to return to find such a warm circle of friends.

Speaking of the resignation of Gen. Wheat from the Mexican army, the same paper says:

Gen. Wheat, during the time he has been in the service of Mexico, has made many friends, and the course he has pursued in resigning will secure for him a reputation for disinterested friendship for Mexico. He took service in the revolutionary army against Santa Anna, and now that the revolution has terminated in the establishment of a firm liberal Government, he retires to attend to other business.

There were several shocks of an earthquake felt in the city of Mexico on Thursday, the 24th ult.

Senor Zamora, Governor of Zacatecas, has been honored with the green sash, with the rank of General of Brigade.

Prepayment of postage throughout this Republic is fixed to commence on the 1st of August next.

To fill the ranks of the Brigade Zuloaga, the Government of the State of Mexico has ordered that all the vagabonds and loafers may be impressed into the service. Troops are being raised in all the principal cities.

According to a published statement, the value of church property in the city of Mexico in the year 1848 was $15,464,450. The Extraordinary says, in connection, that since that time of course many changes have taken place, but the probability is that at the present time the possessions of the church must be estimated at a much larger sum.

The total number of deaths in the city of Mexico for the year 1855 was 8,719.

It is reported that Velasquez de Leon, an ex-Minister of Santa Anna, has been arrested and is now imprisoned in the Inquisicion. In the meantime, one of the papers asks, what has become of Senor Aguila, another ex-Minister?

The Indians still continue to pillage the property of the inhabitants of the North, with little regard for the lives of the people. In Durango they are particularly troublesome at the present time.

GOLD AND SILVER DISCOVERIES.—Auriferous and argentiferous specimens have been discovered in Banamichi, in Sonora, which surpass the reputation of Arizona.

The Patria has been suspended by order of the Government for the publication of objectionable articles.

DINNER TO GEN. GADSDEN.—A dinner was given to Gen. Gadsden by members and ex-members of the present Government of President Commonfort, on the evening of the 29th ult. The dinner was attended by many members of the Constituent Assembly, by members of the Press of the city, the Diplomatic Corps, and many influential citizens.

GUADALAJARA.—The Extraordinary of the 30th ult., has the following intelligence from this State:

Gen. Parrodi has arrived at Guadalajara and given a most pacific address to the people. Various conflicting reports reach this city from that quarter, but there can be no doubt that all the grievances will be settled between the Government and the people of Jalisco amicably. It is the ultra liberal party who are complaining in that section of the country, and a liberal Government cannot fail to gratify their wants.

ANOTHER DINNER TO GEN. GADSDEN.—The Extraordinary of the 2d inst., says:

To-morrow a dinner is to be given to Gen. Gadsden by the Press of this city.

Two new papers have made their appearance recently in the City of Mexico—the "Chronicle of the Week" and the "Opinion."

There was a fire in the City of Mexico on the 20th ult., the Extraordinary of the 23d gives the following account of it:

It is something strange in pursuing the business of a journalist in the City of Mexico to have to record a fire. Such visitations are far more rare than earthquakes, and we do not wonder at the frenzy which seized this population last Sunday evening when the bells of the city pealed forth an alarm. A fire was the last thing looked for, and with a thousand foreign conjectures, people rushed carefully through the streets to the scene of confusion. The discovery of the real cause of alarm removed from many minds all fears of pronunciamentoes and many other calamities which this city in times past has suffered so much from.

The fire broke out about six o'clock near the fonda of Victor Eternod, in the Calle de Santo Domingo, and caught in the adjacent buildings in the same street and the Calles de Santo Domingo and Encarnacion. The police were promptly on the ground to preserve order, and although somewhat late, the fire engines of the city were brought into service. All classes of citizens, both high and low, assisted in staying the progress of the flames. The Governor of the city, with many other notables, was seen as much interested in the result as if he had been schooled to the "machine." The conflagration was subdued about half-past nine o'clock, but not until the building in which the fire broke out was a ruin and many other buildings very much injured and disfigured from the fire. We hear of no lives being lost, although many were severely injured. It is impossible for us to get a correct estimate of the loss of property by this conflagration. It may be set down at many thousand dollars.

The dry goods store of Mr. Thomas, on Spring street, New York, was forcibly entered on the night of the 4th inst., and robbed of $6,000 worth of silks and satins, $5,000 in notes and papers, and $500 in cash.

Gen. Henry A. Stanton, Assistant Quartermaster General of the U. S. A., died at Fort Hamilton, N. Y., on the 1st inst. Gen. Stanton entered the army in 1813 as lieutenant in the light artillery, and resigned in 1817. In 1818 he was reappointed Assistant Deputy Quartermaster General, and received the brevet of Brigadier General in 1847 for meritorious services in Mexico. He was a native of Vermont.

A destructive fire occurred in Paterson, N. J., on the 2d inst., consuming five large stores. Loss, from $15,000 to $20,000. Partially insured.

The floating rainbow arches the wildest torrent. So stands God in heaven, and the streams of time rush and roar, and over all the waves hovers the bow of peace.

Seventy thousand dollars worth of property was destroyed in the village of West Troy, N. Y., on the morning of the 2d inst.,

The President has officially recognized the following Consuls:

J. Hosford Smith, Consul for the Sublime Porte, resident at New York; Werner Dressel, Consul for Saxony, at Baltimore; M. le Comte de Mejan, Consul for France, at New Orleans; M. de Belligny St. Croix, Consul for France, at Charleston: Anibal de Mosquera, Vice-Consul for New Granada, at New York.

The coroner's jury at Fall River, Mass., concluded their investigation, on the 5th instant, of the recent explosion on board the steamer Empire State, and rendered a verdict exonorating all parties.

We learn from the Selma Sentinel, of the 7th inst., that Col. Buford was at Eufaula, Barbour county, engaged in raising emigrants for Kansas.

An Irish paper, describing the result of a duel, says: "The one party was wounded in the chest and the other fired in the air." [This must have been a triangular duel.]

RED RIVER.—The Natchitoches Chronicle of the 2d inst. has the following in relation to the state of navigation on Red river:

The low stage of Red river has almost entirely obstructed navigation between the Falls and Shreveport. The traveling is carried on by means of the stage route, and quite a thriving business is rewarding the proprietors.

The Point Coupee Echo of the 9th inst., says:

We have had a week of extremely warm weather, resembling more the summers which are so peculiar to this State than any experienced this year; though we are happy to state the sanitary condition of the parish continues comparatively excellent, with the exception of a few cases of our old chills and fevers which were so commonly known here previous to the appearance of yellow fever.

LATER FROM CALIFORNIA.

By the arrival of the steamship Daniel Webster yesterday, with California mails, we have San Francisco papers up to the 21st July, and from other parts of the State as late as dne.

The following summary contains everything of an interesting nature which we have been able to find in our exchanges:

The State.

The Alta, of the 21st ult., has the following remarks on the state of affairs in the State:

California is still convulsed by an active, peculiar and powerful public opinion. About the middle of May, the panorama of our troubles began to unroll, and expose the startling scenes of our present history; and though the belief is to be indulged that all which is dark and alarming has passed from view, entire peace, entire quietness and permanent removal of difficulties, have not been reached.

Since the sailing of the 1st July steamer there has been greater calmness in public feeling than heretofore since hostilities were commenced between acknowledged right and evident wrong. This is, without doubt, the consequence of a cessation of violent criminal acts.

The people throughout the State have fully discussed, inquired into, and maturely decided upon, the manifestations of the wishes of the Pacific metropolis, and have extended their sympathy and endorsed the proceedings.

There was a terrible conflagration at Placerville on the 5th inst. One hundred and eighty-six buildings, together with other property valued at $600,000, was destroyed; one person was burned to death and several injured.

On the 8th, the village of Georgetown, Placer county, was consumed by fire, and the loss is estimated at $100,000. Seventy buildings were destroyed.

On the 12th, the town of Fair Play, El Dorado county was burned, involving a loss of about $70,000.

On the 13th, a disastrous fire took place at Marysville, and consumed a large number of buildings, valued at $150,000.

All accounts from the mines are as favorable as ever, and the continued prosperity of these regions need not hereafter be questioned.

There has been little or no rain, but the supply of water has not been considerably diminished in any of the mining localities.

The grain crops are everywhere abundant—far beyond expectation.

Fruits and vegetables promise to overwhelm all precedent, and are falling in price.

On Sunday, the 6th, the town of Santa Barbara became greatly excited in consequence of the appearance in the place and vicinity of Edward McGowan, the bad character indicted as an accomplice of Casey in the murder of Mr. King, and who has eluded the Vigilance Police. Upon being recognized, he fled to a swamp, from which the citizens attempted to burn him; but they failed, and he escaped. Yet we expect every day to hear of his arrival in San Francisco.

Excitement prevails now at Yreka, Siskiyou county, bordering on Oregon, in regard to the shooting of a miner, named J. Blunt, by Deputy Sheriff Millhouse, who was attempting to arrest him for creating a disturbance on the Fourth of July. The friends of Blunt threatened to tar and feather Mr. Gen. Freaner, editor of the Yreka Union, unless he retracted the statement that Blunt was the aggressor, and to burn the town unless Mr. Millhouse was given up to them by the Sheriff and his posse.

A controversy was going on between the Governor of the State and certain parties, relative to an arrangement with the Committee of Vigilance, that they may deliver up Judge Terry and cease to exercise authority. Nothing to that effect had been done.

The reception of the late Presidential nominations has not been particularly enthusiastic. A few ratification meetings have been held inland, and most of the journals have chosen their positions for the canvass, and a few leaders are trying to form campaign clubs. But while the respective parties are quite unanimous in endorsing their nominees, there is still hesitancy, inactivity, doubt and fear.

The City.

S. A. Hopkins, the person who was wounded by Terry, after nearly recovering from his wound, was attacked with a dangerous disease, and for several days his life was despaired of, but he was rapidly convalescing at the date of the sailing of the steamer.

David S. Terry, one of the Judges of the Supreme Court, is yet in confinement in the rooms of the Committee of Vigilance. What was to be his fate was uncertain.

James Gallagher, Casey's executor, had been arrested, but set at liberty, on conditions agreed to by the committee. Several others were allowed the same privilege.

"Chris. Lilly," the ex-New York pugilist, and against whom there is an indictment for murder in New York State, was arrested on the 8th, and admitted to bail that he might settle his business previous to going into exile.

The expectation of offensive persons still continues, and shipments were being made nearly every day.

Charles E. Rand was arrested on the 7th, charged with piracy, in assisting John L. Durkee and others, to disarm a party carrying all State arms down the bay. He gave $25,000 bail, the same amount required of Durkee, arrested previous to the departure of the last steamer.

Capt. A. A. Ritchie, a prominent merchant of this city, was thrown from his carriage at Napa Springs, on the 9th, and instantly killed. He was of the firm of Ritchie, Osgood & Co.

Gen. Wool was reported to be dangerously ill at Napa Springs.

A Democratic ratification meeting was held on the evening of the 16th ult., and the Republicans held one on Saturday, the 19th.

Petitions had been put in circulation, requesting the city and county officers to resign. Six thousand persons had signed them.

On the evening of the 12th, an immense concourse assembled, speeches were made, the petitions sanctioned, and a committee instructed to formally invite the immediate resignation of all the officers.

On the 15th, another great meeting was held, at which the committee appointed at the previous meeting reported that the officers had determined not to surrender their places. A few agreed to do so, providing their "companions in misery" would do likewise.

At this meeting considerable disturbance was created, and thirteen noisy fellows were arrested by the Vigilance Police. Some of them were afterwords discharged, but others are reserved for exportation on old charges.

The various regiments of the Committee of Vigilance are frequently out on parade, and are the recipients of beautiful flags and banners from the sisterhood of the city.

The regiments are formidable and well disciplined, and their uniform consists of plain black pants, frock coat and flat glazed caps. A black belt, with a narrow red stripe on each edge, encircles the waist, and the officers carry heavy sharp cavalry swords.

Many of the companies are officered by graduates of West Point Academy.

The city was quiet and healthy.

Business was moderately good. There was a fair interior trade and the supply ample.

Messrs. Flint, Peabody & Co. and Messrs. Tubbs & Co., are constructing an extensive rope-walk and oakum manufactory, and will soon have them in operation.

Miss Julia Dean Hayne and Mr. Charles Pope were playing a very successful engagement at the Metropolitan Theater. They had created a perfect furore in the representation of Camille and Griseldis.

Later from Nicaragua and Central America.

The U. S. mail steamship Daniel Webster, Capt. Henry Chorchill, from Asphuwall and San Juan, arrived here on an early hour yesterday morning.

From mcnacuanna politely furnished us by purser Hart, of the Daniel Webster, we extract the following items of interest:

The Daniel Webster arrived at San Juan on the 31st ult., after a rough passage out, and found the following English war steamers at anchor in that port, under command of Admiral Erskine: Orion, 91 guns, flag ship of the Admiral; Imperieuse, Watson, 60 guns; Arrogant, Lyston, 46 guns; Tartar, Cockburn, 21 guns; Cossack, Danlop, 20 guns; Archer, Heathcote, 14 guns; Pioneer, Wood, 6 guns; Intrepid, Winks, 6 guns; Victor, DeHousey, 6 guns. Eight others expected soon. The object of this visit was unknown.

H. B. M. frigate Eurydice, Turleton, which had been at anchor at San Juan for several months, had left for Jamaica.

After lying at San Juan a few hours, the Daniel Webster left for Asphuwall, where she arrived on the next day at 3 o'clock P. M., and landed her passengers and mails. She found at this port the U. S. mail steamer Ariel which had arrived on the day previous from New York with 350 passengers. The U. S. sloop-of-war Saratoga, E. G. Tilton, commander, arrived on the 20th ult.

Hon. A. B. Corwine having concluded his commission at Panama, returned on the steamer Ariel, which was to sail on or about the 5th inst. for New York.

After the most rigid examination of the evidence in regard to the railroad massacre, Mr. Corwine is of the opinion that the Government aided and abetted the rioters; and it is stated that he will recommend to the President the immediate seizure of the Transit Line between Asphuwall and Panama.

The Daniel Webster brings nothing new from Nicaragua.

The Asphuwall Courier, of the 25th ult., has the following intelligence from there:

The principal item of news from Nicaragua is the result of the Presidential election. Three Presidents have been elected thus—Legon has chosen Rivas, Segovia, Estrada; and the remainder of the country, Walker.

Walker maintains his position at Granada, but we have but little news of his condition otherwise.

The Courier, of the 2d inst, says:

There is a rumor afloat here to the effect that two thousand Costa Ricans and their allies were in possession of San Juan del Sur, at last accounts via Graytown.

The Panama Star and Herald notes the appointment of Mr. Juan J. Yeaza, so long and favorably known as chief clerk of the Pacific Steam Navigation Company's office in Panama, to the Agency of the Company in that city. The appointment is an excellent one; and Mr. Yeaza's long and faithful services have rendered him as observing as his illness renders him capable.

We clip from the Aspinwall Courier of the 30th ult., the following statement of the business done by the Panama Railroad Company, during the six months ending on the 30th June last:

Passengers, 16,947; mails, (American) 345,429 pounds; mails, (English) 18,704 pounds; coal, (on freight) 6,176 tons; other freight, 3,442 tons; gold, $13,531,250; silver, $5,380,838.

The same paper, dated 2d inst., says:

Our last advices from Bogota give us nothing but electioneering news. The United States Minister resident there, is now at Panama investigating the April 15th Riot, etc.

The Panama Star and Herald learns from a memorandum of Purser Bidwell, of the steamer Bogota, that the Panama, sent out by the Panama Steam Navigation Company, and for some time past expected at Panama, was wrecked May 5th, in the Straits of Magellan, where the Company have lost two other steamers; also, that the British ship Western Bride was wrecked there May 31st. No lives lost in either case.

South American Intelligence.

The Panama Star and Herald has the following summary of South American news:

From Valparaiso we have more full reports of the storm which we announced on the arrival of the last mail from the South. Several vessels received damage, among them the British bark Balgonnie; the other vessels belonged to the coast. Fourteen launches and a sloop were entirely lost, but fortunately no lives.

The barometer fell to 29d. 50m. The mountain streams overflowed their channels and inundated some parts of the city, damaging considerably the houses on the beach.

The railroad suffered very severely from the overflow of rivulet Vina del Mar, which rose fifteen feet above its level, carrying with it everything upon its banks.

The iron railroad bridge across this stream was swept away, impeding the works along the line for some days. Lighter damage was sustained on other parts of the road.

It is supposed these casualties will prevent the inauguration of the railroad as far as Limache, on the 18th September, as had been resolved, in commemoration of the anniversary of Independence.

The storm has been felt equally severe in the South of the Republic; the Mole at Constitution was destroyed and several bridges carried away; six or seven ships went ashore to avoid sinking. The flood at the Maule is one of the largest on record.

The losses sustained by this calamity are calculated at $500,000 dollars throughout the Republic.

The elections took place on the 25th and 26th June, and on the 25th ult. the electors were again to meet, when, it is already decided, Senor Montt is to be proclaimed as re-elected for the Presidency, for the next five years, without opposition.

The municipality of Santiago has contracted with a company to light the city with gas.

Mr. George Smith has received his exequatur as British Vice Consul at Santiago.

The markets are reported as exceedingly dull, there being no buyers, although the imports have been large.

Louisiana Items.

The Ouachita Register, of the 2d instant, says:

The Supreme Court has affirmed the decision of the lower court in the case of the "Vicksbur

"At Home."

BY L. VIRGINIA FRENCH.

Ha! how they come! up the deep grown paths gli-
Out, through the rumblers of the summer hours,
"Bertie" on "Mamma's" shoulder proudly riding,
Her tiny fingers full of wild-wood flowers.
Before them, Pompey, many years a noble fellow,
With half his head gone white, (a sign of honor-
(Like hairs of old,) a figure clear and mellow
His bright eye laughs among the weeds, as into view
The merry group come round, with shout and laughter,
Bearing rich treasures from the greenwood bowers;
While "Bruce," good guardian, trots soberly after,
Sorely encumbered by his bunch of flowers.

And "Carrie," almost hid in a wreath of blossoms,
Pale, [illegible] the couple's merry team,
With [illegible] down still peeping in their bosoms—
Ah! here you are! one kiss, and welcome home!
Come, here's a mat, and there's a crimson cushion,
Rest little ones—tell mamma where you've been,
And where you've gathered all this gay profusion
Of buds and blossoms, moss, and garland's green.
Stay—I can tell—no magic arts professing,
Nor even gifted with the second sight,
I can reveal their native haunts by—guessing,
And should I fail, then you must set me right.

First, here's "Brave"—fine fellow! almost throttled
With ivy leaves and winter-green, you stole
Where hangs the plane-tree high, his branches mottled,
And swings his nest the glancing oriole.
And then here's violets—white or blue, and golden,
Pink rock-moss and the speckled touch-me-not,
(One day I'll tell you, Gracia, the story olden
About the golden violets;) the spot
Was warm and bright where grew this wild wake robin,
And purple fox glove flourished by its side,
This evergreen, when winter winds are sobbing,
Lies studded on the gray rock's heart of pride.

This wedge you gathered where the runnels tinkle
The silver bells of fairies as they pass;
This larkspur blue where bright Narcissus sprinkle
With golden stars the thin and silky grass,
These rushes grew where glides the glancing river
By sunny waters, and mossy stone,
And makes the balmy air of morning quiver
With echo laughter—very [illegible]
This crimson plume in clusters loves to mingle
With fairy's finger, and coral honey bells,
Where sings the hidden stream far down the dingle,
And sweet wild roses gem the bosky dells.

Here's beds—let's part the leaves asunder,
But softly, softly—see who first can find
The fairy princess, legends say lives under
This [illegible] parlament, and satin lined!
Here's sealed up[illegible], so graceful bending,
Gay maiden wood-pinks, and pale emerald blooms
Of wild grape, on the breeze of evening sending
Its regal odors, richest of perfumes.
And here is broken leaf, and fern to plume
Brother Hallister, they—and what are these?
Monk's hood, a cowled hermit, grim and gloomy,
And rosy gems, fresh wild-wood strawberries!

Here's rhododendron, refuge of the camel,
And quaint quamoodic, breathing of the South,
Red cup moss for the Fairy Queen's carousal,
And sarum—Indians call it "bite the mouth."
And see these ruddy drops the petals veining—
Old legends say it grew beneath the cross,
And this Judas blood so deeply staining
Forevermore its smooth and snowy gloss.
Here is a willow wand, they tell in story,
It weeping hung above the crucified;
And sassafras strangely old and hoary,
Which was the tree on which the Saviour died.

I've named them all—my loves, your baby lesson
Is over now, no more my heart can say
Some other day that you may win the blessing
Of babies' praises, for the storm, day by day.
Oh! little ones, be lowly like your flowers,
Make sweetness from glen and grassy mead;
I thought to teach the "alphabet of angels,"
But here was taught a lesson unlooked—
Oh! would that all would list the pure evangels
Of wild-wood blossoms, and of little child!

Former Hour, 1854.

Going Out and Coming In.

In that house were joy and sorrow,
Where an infant first drew breath,
Whilst an aged sire was drawing
Near unto the gate of death.
His feeble pulse was failing,
And his eye was growing dim;
He was standing on the threshold
When they brought the babe to him.

While to murmur forth a blessing
On the little one he tried,
In his trembling grasp he raised it,
Pressed it to his lips, and died.
An awful darkness reseth
On the path they both begin,
Who thus meet upon the threshold,
Going out, and coming in.

Going out unto the triumph,
Coming in unto the fight—
Coming in unto the darkness,
Going out unto the light,
Although the shadow deepened
In the moment of eclipse,
When he passed through the dread portal,
With the blessing on his lips.

And to him who bravely conquers
As he conquered in the strife,
Life is but the way of dying—
Death is but the gate of life;
Yet awful darkness reseth
On the path we all begin,
Where we meet upon the threshold
Going out, and coming in.

The Railway.

The silent glen, the restless stream,
To wandering boyhood dear,
And tones of thrill in many a dream,
They are no longer here;
A hungry and unquiet earth is thrown Across each of the pebbly and lone,
The stream is cold and clear;
And lightning speed and thundering sound
From hourly o'er the unsightly mound.

For this alone; for many a mile
Along that iron way,
No verdant banks or hedgerows smile
In summer's glory gay;
Two channi that yawn as though the earth
Were cast in some strange mountain-birth,
Whose depths encircle the day,
We're borne away at headlong pace,
To win from Time the wearying race!

The wayside inn, with homelike air,
No longer tempts a guest
To taste its unpretending fare,
Or seek its welcome rest.
The prancing team, the merry horn,
The cool fresh road at early morn,
The coachman's ready jest;
All, all to distant dream-land gone,
While shrieking trains are hurrying on.

Yet greet we them with thankful hearts,
And eyes that own no tear,
The nothing now, the space which parts
The distant from the dear;
The wing that to her cherished nest
Bears home the bird's exulting breast,
Has found its rival here.
With speed like hers we too can haste,
The bliss of meeting hearts to taste.

For me, I gaze along the line
To watch the approaching train,
And deem it still, twixt me and mine,
A rude but welcome chain
To bind us in a world whose ties
Each passing hour to sever tries,
But here may try in vain;
To bring us near home many an art,
Steam Fate employs to keep apart.

Angel Music.

When the twilight weeps 'neath her azure veil,
And the sweet flowers sigh as the day grows pale,
Then an angel comes on her silvery wings,
And a golden harp in her hand she brings;
Soft, sweet and low,
Rich numbers flow,
And I hush my breath while the angel sings.

Oh! the love-eyes fall from her dew filled eye,
Like the soft star-beams from the twilight sky,
And she lays my love with her fragrant wings,
While she tells my sisters on the golden strings!
Soft, sweet and low,
Rich numbers flow,
And I weep for joy while the angel sings!

Like the soft, south wind, when he wooes the flowers,
Like the glad bird's note in his love wreathed bowers,
Like the thrilling sigh of the wind's harp strings,
Are the raptured tones that the angel sings!
Soft, sweet and low,
Glad breathings flow,
And I dream of love while the angel sings!

Like the plaintive voice of the mourning dove,
Like the lily's cold veil of the heaving wave,
Like the gems that sweep on the night wind's wings,
Is the strange and song that the angel sings!
Dark, deep and low,
Sad meanings flow,
And I weep o'er the lost while the angel sings!

Then a lofty strain on the rich harp swells,
And it's soul of time to his music dwells;
And the tide of song o'er the glowing strings
Flows and free from the Bliss Springs!
Soft, sweet and low,
Deep breathings flow,
And I dream of Heaven while the angel sings!

There were 126 deaths in Baltimore during the week ending on the 6th instant.

The Disaster on Lake George.

We present to our readers this morning some further particulars of the sad disaster on Lake George. It is feared that many more lives were lost than at first reported. At least fifteen are said to be missing. The wife of E. Belknapp, banker, of New York, lost her life; also her sister, Mrs. Thwing, wife of S. C. Thwing, Esq., of Roxbury, Mass. Both of these ladies were daughters of Thos. Havens, Esq., of Philadelphia.

We copy the following from the Albany Evening Journal, of the 31st ult.

The flames were kept in subjection for a little while, but it soon became apparent that they could not be subdued. The boat, when the danger appeared imminent, was headed toward the shore in the neighborhood of Garfield's, but it being a rocky bottom, she struck, and was driven back by the concussion, almost upsetting by the rebound.

It was at this time, it is supposed, that those who were drowned, were either thrown or jumped overboard. And those who remained on the boat—about eighty in number—were in the highest state of excitement. The flames were spreading rapidly, and the passengers were rushing in various directions to escape them. It was impossible to preserve anything like order; and as the tiller ropes had been burnt off the boat became unmanageable. A few leaped overboard with chairs, and other floating material, and were rescued. The others were taken off in small boats. It is charged that the officers of the boat behaved badly, and that the small boat of the steamer was not launched as it should have been. This charge however, should not be two readily credited.

A gentleman who was a passenger in the John Jay has communicated to the Herald the subjoined interesting but melancholy statement of the disaster:

We reached Ticonderoga, via Lake Champlain, at 3 P. M. on Tuesday, the 29th of July. The number of passengers who left the Champlain boat to pass through Lake George was larger, by two-thirds, than at any time before during this season, consequently there was not sufficient accommodation at hand to convey all to Lake George, (by stage four miles;) a part were taken immediately, the balance remained for the stages to return. This occupied the better part of four hours, and many began to fear we should not have daylight to view the scenery of the lake. The captain of the last steamer, I heard say at this time, that his flues would choak up, and he was afraid he shouldn't make as good time as usual. A gentleman who was talking with him—Mr. Sheffield, of New Haven, I think—will remember the conversation. He told the captain that an hour or two more or less was nothing—that we should reach Caldwell's abundantly early, and that he had better not crowd his boat. The reply I did not hear. Mr. S. will doubtless remember it.

We left the foot of Lake George a few minutes before six. We went along finely for about eight miles, when I saw from near the engine room a dense mass of smoke puff out, then another. I was sitting on the after deck above, with my wife. We immediately ran down to the first deck, and took our position on the extreme after part of the boat. At this time one of the crew came running that way, said there was no danger, and seized two buckets of water that stood near, and started for the deck with them. I then raised myself upon the outer railing of the guard, and looked above, when I saw the flames bursting out. Just at this time the captain came running by where I stood. He ran about six or eight feet one way, then back again. I turned to my wife to see what effect this exhibition of fright from the main hope in this most desperate emergency would have, when I found her self-possessed. She promised to remain quiet until I procured some life preservers that hung in the gangway.

When I tried to inflate them I found them useless; they were either destroyed by age or from some other cause. At any rate they all escaped as fast as I could introduce it, so I had to depend entirely upon my ability to swim, and of course anxiously watched for the moment we should approach the shore. We, however, kept on our course, tearing through the water, but not headed for the land. I heard several voices cry, "Stop her!" "Put her ashore!" but alas! who was to do it. I will not stop to detail my own experience. Suffice it that I got safely to shore with my wife. As I climbed up the bank I was so much exhausted that I could not have stretched out my arm to have saved the dearest friend on earth. I saw two bodies under the water, drifting helplessly by, but I could not save them.

I was spared the most harrowing sight, while all were in the water, for after I had jumped from the boat she passed a little headland, or point, and from my position the struggles of the suffering were shut from my sight. The boat took fire at or near twenty minutes after six, and from the time the first smoke burst out till she lay a confirmed flame from stem to stern, could not have exceeded ten minutes. Fortunately we were within half a mile of a country hotel, kept by Mr. Garfield, at a place called the Hague. Your readers will excuse my digressing from the narrative to speak a word of the noble-hearted inmates of that house. They opened every room, closet and chest, to lay and aid their suffering guests. Even their maids gave freely the last rag of underclothing, and only regretted that they could not do more. The neighbors, I understood, were equally kind. There was one store in the place, and the owner placed everything therein at the service of the half clad passengers. He told every one to help themselves and make out their own memorandum. I sincerely hope he lost nothing by his generosity.

We had not been long at the hotel before they began to bring in the bodies. It was not till then that any fully appreciated the danger from which they had escaped.

The remains of Miss Renshaw, from New Orleans, were brought to the hotel, and there were some parts of the body that retained warmth. Every effort was made by the ladies present to resuscitate her, but it was too late. She was a beautiful creature, just eighteen years of age, and the only daughter of parents that had lavished everything that money could bring upon her education, which she had just completed, and was making this Northern trip under the protection of her uncle and his wife, J. A. White and lady. I had observed them on the boat before and shortly after we started, so happy, so cheerful, everything must have looked so beautiful to her; she saw her pathway filled with roses, and trod so gaily along that it seems as though there could not have been a cloud shadowed upon the morning of her life.

Mrs. Tawing, who was lost, was the mother of a noble little boy who was traveling with her. They rode in the coach with me from lake to lake. The bright sayings of the dear little fellow made many inquire his age. How proudly the fond mother glanced at her darling boy as he told his years. A gentleman remarked that little Walter had a fine head. "We hope," said the doating parent, "that there's something in it, for we have taken great care in his training." Too sadly were her words verified. When the little sufferer had got safe to shore from the wreck he saw his helpless mother floating beneath the surface of the water; he sprang to save her, but was held by those whose feeble arms were as helpless as his own. He then knelt upon the stones and poured forth such a fervent prayer to God to save his poor mother; but no, her doom was sealed, and she is now an angel in heaven. Her widowed husband and orphan child have gone to their desolate hearth, followed by the remains of her who had made their home the happiest spot on earth.

Long after dark, and when four bodies had been brought in, there began to be inquiries for baggage. I proceeded alone to the wreck, found one of my trunks near the shore, but in close proximity to the burning vessel. I dragged it up into the woods, but could get no assistance, so I left it to find some. I found a man who was willing to go if I would pay him enough; I offered him two dollars, and he accepted. When we reached the place I had left it in, there was a half dozen human sharks that closed around me, each and all clamorous for remuneration, saying, "they had dragged it from the shore," "that it would have been burnt before this," etc. They had a great pile of shawls, bonnets, bags, parasols, hats, canes, etc., which they were pulling over, much as one of our New York rag-pickers would examine a pile of rubbish thrown into the street.

The burning wreck lay roaring within a few yards, and many thought her boilers must explode. What cared these vultures? You could read their thoughts upon their faces as the flickering flames cast their light upon them. "The greater the destruction the greater the plunder." There were several decanters of brandy sent there for the worn out passengers, but these men monopolized it. Two of them invited me to drink from their private flasks.

It would be unjust in me not to say that there were many laborers about there who did their duty like men, for humanity's sake, not for pay or plunder. Rough plank coffins were made, and the bodies, packed in ice, were conveyed toward their respective homes.

Hoop, Hurrah!—A Tale of the Times.

INTRODUCTION.

Keep cool! and let me introduce you to Miss Blanche Cerceau.

CHAPTER I.

And I waited in the drawing-room, till I thought my hair would grow gray before she would appear. The carriage was at the door; it was a bitter cold night; I could hear the coachman swinging and slopping his arms to keep his hands warm. I had wound up the musical box for excitement, and listened to its soulless jingle for occupation; I had made the little king Charles spaniel stand on his hinds legs till he began to think that was his normal position. I tried with my right hand to coax "Uncle Ned" out of the piano—much to the chagrin of that grand instrument, whose mission was classical music. I beat a retreat from the realm of sweet sounds to that of sweet feelings—my patent leather boots were awful tight. In blissful agony I heard, at last, the opening of a door, a musical laugh, the rustle of silks, and there before me, just giving the last tightening to her glove-lace, was Blanche Cerceau. Such a seraphic smile, such a cooing voice.

"And did I keep him waiting?—the dear little Arthur! And did he grow fretful?"

"In the lexicon of Politeness which Fate has ordained for a bright man-of-the-world, there is no such word as Fretful!" I answered. I had been studying this answer for two hours—Bulwer gave the lesson. As I replied, my eyes fell on the ball costume of Blanche. The Pyramids of Egypt were evidently intended to be represented by that dress, her head the apex, and the bottom of the skirt the base. I had to open my eyes twice to take in the full circumference, there was no end to that lower heop? "Can she get out the front door," thought I; "granted, yet can she get into the carriage? Hadn't I better ride out with the driver?" I mildly asked her this last thought. She answered:

"Never, dear Arthur, on such a night as this! Ride inside, only put your feet up on the cushions; then I can stand up."

"Kind-hearted Binnche," thought I, "what sacrifices you make for one you love!" I entered the carriage first, it was not gallant, but then she insisted on it! Then she came in—how I can't tell, but she did it. And standing up like a Hippodrome girl in her chariot, and holding on to the hand-straps, off we started to attend Madame Ravencourt's grand ball.

CHAPTER II.

It was a full house; how it would have gladdened the heart of a prima-donne, at a dollar a head! Through the crush of human beings I swept onward with Blanche; once only I thought it was all up with the whale-bones, but we got through a little bent but still elastic: occasionally, a passer-by would sweep the skirts round till I saw those dainthly chausse tiny feet, and her figure looked like a dinner-bell—cut in two; but the wave swept on, and the pyramid was a pyramid.

"Will you waltz?" I said to her as the music sounded.

"Oh! no! I never waltz now!" "Confound those hoops," thought I. But we "did" a quadrille—very easily. Only two steps, and the figure was complete; an awkward step from the gentleman vis-a-vis, and rip went the lady's skirts, hoops, etc.; then come apologies, retreat to the dressing room—repairs impossible—had to send home for the carriage—and instead of having a splendid evening, Blanche and I—she sat down on the seat now, and I took her dear little gloved hand in mine and poured consolation into her heart—rode home before 11 o'clock. O horrors!

CHAPTER III.

In a few days Blanche and I will be married. Hoop, hurrah! The wedding ring—I wish it was some other shape, it reminds me so much of hoops—now lies on my table. And that car-load of whalebone I saw going into her house one day last week: "Blanche," said I, "is there an umbrella manufactory near you?"—reminds me that the bridal dresses—a la Pyramids of Egypt—are being built.

Blanche has not been to church for three months—owing to the narrowness of the pews, and the width of her hoops.

CHAPTER IV.

And I sit down in my arm chair, and wonder if such things can be possible, and if what was, was right. And I've come to the conclusion that everything is that is.

My wedding day! "Now, old boy!" I soliloquized, "you can only go through this operation once in your life—three or four times at the outside. Just raise the window and see if there are any unusual operations going on in the heavens above, or in the garden below, or over in the neighbors' houses the other side of the street. Nothing! Then Nature is unsuspicious. There'll be a row to-day, somewhere!"

Prophetic words! We are to be married in church en grande tenue: at ten o'clock in the morning. The hour came, carriages, friends, etc., along with it; we went to the church. We descended, walked up to the door—alde door—very narrow—bride could't get through—couldn't get into church. Hoops too large, door too small. I grew as red in the face as a boiled lobster. "Put her through," I gasped, confused, agitated and vulgar!

"Sir-r-r! said Blanche, "such language at such a time!"

We re-entered the carriage, ditto the friends theirs, returned to the bride's house, and then I, Arthur O'Bandylegge, received a formal dismissal. I got the sack, while Blanche Cerceau retains the hoops. Shall I not write:

Things as they are!
Vive la Bisarre!

A Novel in James' Style.

A writer in the Knickerbocker gives the following as the opening chapter of a new romance called "Geordie, or the King's Pel," by G. P. R. Q. Z. James:

"It was near midnight, toward the close of the afternoon on a sultry morning in December, 18—, previous to the revolution of the last war, when the burning moon was setting in the eastern sky, casting a brilliant shadow upon the georgeous cloude, which entirely obscured the firmament; and the unclouded sun was sending down its noonday beams with an intensity of heat, like the shriekieg of heavy thunder through the deep mountain gorges of the western prairies.

"Lovely, indeed, was the sound of such a spectacle to the feet of the weory traveler, for three feline monsters of the deep were just gathering together for their evening meal, and separating, ere the sun was risen, for the sports of the chase, and all things betokened a response too deep for utterance.

"In the ensuieg autumn, about two years previous to the above mentioned merry catastrophe, two pedestrians might have been seeu ridiug on horseback in a three-wheeled carriage up the brow of a precipice under the side of a forest, which had been cut down before the trees had begun to take rout, and engaged in eatieg their eveuing dinner by the road side in the arms of Morpheus. The eldest of the three gentlemen was a young lady of about fifty-three, and about two years younger than the other man, which latter geetleman was, from the monner in which she addressed him, evidently her oely ned youngest daughter.

"The remainder of her dress consisted of two pair of pantaloons, neatly buttoned round the tops of her ears, and elegantly attached by a golden strap of ueowen silk to the axeitree of the middle-uged gentleman's horse.

The third individual, last mentioned, was an old gentleman of about twenty-two, whose venerable features disclosed the livid hue of the Siberion negro. His bald head was profusely covered with long silver locks of sandy jet, and which he had evidently lost during a severe ntiack of sea-sickness, ceaght from the next door neighbor, who resides several blocks from him in the country. He also was richly nttired in the same manner as the body, being clothed in o wornout frock-coat which was secured by straps under his boots.

"His feet was bare, and save his gloves, he had no garments to shield him from the balmy atmosphere.

"He had lost both arms just above his collar bone, and was constrained to wear cretches; this, added to his total blindness, rendered him an object of geeral admiratiou."

A COOL CALCULATION.—Mrs. Dalster is a woman of imperturbable coolness, and places an appreciating value on dollars. A few days since, the note that Mr. Dalster endorsed for Rush & Gott, met with a protest. The information drove Mr. D. to distraction. He lost his appetite, silk handkerchief and temper. He found the sulks, and a taste for desperatloe. In this state of mind he turned home.

"Mrs. Dalster, my love, I'm e ruined man!"

"Just what I expected, my dear, when I heard you had eedorsed that note."

"I shall go crazy. Buy a butcher's knife aed cut my throat."

"As you please, my love, but perform the act in the yard."

"Why? Not afraid of blood, are you?"

"Not at all, my dear, but cutting one's jugular in the parlor could not do otherwise than injure the carpet."

The business-like manner in which Mrs. Dalster viewed throat-cutting, acted as counter irritant upon Dr. Dalster. He refused to apply the butcher's knife, and said he would live on, "just out of spite."

A LONG LOOK AHEAD.—A cotemporary turns his vision to the future and through the misty distance of two hundred years sees and describes the followieg:

Scene—House of a citizen of New York.

Time—A. D. 2056. A telegraphic message has been sent to a servant, who presents himself at the window in a balloon.

Master—John, go to South America and tell Mr. Johnson that I shall be happy to have him aup with me this evening. Never mind your coat, go right away.

In five minutes John returns.

John—Mr. Johnson says he will come; he is obliged to go to the North Pole for a moment, and will call here as he comes back.

Master—Very well, John; now you may wind up the machine for setting the table, and telegraph to my wife that Mr. Johnson will be here presently. After that, John, you may dust out my balloon—I will have an appointment in London at 12 o'clock.

John disappeared to execute these orders, while his master steps down to the West Indies to get a fresh orange.

AN AMERICAN CANTATRICE.—The Paris correspondent of the New York Courier and Enquirer, of the 1st inst., has the following:

"I seldom refer to theatrical or operatical matters, but I cannot help auijoining to this brief letter the following paragraph from Galignani's Messenger, of Saturday, 12th inst., which speaks of an impression produced here by a fair countrywoman of yours, of whose splendid voice and musical talent I had previously heard glowing descriptions. If she accept of an engagement in Europe, she will make the Grisis and the Alboni look to their laurels:

"A young American lady, M'lle May, possessed of a fine soprano voice, and musical capabilities of an order which would render her a valuable acquisition either to the Grand Opera or the Italians, has lately been heard in a few salons in Paris. It is to be hoped that some of our directors will arrest her flight across the Atlantic. We have plenty of old, worn out talent; a young fresh voice would be just now a most agreeable variety.

Thirty-Fourth Congress—First Session.

WASHINGTON, August 2.—Senate.—There was no meeting of the Senate.

House.—The House passed eleven of its own and six of the Senate's private bills.

The House then went into committee on the fortification appropriation bill.

After the bill had been amended, on motion of Mr. Stanton, it was reported to the House with a recommendation to strike out the enacting clause, with a view to its defeat. This was agreed to—yeas 60, nays 9.

The point was raised that the first business now was to vote on the amendments, but the Speaker decided that as the only thing reported to the House was the recommendation to strike out the enacting clause, the amendments were thus cut off; and the vote must be on the passage of the original bill.

Mr. Matteson moved that the bill be laid on the table, but the motion did not prevail—yeas 66, nays 92.

The bill was then passed. It appropriates $1,583,300, including $150,000 for Fort Carroll, Maryland.

The House then went into committee on the bill making appropriations for the legislative, executive and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1857.

Mr. Herbert, of California, made a personal explanation in answer to the various charges lately brought against him from all quarters of the Union—from the Pacific as well as the Atlantic coast—impugning his character as a man of honor and integrity. So far as he was concerned individually, he felt a perfect indifference in regard to such charges; but his duty to the House required him to meet them and brand them as falsehoods. Not one of them could be substantiated, he cared not who asserted to the contrary.

After some discussion on several clauses of the bill, at four o'clock the committee took a recess, and after re-assembling, a number of political speeches were made. Adjourned.

AUGUST 4.—Senate.—A petition was presented from inhabitants of Michigan, praying for the admission of Kansas into the Union under the Topeka constitution.

A bill for the relief of Thomas Brown, was presented and passed.

A report from the Committee on Indian Affairs was taken up, in favor of Richard W. Thompson, authorizing the payment of a certain sum of money for services rendered by him as attorney for the Menominee Indians.

House.—The Journal of Saturday having been read, at least two-thirds of the members sprang to their feet, and, in vehement tones, addressed "Mr. Speaker!" each one exhibiting the greatest anxiety to force through some favorite measure on this, the only day in the week when a motion to suspend the rules can be submitted.

Mr. Pennington, of New Jersey, was recognized, and called up the bill to run the boundary line between Washington Territory and the British North American Provinces, in accordance with the terms of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain of June 15, 1846.

After a brief debate the bill passed.

Mr. Harris, of Maryland, anild a host of competitors, then obtained the floor, and moved a suspension of the rules to enable him to submit a motion to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the bill of the Senate for the improvement of the navigation of the Patapsco river, and to render the port of Baltimore accessible to the war steamers of the United States.

The question being taken, the motion to suspend the rules was agreed to—yeas 130, nays 38.

Mr. Harris, of Maryland, then stated that the measure had been very strongly recommended by the War Department, and although he could present very strong points in its favor, yet he would not trespass on the House, but leave the bill to its consideration and generosity.

The bill was then read a third time and passed.

Mr. Purviance, of Pennsylvania, moved a suspension of the rules, to enable him to offer a resolution instructing the Committee on the Judiciary forthwith to inquire and report to the House upon what authority recent arrests of certain persons in Kansas were made, together with the offences with which they stand charged; and if unprisoned upon a charge of treason, for participating in the formation of the free State Constitution at Topeka, that then said committee report a bill directing a nolle prosequi to be entered upon the indictments against said parties.

The motion to suspend the rules did not prevail, two-thirds not voting in favor thereof—yeas 106, nays 72.

WASHINGTON, August 5, 1856.—Senate.—The Senate passed a House bill providing for running the boundary line between Washington Territory and the British possessions.

Mr. Seward presented a petition from Robinson and others, now confined in Kansas on the charge of treason, asking for relief. It was referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Four River and Harbor bills were passed.

The Senate then edjourned.

House.—The House considered bills relating to the District of Columbia, and passed a bill enlarging the rights and powers of the Alexandria Canal Company, assenting to the act of the Virginia Legislature amending the charter and enthorizing the Company to lease or sell weter privileges along the line of the canal.

The House went into committee on the Legislative, Judicial and Executive Appropriation bill.

Mr. Sherman offered an amendment providing that no part of the money for the territory, shall be expended till the release of those now under arrest for treason and other alleged political offeuces. The amendment was rejected by six majority.

Mr. Grow's emendment was also rejected.

Mr. Dunn offered a proviso that no part of this money shall be drawn till the bill shall be passed and approved by the President for the pecification of the troubles of Kansas, which shall contain slavery restriction regarding Kansas and Nebraska. The amendment was adopted—oyes 70, noes not counted.

The bill was also amended, on motion of Mr. Grow, so that no money shall be paid until the pending prosecutions for treason and other alleged offences are dismissed. Compensation to members of Legislature, officers, clerks and contingent expenses, amounting to $70,000, was stricken out.

The House then took a recess till 7 o'clock.

SAVE THE CHILDREN.

OF the multitudes of children that die before they reach their twelfth year, three-fourths are believed to be the victims of internal worms and the disorders they produce, which is well-like WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE, which will infallibly and rapidly cure the disease, is therefore of immense importance to every family. It is extolled in the highest terms by the faculty, and at this time when the mortality among children is greater than was ever before known, it is not safe or prudent for any household to be without it. Believing that the frightful increase of deaths among children is mainly attributable to worms and the disorders they produce, we recommend this specific to all who have charge of young families.

The ensuing scholastic year will commence on Wednesday, the 1st of October.

The Institution has entered on its sixth session under the auspices of the same Principal. A sense of duty, interest and pleasure tends his future connection with the institution permanent and perpetual.

The apparatus, Chemical, Philosophical and Astronomical, is large and well selected.

There is a numerous cabinet of minerals and fossils in connexion with the Seminary.

There is a library of more than one thousand volumes accessible to the pupils, which will shortly be increased several hundred volumes.

The number of musical instruments, pianos, harp, guitars, etc., is always sufficient to meet the wants of the department.

The institution is furnished with a large and excellent collection of maps, charts, diagrams, plates, globes, etc.

The grounds of the Seminary have been enlarged and the entire premises tastefully enclosed.

UNIFORM.

The Trustees and Principal at a meeting lately held, adopted a uniform for the following reasons:

1st. To secure economy in dress. It is impracticable to secure it otherwise.

2d. Our young ladies are of diverse pecuniary conditions, as is but to be expected where such a number are thrown together, and this diversity is published to the world by the different styles and quality of dress on all public occasions.

3d. On public occasions we have often, as well as the young ladies, been mortified to hear this diversity remarked.

4th. Without a uniform; there being no rule in the article of dress, the region of whim and caprice is left boundless, and the trouble of satisfying these endlessly diverse fancies in every article, is burdensome and annoying in the extreme. For the above and other good reasons, we have adopted a uniform, and commend it to our patrons and the public. It must be regarded as a law of the institution.

FOR WINTER, BROWN OF MEDIUM SHADE.

DRESSES—Brown Merino and brown cottons, made and trimmed plain.
BONNETS—Plain straw or thick braid, lined; trimmed cherry caps or bonnets for school.

Glimpses of Yankee Land will make up the present letter. The hurry of Railroads, and the bustle of hotels admit of nothing more. And these have a reminiscent character, because they are post facto sketches. The mode of traveling presents every thing in panoramic form. Objects and events move before the eyes, and wind themselves up in memory, to be unrolled when leisure shall permit.

The time between an early breakfast and a two o'clock dinner is spent on the rail from Albany to Springfield.—We are then for the first time in New England and amongst the granite hills of Massachusetts. The last days of July are burning days; the earth is parched, and the fields are withered and thirsty. The corn leaves have a dry weather twist, and the hay crisps in the swath, and the brown and sun-burnt potatoes look as if a telegraphic flame had swept over them. The sheep with noses close to the earth and panting for breath, congregate in the fence corners, and the cattle have left grazing and pursue there lazy ruminations in the shade of the broad-armed elms.—Red framed houses and brown barns, with orchards surrounding, appear and disappear, and the sleepy hills, whose crests are with verdure clad, hide their steps in the purple atmosphere.

Crossing the Connecticut river we are in Springfield, a city of perhaps fifteen thousand people, and the meeting place of several railroads. Here is the United States Arsenal and Armory, through which sight-seers are shown by officers in attendance. In one room there were ninety thousand muskets, set in frames and looking bright and warlike. The conductor stated that the Armory contained upwards of three hundred thousand muskets alone, besides rifles, pistols and swords. The shops where they are made were open and we saw these implements of death in every stage of manufacture, and in the various and complicated parts which belong to a single one. No where is division of labor carried further. One man completes nothing. The smallest screw is the product of several artisans through whose hands it passes on its way to the man whose business it is to put that screw in its place. The little tube which you notice on the muzzle of your barrels is first cast from the foundry, it passes to a workman who gives a touch or two, thence on to another who seems only to look at it, thence to another who polishes it, and finally to another who puts it on the gun. Probably not less than a hundred men are engaged in the making of a single gun, and as many as fifty in the making of a pistol. Every thing nearly is done by machinery of the most perfect kind, so that the artizan has little to do but to understand and manage it.

Chicopee is a small manufacturing village four miles from Springfield.—The water power is supplied by the Chicopee river which here empties into the Connecticut. At this place the large guns are made. The foundries of iron and brass are extensive. What most interests is the manufacture of brass cannons. They come out of the moulds rough black and solid. The first step is to bore them out, afterwards they are put in turning lathes where they are grooved and polished. Here we were shown a brazen statue of Benjamin Franklin, ordered by the city of Boston to be placed in front of the city hall. It is eight feet high and cost sixteen thousand dollars. The great American Philosopher is dressed in the costume of his day; long round cornered coat, immense waistcoat, short clothes and stockings, shoes and buckles and cocked hat under his left arm, and a stout staff in his right hand. It is a fine work of art, and one which our company studied with rapt delight.—The features and attitude are natural and life like, and embody all the true and just conceptions of the original.

Eight miles from Springfield is Willbraham, a picturesque village situated at the foot of a range of mountains and ornamented by some of New England's most ancient and stately elms.—These elms are to New England what the live oak is to Louisiana, the pride of her forests. A chapter might be written about them for they are of storied interest, and witnesses of events that are most thrilling. Apart from that they are as useful and ornamental adjuncts to scenery; they are monumental. They constitute, to my mind, a decided feature of what is beautiful and revered and the care with which they are cherished is evidence of taste and patriotism. These with her old homesteads and her hoary and honored grave stones, live, in relief, upon the tablets of memory. Dr. Raymond, president of the Willtraham Academy, showed us through the buildings of the institution. The class, lecture and society rooms are all pleasant and well furnished and the buildings present a handsome and substantial appearance. The grounds are beautified with shrubery and trees and the hills which rise behind, afford the student a most romantic stroll, and many a delectable spot for meditation and study. On the ruins of the students hall and boarding house burned sometime ago, a new and greatly superior edifice is about to be erected at a cost of fifty thousand dollars. A wealthy citizen of Boston, Mr. Rich, contributes ten thousand to this fund, and is erecting a house for the president which will cost as much more. The name of Fisk, the first president is still remembered and revered; and his portrait is suspended over the desk of the chapel, and over the seats of the presiding officers of each of the societies. The influence which such men exert after they are dead is wonderful. The people here, if they were Romanists, would cross themselves at the mention of his name. Such a deep abiding heart worship is secured by few, and the secret of it is worth investigation. I do not find that it was peerless intellect, nor that it was the urbanity and goodness of a christian gentleman.—Some, or all of these qualities Fisk may have possessed but they do not disclose the cause of that deathless love which his friends and disciples cherish. Whatever this quality is, your own sainted Stelle possessed it. Was it the mighty outpouring and spell bounding fascination of a healthy and glowing christian perfection? Willbraham is honored in her graduates, many of whom are amongst the most useful and distinguished men and women of the country. You know it is an Academy for both sexes. They are classed together and eat at the same table. Dr. Raymond thinks the policy good and that the system works well; that young people who are educated for society are better educated in it, and that a mutually good and healthful influence is exerted. The experiment has been long and fairly tried in this institution, and as a fact, is worthy of consideration.

On the first Sunday morning of August the sun rose upon us in Boston, the city of notions and the metropolis of "Down East." On our way to church and on our way back again the crookedness and irregularity of the streets is both striking and troublesome. This feature was the only disagreeable one except the temperature. The streets are scrupulously clean, and the buildings for uniformity and elegance are not excelled by any of our American cities. But the heat was terrible—as near the roasting point as weather could be. It snbdued, it melted; even Southerners became fusionists. For two days and two long nights the thermometer stood at near hundred degrees, and far more oppressive than the same temperature in New Orleans.

You have heard of and seen the Hanover Street Methodist Church. It is one of the finest churches in Boston, built of brown stone in Gothic style, and purchased of a Unitarian congregation for forty thousand dollars. It cost the builders ninety thousand dollars, but not being able to pay for it they were forced to sell, and the Methodist bought it. It is finished inside with black walnut; has arched ceilings, comfortably cushioned seats, stained glass windows, and is rather sombre and imposing every way. Like most of the principle Methodist churches in Northern cities, it is pewed, and has a splendid organ. The pastor, Rev. Mr. Trombley, gave a short hot weather sermon, on the "River, the streams whereof make glad the city of our God." The congregation was as thin as our own summer congregations, and not very different in appearance.

At six o'clock in the evening there was preaching on the Common. Services were held under an immense awning and attended by a large concourse. The people stood patiently through a long service and paid the utmost attention. The sermon was on that delightful text, "God so loved the world," and came from the preacher's lips with sweet and refreshing unction. These open air services are held under the auspices of the "Young Men's Christian Association," and are conducted by ministers of different denominations. They are gotten up with considerable eclat, and seem to be attended by those who have pews in the churches. Brother Ivy's unpretending discourses on Washington Square reach the right class better, and do more good. The signs of the times are that we must come to out-of-door preaching, and this effort on Boston Common is one of them. I could not help turning from this demonstration, endorsed by all denominations, to the old elm under which Jesse Lee stood half or quarter of a century ago, and preached alone, without an escort or a friend. It was an unmeant acknowledgment, the triumph of a policy which Methodism has illustrated, and for which she has been abused. We must leave what remains of Boston sights, the White Mountains and the Connecticut Valley for our next letter.

"NOT MUCH IN THE OUTSIDE ROW."

Fragments of profound philosophy are to be gathered where least suspected to exist. Perhaps we are all more or less philosophers, but for the want of proper symbols or the quickness to seize suitable analogies, our philosophy remains latent. Or, perhaps, we seek in a sphere unnatural to us, and become disgusted with mere speculations. Unsupported by common sense, we make our failure. Were we to acquaint ourselves with the practical forms and intelligible phenomena in that sphere natural to us, I imagine we would oftener succeed. Commune with others as we do with ourselves.

We were suddenly thrown into deep and painful reflections during a recent protracted meeting, on asking a very pious old negro man why he did not enter into the spirit of the services. "Ah, master," he replied "there is not much in the outside row."

Old uncle Charlie was a practical philosopher. He had helped gather many a crop of corn and cotton, and he had noticed as an invariable rule that from the shade, natural wildness of the soil, careless cultivation and the incursions of the squirrels, the "outside row" yielded little. He had occupied the back seat in the church from necessity during the meeting, and finding himself after several days still unblessed and his feelings but slightly, if at all enlisted, he compared his case to that a reaper in the outside row, and very philosophically concluded that the back seats in the church resemble the outside row in the field.

How far do facts support the old man's philosophy? Reflect a moment reader, and let experience and observation decide. There are others besides uncle Charlie in that outside row, and from choice. When inclination led us to seek back seats in the church, did we do so with the likelihood of becoming interested in the subject of religion? I imagine the reverse of this was our conclusion and the motive of our selection. When grace had made us heirs of salvation, did we not instinctively avoid those back seats, acting unconsciously upon the principle that "there is not much in the outside row."

"Straws show which way the wind blows"—so does the selection of a seat in church by a person go far to indicate the character of his desire.

Does not observation identify the back seats as the "way side" our Saviour so strikingly describes, where the grain, though scattered, is readily picked up by the birds; as the stony ground and the thorny ground, where for want of depth and the intrusion of rank growing succulents, the sap is withdrawn from the heavenly plant which soon wilts or becomes unfruitful?

Mark the occupants of the outside row. Are they deeply religious, fruitful in holiness? Do they enter into the spiritnality of God's worship? Though in his house, do they enjoy the pleasures of devotion? Their experience, what is it? Of grace? Alas, no. It may be of grace lost; of despair of regaining it, of remorse. Their thoughts, how can one divine them. Look upon the backs of those seats and you will fully realize there is "not much in the outside row." They indulge in desecration, flippant and heartless criticism.

These evil communications often corrupt the good manners of some declining Peter, who, dropping back into the outside row, is seen following Christ afar off, then denying and cursing.

But what a deep complaint is timidly expressed in the old man's answer.—He bends to toil patiently, and bears his burden through the week, and when Sunday comes takes the place assigned him in the church, impressively described by him as the "outside row." Do you expect him to achieve a religious character; to act his part up to the schedule; to adorn the doctrines of Christ, his Savior? What then dear reader will be your excuse if you come up deficient? Remember the fruitful field is yours, the outside row is his.

ITEMS OF CALIFORNIA.

THE CLIMATE.

By common consent, one of the most striking peculiarities and one of the greatest charms of California is its climate. I had often heard and read of this before coming to the State, and had been more attracted by it than by all the accounts of its gold; and yet I had not properly conceived of it. It is as peculiar as it is glorious. With the exception of the wind, the winter and the spring are, for the most, agreeable seasons of the year. I was not here in the winter, but was during the entire spring. The citizens concur in the statement that the temperature of the weather in the winter is more uniform and agreeable than any other season. It is just cool enough to be bracing, soft enough to be balmy, and these so commingled as to be exhilerating. Life is felt to be more pre-eminently a blessing. Health is usually so good as to afford enjoyment. Men, horses and cattle, under its influence, have greater power of endurance—can all do more with less fatigue. And I do suppose that it is the greatest sleeping country that God has made in this world. The general testimony is that it is just right—all right for the purpose—hence the sleep is most refreshing and invigorating. And, as a sea-Captain remarked to me, that while it is the best country to sleep in, a man may afford to sleep in it more than any other country, because there is more time to work in, and less time to provide for as a mere season of consumption, as in the winters of the Atlantic and Western States. A man, however, does not need more sleep here, he is so refreshed by the ordinary amount.

Another peculiarity of this climate is its variety. On the Pacific coast and on the extended Bay of San Francisco, there is nearly always a generous breeze, and very often strong winds, and this is the case on the adjacent valleys to these points. In some of the more interior valleys, in the spring and summer, it becomes very warm, and in some instances exceedingly hot. The air becomes hot; sometimes so hot as to lose its refreshing power, and feels to be more subduing than refreshing. Sometimes when traveling on the foot-hills of the mountains, I have felt hot breezes sweeping up from the valleys that would approximate a scalding intensity; and yet so strangely is it constituted that it subdues you less than the same amount of heat of perhaps any other country. On one occasion, traveling from Stockton to Sonora, just after crossing the river at Knight's Ferry, at which time the thermometer stood at 103, and during the same day at other points at 112, I felt a very strong dash of this hot air, which made me anxious to be on higher ground, which I soon attained to considerable advantage.

I am told that at San Francisco the months of July and August are the coldest and most disagreeable of any in the year. This my friend Jenella assured me to be true, and he has been familiar with the climate since the year 1849. You can have a greater variety of climate here in a smaller distance than any country I have seen. On one occasion, in the latter part of the month of May, I was attending a Camp Meeting near a little mining town called Vallecita, where the weather was agreeable, and at a distance of only eighteen miles in the mountain country, at the famous big trees, the snow was eight inches deep. Laboring until my voice failed me from hoarseness at the meeting, I visited the valley of the big trees, the greatest wonder of the kind I have seen in my life. When I shall notice the curiosities of California I shall not forget these big trees, of which Bishop Andrew wrote, but whose account of them escaped my eye. The snow had disappeared when Brother Bingham and myself reached the trees, but as noticed in my last, eternal snows are reposing upon that wonderful mountain the Sierra Nevada, a beautiful view of which we had from a neighboring hill of the big trees.

It is a wonderful fact that California, which is about the same latitude as Virginia, should be so mild and so very agreeable in its winter season as it is. I have heard various conjectures as to the cause of this. I think that the most probable one is the fact that the trade winds of the winter are from the tropical regions of the South, and these being so uniform, give both the mildness and the uniformity to the winters of this country.

One of the greatest drawbacks to this country is that there is no rain in it from the first of June, and frequently earlier, until some time in the month of November. The dust becomes deep, light and most abundant and very annoying to the traveler. There is, however, one advantage at least, resulting to the farmers from this fact. Their small grain, (and they have but little else,) is never injured by the rain; the stalk cures in the field; the time of harvesting is greatly protracted, so that one hand can do the more labor and save the outlay of money for hands.—The grasses too dry up, but retain much of their nutricious quality, and when you would not suppose it, the cattle keep fat upon these apparently withered substances.

I am still acquainting myself with this field of labor; the prospects of the church; the general state of religion; but will defer writing on the religious condition of the country for some weeks yet.

Truly yours, H. H. KAVANAUGH.

THE GOOD PHYSICIAN IS ABOUT---CALL HIM IN.

Once there was a man who had an only daughter, the idol of his heart, and in whom was centered fond affections; and the child was worthy of the affection of the doting parents. She was beloved by all who knew her—for she had a tender heart, and young as she was, could mourn with the afflicted, and with her little hands would brush back the hair from the burning forehead of those she loved, and moisten the fever parched lips of any who would call her. A lovely child, such a one as mine eyes will never again behold.

She, though an angel in disguise, was not beyond the reach of disease, and her sweet face was often crimsoned with fever; her sweet lips that uttered such endearing words, and uttered words of wisdom worthy a sage, were oftimes parched. And I have heard her moans, and seen her little chest heave, and her mild blue eye, bloodshot from the effects of fever, wandering from place to place and resting on a fond mother or doting father, who stood around heart-broken to see the sufferings—the untold agony of the loved one, without the power to relieve. I have seen her raise her parching hands imploringly to her parents and ask for a little water. I have seen the agony depicted in the countenances of those parents as they had to refuse her request—her last request. I have seen such a one suffer for days and at last die.

I have read of a father who had an only daughter sick with a fever.—The fond parents had done all human skill could, but to no avail. At this time the father heard of a physician who chanced to be passing through the neighborhood. He at once ran unto him and fell at his feet, and prayed him to come to his house to do what could be done to save the life of his child. The kind-hearted physician proceeded on his way to the house, but being thronged by the way by others who were suffering, and healing them, he was detained until word was brought to the father that the daughter was dead, and not to trouble the good physician further. We may imagine the agony of the father when this heart-breaking message was brought to him, but the good physician hearing the message and seeing the agony of the childless parent, touched with sympathy for the suffering man, said to him, "FEAR NOT," believe only and she shall live. The poor man did believe, and his heart bounded with hope again for the recovery of the loved one. The good physician entering the house, hushed the wailing of the mother and others around the corpse, saying, "Weep not, she is not dead but sleepeth."—Those who did not know his power "laughed him to scorn." But he put them all out of the room except the parents and three of his followers, and took her by the hand and said "Maid arise!" and she that was dead arose, and he commanded that she should have nourishing food given her.

The good physician who performed this cure raised others; opened the eyes of the blind; cured others of diseases of long years standing, some of which had baffled the skill of the physician for years, until all their property was wasted—and did it all "without money and without price." This good physician is now in our country, and accessible to all who are afflicted, and will cure all who go to him in faith—his only fee being that they who are healed should love him.

A BEREAVED BUT CONSOLED PARENT.

This odd and suggestive notice appears in the New York papers: "As the greater portion of the congregation who worship at Grace Church, N. Y., are at the watering places, this edifice will remain closed until September next."

ONE WEEK LATER FROM EUROPE.

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMSHIP ARAGO.

The United States Mail steamship Arago, Captain Lines, from Havre the morning and Southampton the evening of the 30th ult., arrived at New York on the morning of the 11th inst. Her news is not very important.

The Arago brought the French and English mails, and 175 passengers, among whom are Signor C. Ferrero, bearer of dispatches from Sardinia; C. M. Pearing, Esq., bearer of dispatches from St. Petersburg; Judge Willard, of Troy, N. Y.; Mr. C. B. Ives, American sculptor, from Rome; and the Vicomte de Thierry, French Consul for New Orleans.

The Duke of Cambridge has been introduced into the Privy Council.

The London Times, speaking of the Queen's speech on the prorogation of Parliament, says:

"The notice of the negotiations with regard to Central America is cold and brief, as befits a subject of delicacy and difficulty which might easily be aggravated by any unadvised word; but we hope that at the opening of the next session the Queen will be able to address her Parliament in very different terms with regard to the relations of this country to the United States of America."

During the spring quarter ended June 30th, 1856, the emigration from the ports of the United Kingdom was less by nearly 6,000 than the emigration (66,111) in the spring quarter of 1855, and less than half the average emigration (113,141) of the corresponding quarters of the eight years 1847-54.

Mrs. H. E. Wenn's Readings.—"Uncle Tom" and his cabin have not yet disappeared from the gaze of the London public. Yesterday afternoon a long line of carriages, drawn up before Stafford-house, the residence of the Duchess of Sutherland, declared to the west end world that some new attraction had brought together several members of the higher circles. Mrs. H. E. Webb, a lady of color, daughter of a Spanish gentleman and of a female slave of Virginia, had recently arrived in London, bringing with her a dramatized version of Uncle Tom's Cabin, composed by Mrs. Stowe herself, for the purpose of a public reading, and the hall of the splendid mansion in St. James' had been granted to her by the Duchess, as the site of the entertainment.

France.

The Paris correspondent of the London Times, writing at 6 P. M. of July 24th, says:

The commercial situation of Paris has not changed and the present stagnation of affairs is likely to last a fortnight or three weeks longer. Some demands for articles de Paris were received this week from England, and the last packet from the United States brought orders from New York for Paris and Lyons manufactures. The latter, however, cannot be executed on account of the rise which has lately taken place in the price of tissues.

Spain.

Intelligence from Spain to the 26th ult., states that Incona had submitted. The Captain General of Havana had superseded the Governor and sent troops to replace the present garrison.

Gen. Ruiz, the commandant of Gerona, had evacuated the town. He was only followed by a company of chapeaus of the National Militia.

Discouragement and disorganization were making rapid progress in the ranks of the insurgent militia.

Later intelligence from Spain states that Malaga and Granada had pronounced. The ayuntamiento had proclaimed against O'Donnell. The Royal troops had fraternized to the cries "Death to O'Donnell! viva Espartero y la Constitucion!"

The Monitour publishes the following telegraphic dispatch from the French Consul at St. Sebastian to the Minister of Foreign Affairs:

"ST. SEBASTIAN, July 28.—There are no advices from Saragossa since my last dispatch. The uncertainty of the news is to be attributed to the delay of five days granted by General Dulce to the Junta."

The Moderados were strenuously exerting themselves to prevent the reorganization of the National Guard. The Progressists appeared inclined to support General O'Donnell as the last hope of the Liberal party, but they had not yet made known their decision on the subject.

It was considered certain that the present Cortes would be dissolved.

Italy.

A trifling outbreak had taken place at Massa-Carrara. At Austrian instigation some 70 youths crossed the frontiers, but finding themselves discovered returned to their homes and all was quiet again. Count de Carobro was ruralising at present.

Later intelligence states that the movement at Massa had been completely suppressed. Only about sixty persons crossed from the Sardinian territory, twenty were arrested on the frontier. The telegraphic communication had been re-established.

Austria.

It has been decided by the Ministers of Public Instruction and of the Interior, that the Jews in Austria shall establish public schools for their children, and that at their own expense. On the 18th instant, the King of Prussia visited Prince Metternich at his chateau of Konigswart.

The Cologne Gazette says that a telegraphic dispatch was sent on the 22d to Gratz, ordering 3,000,000 of ball cartridges, to be sent from the magazines of that place to Italy. The Minister of War at the same time countermanded the orders for reducing the cavalry and artillery to a peace footing. Prince Paul Esterhazy left Vienna on the 24th, with a numerous suite for Moscow.

The same journal contains a letter from Trieste, which says:

We have received through Dalmatia intelligence from Montenegro, which confirms the rumor that 3500 men had advanced toward Cettoyen under the command of Menko Perrowitch. This expedition is directed against the district of Koncl, which has refused to pay the annual tribute to Prince Daniel.

West Coast of Africa.

PLYMOUTH, July 29.

The African Steam Navigation Company's mail packet Niger, Commander Parsons, arrived this afternoon.

The recent death of Captain Hart, Regent of Bonny, is likely to lead to disturbances through want of agreement in the family of his successor.

The President of Liberia has been under the necessity of issuing a proclamation to prevent the immigration of laborers to French Guiana.

Several French men-of-war were at Goree, July 16th.

A Prussian squadron, consisting of the frigate Thetis, a paddle-wheel frigate, a corvette and a schooner, and the American frigate Jamestown, were at Madeira.

ARRIVAL OF THE CANADA AT HALIFAX.

The Royal Mail steamship Canada, Capt. Lang, arrived at Halifax on the the evening of the 11th inst. She sailed from Liverpool on the morning of the 2d inst., and brings London papers to the 1st.

The Collins steamer Baltic, from New York July 18th, arrived at Liverpool on the morning of the 30th.

The screw-steamer North American, from Quebec, arrived at Liverpool on the 31st.

The general news by this arrival is wholly devoid of interest.

Great Britain.

Parliament being over, the papers are mostly filled with railway meetings and law reports.

The city of London has presented a sword costing one hundred guineas, to Gen. Williams.

The Queen reviewed 30,000 troops at Aldershott camp, on the 31st.

The gold chronometer presented by the President of the United States to Capt. Clarke, of the ship Bacchus, for having rescued the crew of the American ship May Flower, was handed over by the Marine Board of Liverpool, on the 30th ult.

A Liverpool jury had given a verdict of manslaughter against the mate and pilot of the steamship Excelsior in their recent fatal collision with the steamer Mail.

The Indian mail brings accounts of an earthquake in Moluccas, March 2, causing the loss of 2,000 lives.

France.

The Monitour promulgates various bills passed during the last session of the last Legislative Assembly. Among them is the bill providing for the Orleans pensions.

Spain.

The accounts from Spain continue uncertain, but the indications are that the royal cause has triumphed; that the entire country has submitted, and that Saragossa, unsupported, will be immediately reduced.

The Independence Belge, as well as other journals, represent O'Donnell as in a fix out of his jealousy to Espartero, and state that in the hope of remaining in office he consented to do the work of re-action, but finding that in his expectations he was deceived, and that the Moderados would not accept of him as their chief, he is again coquetting with the Liberals.

The Madrid correspondent of the Independence Belge positively assures that paper that the Constituent Cortes will be dissolved, and that the Constitution of 1837 or 1845 will be reverted to.

Private letters represent O'Donnell as entirely reserving his plans to himself.

Senor Olozaga, the Spanish Ambassador at Paris, one of the most influential men of the Liberal party, resigned his post immediately on hearing of the coup d'etat, but it is said that the Queen has refused to accept his resignation, and that efforts are being made to induce him to remain in Paris.

Gen. Narvaez is indignant at the rejection of his proffered services.

Austria.

Letters state the relations of Austria and Russia are becoming friendly.

Italy.

A letter from Parma, in the Turin Opinion, states that the Austrians have made preparations for crossing the Po at four different points.

Belgium.

The rumor recently circulated that the King of the Belgians would abdicate is contradicted by himself.

Prussia.

It is said that the King of Saxony will be present at the contemplated interview between the King of Prussia and the Emperor of Austria at Toplitz.

Sweden.

A communication from Stockholm speaks of the audience which the French and Prussian Ambassadors had with the King, and of the great stir amongst the diplomatists consequent on these audiences. Report says the subject of excitement was a reclamation made by Norway against the Russians, who, it is alleged, are encroaching upon the Norwegian Territory, and planning fortifications along the Baltic coast. The Swedish papers, however, make no allusion to the matter.

Turkey.

It is reported that the refusal of the Russians to give up Kars is explained. The English Commissioner, whom the Russians refused to receive, had no authority to ask possession, and did not do so. He merely requested permission to examine the fortifications, which he was not permitted to do. Respecting Russian occupation of the Isle of Serpents, Lord Stratford de Redcliffe has sent Gen. Mansfield to inquire in regard to it.

Intelligence received at Constantinople states that the insurrection in Arabia had been completely subdued.

The Chief of the insurgents was captured at the fortress of Taif, and sent prisoner to Constantinople.

Russia.

Russia has reduced her tariff on sugar. Russian letters deny that the Aland Islands will be refortified, but admit they will be garisoned by Russian troops.

Louisiana Intelligence.

The Lafourche Union, of the 14th inst., in an article on the weather, says:

From Sunday up to the time of our going to press, we have had very inclement weather. Sunday and Monday it blew a regular gale, uprooting trees, tearing down fences and chimneys, filling with rain the canal, and playing the very mischief with everything in general. The brick ends of the old store-house of Daquis & Brothers were thrown down by the wind.

THE LAST ISLAND DISASTER.—We learn from the Franklin Journal that at a meeting of the survivors of this disaster, which was held on the steamer Major Ambrey on the 14th inst., the following preamble and resolutions were adopted:

Whereas, The participants and sufferers during the severe hurricane which occurred at Last Island on the 10th inst., deem it necessary to give an expression in regard to the noble and praiseworthy efforts of certain individuals who ventured their lives for the safety of many of the survivors, therefore

Be it resolved, That we hereby tender our hearty thanks to Capt. Abraham Smith, John Miller, pilot, Perry, second pilot, Briggs, engineer, and the crew of the steamer Star. Also to Thomas H. Ellis and A. B. Carey, for their noble and humane efforts in preserve human life.

Be it resolved, That Dr. A. Dupérier, J. L. Lewis and Jonas Marsh be appointed a committee to collect by subscription a sum of money to purchase suitable testimonials of our gratitude, for Capt. A. Smith, of the steamer Star.

W. W. PUGH, President.

DR. A. DUPERIER, Acting Sec'y.

EFFECTS OF THE GALE IN ST. MARY'S PARISH.—We learn from the Franklin Journal of the 14th inst., that the late storm was very severe in that parish, in fact exceeded any thing within the recollection of "the oldest inhabitant." It commenced about 12 o'clock on Sunday and increased in fury until 9 or 10 o'clock that night, about which time it was at its height. About two o'clock on Sunday night it shifted from the northerly direction which it had been blowing all day, to an eastward, and again to a southerly direction; in these changes it created sad havoc—twisting off large limbs of live oak trees, taking off the roofs of houses, flattening fences and laying prostrate the cane and corn crop of the parish.

In Franklin a great deal of damage was done, the wind carrying off the roof of the Odd Fellows' Hall, a large brick building, used for stores and offices, and throwing it some distance into the street. Messrs. J. Levy & Co., dry goods merchants, and Wm. Bogel, druggist, suffered considerable damage from the water in consequence, they occupying the lower story of this building. Levy's loss is estimated at $10,000, and Bogel's at $2,000. Messrs. Clark and Hedrick, ambrotypists, who occupied the upper story of the building, had their apparatus slightly damaged, and several pictures destroyed.

Several small sheds were blown down about the town. The capacious warehouses in the upper part of the town, belonging to Mr. Trowbridge, were blown down. The sugar-houses of T. Carlin, Thomas J. Foster, Capt. A. L. Fields and J. B. Murphy, were all destroyed. The brick shed and baggasse chimney of Gabriel Grevemberg was destroyed. Theodore Fay, Adrien Frere, Joseph Frere, J. L. Fuselier & Son, Mrs. Louisa Fuselier, T. & N. Sigur, Judge Seymour, Euphrasy Carlin, were all damaged, some of them having their sugar purgeries blown down, and some of them sustained the loss of their cane sheds, and the majority of them damaged in other ways. A large stable on the plantation of Henry Foote, the mill house of J. D. Hudgens; Mr. Burns' stable and the steam chimney on the plantation of Watson McKerall were blown down. And along the whole extent of the bayou there is scarcely a sugar-house standing.

An accurate account of all the losses had not been made, but it was thought that the losses of the citizens of that parish could not be less than $1,000,000. Besides almost totally ruining the cane and corn crops. Planters the coming season will be forced to buy all the provender for their stock which they may need.

The Journal concludes by saying that the denizens of St. Mary's will long remember the desolating effects of this storm.

Later from Texas.

By the steamship Mexico, Capt. J. Y. Lawless, which arrived here last evening, we have Galveston and Indianola dates to the 13th inst. They contain very little of interest to our readers. The obliging purser has kindly furnished us with the following memoranda:

On Sunday, 10th inst., were ready for sea, but the wind blowing a gale were unable to get away from the wharf. After several attempts on Monday, the 11th inst., at 7 A. M. got away from the wharf and proceeded to the Balize, which we reached at 3 P. M. same day, and came to anchor. Saw many relics of the storm at the Balize.

On Tuesday, 12th inst., weighed anchor and proceeded to sea; wind still blowing heavy and a rough sea. Shaped our course to be in the way of any wrecks, and saw water-casks, deck plank, chairs, etc. Saw a schooner ashore on Timballer Island, and a large vessel at Ship Island Shoals. The wind was blowing, and it being near dark, could not approach her, she being in about four feet water, as near as we could guess.

On Wednesday weather better, and same day, 13th, arrived at Galveston, at 5 P. M. Nothing of interest occurred until Monday, 18th inst. East of Timballer Island saw many pieces of cabin work—grained and white doors, deck plank, etc. From Timballer to South West Pass picked up a wheel-barrow apparently about a week at sea—one of the kind used in coaling steamships, and marked W. Lee—the person's name who had charge of the coal gang—and some barrows the Nautilus had purchased for wheeling coal ashore at Brazos.

Did not see the Perseverance, but understood that she was at sea this (Monday) morning. Saw very large pieces of broken wreck—hull and spars; most of the wreck appeared to be that of a steamship cabin, but saw no rosewood, mahogany or maple, such as was used in the construction of the Nautilus.

The Indianola Bulletin, of the 16th, says:

The weather continues dry and sultry; the dog days are on us; the health of the town good, and all apprehension of sickness passed. The merchants are receiving large lots of merchandise, and are preparing for a large fall trade.

NEW ORLEANS:

SATURDAY, AUGUST 23, 1856.

HEALTH.—The Board report five cases of yellow fever last week—though a less aggregate of deaths than the week before. Four of these cases were clearly imported. One is doubtful about the fifth.

JOHN LOCKEN'S BIBLE.—To those who read our notice of this substantial edition of the Holy Scriptures, and have enquired more concerning it, we take this method of replying that it is not on sale here, but may be had in Nashville. It is sold by our book agents. True, it is a capital pulpit Bible, for it will stand any quantity of hammering. You can't hammer it to pieces—that is with your fist.

PUT YOUR TITLE.—Ministers sending marriage notices must not be too modest to put Rev. before their names. Squires sometimes marry, though rarely that class of persons whose nuptials are published in the Advocate. An old Presiding Elder was annoyed lately by seeing himself printed in one of these notices as Esq. The printer found him without a title and thought that a safe venture.

QUARTERLY MEETING AT OCEAN SPRINGS.—On Saturday and Sunday last, a week ago, we had the pleasure of attending one of his quarterly meetings, with Rev. G. Garrett, P. E. of the Mobile District, at this place. Though the weather was unpropitious the services were well maintained. The neat and spacious school-house served well.—There was a good state of religious feeling in the congregation. After the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, a class was formed of nine—some of whom now joined for the first time—and put under charge of Brother Ferrell, a local preacher. We were never more impressed with the system of class-meeting as a nucleus for church organization.

THE CORNER STONE SPEECH.—Our readers will be pleased to know that we have in hand, for the printer, a copy of the address delivered by Rev. C. K. Marshall on laying the corner stone, of Centenary College. It will appear next week and speak for itself. As allusion was made to the Masonic Fraternity (of which the speaker is a member) that was misunderstood unpleasantly by some present, this publication will be the more interesting and do justice to to the case.

MAILS IN LOUISIANA.—We are much put out with the imperfect mail service in middle and Northern Louisiana. Our subscribers in Bienville, Bosier and Claiborne parishes especially, are illused. We wish it were in our power to get the Advocate to them punctually—as generally they are very punctual in their annual payment for it. Only last week by a mishap or a missent, the package for Sparta failed, entirely.

As a general relief to all that rich and populous interior country, we suggest to our friends to push forward the Vicksburgh and Shreveport Rail Road. Give aid to Dr. Young, the President, and we will do the best we can, with the slow coaches till the iron rail is laid.

DR. THOMSON'S WORKS.—We have by mail, from Messrs. Swormstedt & Poe, Cina., two most readable volumes.—One—Biographical and Incidental sketches. The other—Moral and Religious Essays—by E. Thomson, D. D. L. L. D. Edited by D. W. Clark, D. D. Much of these volumes has before been published in the periodicals—but this will add to the desire to obtain them rather than diminish the demand.—The vigor, originality and classic elegance of Dr. T. are well established in reputation.

COLEMAN'S MILLS.—The proprietor made himself as agreeable to his friends in the city on last Saturday 5 P. M. as his undulatory corn and flouring mills are to the planters. We acknowledge the receipt of a very polite invitation for our presence on the occasion of changing the business office from the old stand, to 85 St. Charles' street, under the Masonic Hall. There Mr. Coleman's customers will find him, in future. See Advertisement.

AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY.—The fortieth Annual Report of the American Bible Society has been issued, and also the addresses delivered at the anniversary. The Report shows the receipts of the Society, within the last year, to be little short of $400,000, and the number of Bibles and Testaments issued to be 666,125. The managers have resolved on a general supply of the destitute.

GREAT LOSS OF LIFE.

The calamity of Last Island, so melancholy and awful, has cast a gloom over our city and country. Last Island, or Derniere Isle, is a beautiful stretch of land on the Gulf coast, in the parish of Terrebone, elevated about four feet above ordinary tides, twenty-five miles from the main land. Its length is about thirty miles, by an average width of one mile.

During the last few years this watering place has rapidly risen to favor on account of its delightful sea breezes and the facilities of reaching it. A large hotel was recently erected on the most elevated point of land, and furnished with every accommodation for summer visitors. Also a great number of beautiful and airy cottages, built as summer residences for planters throughout Southern Louisiana. It was the Nahant of our sugar planting population, who with their families, have been the principal sufferers by the unparalleled inundation. On last Sunday week, as our columns elsewhere more particularly relate, the waves from the Bay and the Gulf came up on each side and met in overwhelming floods. It is supposed that the loss will sum up at least two hundred lives.

The steamship Nautilus too, from Galveston to this port, is now given up for lost. Portions of her wreck, as it is supposed, have been picked up. Rev. Jerome Twitchell, Presbyterian minister, late of this city, and subsequently of Houston, Texas; Captain A. Marsh, Inspector of steamboats, and other valuable citizens were passengers.

The wreck of ships and loss of life and property have been appalling.—How impotent and short-sighted is man! These events teach us our dependence. Staunch ships are no defense. The inhabited island is swept desolately clear in an hour. A blast of wind, a wave let loose, and human bodies just now full of life and hope and beauty, are cast livid upon the shore with boxes and spars, and wrecks of houses and confused heaps. God only is great.

SINNERS REBUKING SAINTS.

The terse and eloquent tribute paid by a living preacher to a departed and "true yoke-fellow," will be recognized, by those who knew the deceased, as also just. The Church has much to gain in working herself up to an appreciation of such men as was Rev. J. M. Wells. They hold the working oar, though others may carry off the special favors and pony-purses. Brother Koger, in a private note, gives us the following facts, illustrating certain remarks in his article. It sees the light on our responsibility:

"At G——, in 1853, during a revival, several eminent preachers, as Dr. —— and Dr. ——, were present and preached. Wells preached too. At the close of the meeting, presents, liberal ones, were made to the D. D's. Wells was there all the time, and working hard, except Saturday and Sunday, when he was on his negro mission. He seemed to think it all right that those brethren should be complimented with presents. He never once dreamed of any for himself! No.

One morning he walked into my house, apparently under deep emotion, with a letter in his hand and tears in his eyes. He handed me the letter, I opened it and found between forty and fifty dollars. The letter was signed by the donors, many of them sinners, begging his acceptance. He was to full to speak, for a time. It was one of the bright spots in his life. The act did honor to the donors as much as to the humble servant of God. Once, at least, he enjoyed the happiness of being appreciated, and that too from a quarter he least expected."

A BRIEF COLLOQUY.—"Our doctrine," said a Universalist preacher, "is certainly the most merciful; it imbraces in its charity the whole of man, and diverts God of all appearance of that severe justice which you say requires him to damn sinners. Surely, if you would consult your peace of mind, you would discard your gloomy Calvinism and embrace it." "True," says the plain Christian addressed, "it seems to be very charitable; but is it true?—Suppose I should trust in it, is there any way of rectifying my mistake, if in the other world I should find it to be erroneous? I feel no disposition to hazard my soul, and as Universalism will, if true, cover my case at all events. I will in the meantime trust to the good old way, of believing in Christ for salvation, and testifying my sincerity by a holy life."

NO PERFECTION.—Naaman was a mighty man, but he was a leper. Every man has some but or other in his character—something that blemishes or diminishes him—some damp to his joy.—He may be very happy, very good, yet in some thing or other not so good as he should be. Naaman was as great as the world could make him; and yet, as Bishop Hall remarks, the basest slave in Syria would not have changed skins with him.—[Mathew Henry.

RELATION OF BAPTIZED CHILDREN TO THE CHURCH.

We have several times referred to this subject. It is a very important one. Practically and theoretically, it demands attention of American Protestantism. The General Conference of the Methodist Church, North, accepted many of the regulations and disciplinary recensions of the Church, South. As these bodies meet two years apart, it affords an opportunity of mutually improving upon, and by, each other's measures.

The Christian Advocate and Journal gives a summary of the adopted Report from the Committee on Revisals, regarding the "relation of baptized children to the Church." We have before published the law:

"1. The relation of the child to the economy of grace is stated as the ground of his relation to the Church. This is a dogmatic feature of the law; legal prescriptions should not usually be embarrassed with dogmatic statements, but it was deemed desirable by the Conference that the theological truth which underlies the right of infant baptism should be distinctly presented, as much vagueness is supposed to prevail among our people upon this subject. The law, therefore, assumes that "all children are, by virtue of the unconditional benefits of the atonement, placed in a state of grace, and therefore morally entitled to the benefits of baptism." The right of the child to baptism, it will be perceived, is not founded upon any assumption of natural innocence, but the relation he is placed in towards God by the "unconditional benefits of the atonement."

2. The relation of the child, thus baptized, to the Church, is then defined by the new law. It pronounces that as as all such children are "placed in visible covenant relation to God," they should be "under the special care and supervision of the Church."

3. Having defined the dogmatic basis of infant baptism, and the evangelical and ecclesiastical status of the baptized child, the law proceeds to prescribe the practical course to be taken in order to secure the baptized child the advantage of its new relation to the Church.

1. The preacher in charge is required to keep a baptismal register, noting the parentage, residence, birth and baptism of the child.

2. The duty of instructing the child respecting the nature and obligations of its baptism, etc., is enjoined.

3. He is to be allowed and encouraged to attend class-meeting.

4. At the suitable age, when giving "evidence of a desire to flee the wrath to come," his name is to be placed upon the list of probationers, and, after the usual trial, he is to be received into full communion with the Church, on the usual conditions.

5. Whenever a baptised child shall, by orphanage or otherwise, become deprived of Christian guardianship, the preacher in charge is to ascertain and report to the society of the leaders' meeting, the facts in the case, and such provision is to be made for the Christian training of the child as the circumstances of the case admit and require.

Such are the outlines of this important measure.

These provisions for our children constitute an epoch in our history. It has been a uniform complaint among us, for years, that the children of the Church had no definite relation to, or protection from it—none correspondent with the significance of infant baptism. Received by that rite at our altars, they were immediately cast out again into the world, and left there, with or without religious training, as accidental circumstances might determine, until, in the course of adult life, they might again return to the altar, and ask for a second recognition by the Church. This neglect has not only characterized us as a denomination, to the loss it may be of tens of thousands of our youth, but it has been, we were about to say, distinctive of the whole country, as a Christian land. In no other religious country on earth, Protestant, Catholic, Mohammeden, Jewish or heathen, has there prevailed an equal neglect of the religious relations of children. And the consequence is visible deplorably, for in no other land is the sense of religion more vague among the young, and the sentiment of reverence more feeble, except when excited by some special means. Mohammedan and heathen children are addicted, from the cradle, to the practical habits of their religion; these habits are as much a part of their daily life as eating, drinking and sleeping. For this reason it is that they grow up steadfast to their faith. The problem of the popular devotion of Romanists to their own Church is explicable only by the same fact. From childhood they are habituated to at least its external services; the habit becomes a "second nature" to them. However wrong their religion itself, their devotion to it is exemplary and commendable. They crowd their churches; if there is not room enough in the pews, they kneel in the aisles; if the aisles are crowded they kneel in the porticos, on the steps, in the very streets—old men, women and little children; and there is hardly a Papistic church in the land that does not thus shame the Protestant Churches around it. Why is this? Would it be so if Catholic children were trained in the neglect of the external forms of religion, as so many of ours are? Certainly not.

There is even a a sentiment of shame felt by our youth for religion—an astonishing, a monstrous peculiarity. When one becomes religiously awakened, this is among his first difficulties. To break away from his old habit of irreligion, to take upon him the new, because long neglected duties of the Church, amid his associates, who, like himself have practiced none of them, is a check to the whole habitude of his nature, and he recalls often from the thought with the question, "How will it look? what will be said of it among my associates?" Alas for so, degrading a fact—alas that it should be almost a peculiarity of Protestant lands! Let us teach our children differently; let us place them within the pale of the Church by baptism, and train them there to the sense of their relation to it, and the practice of their corresponding duties.

And now that we have begun this long-neglected course, let us see to it that the confirmed habit of our negligence does not defeat the design. We confess no little anxiety on this point. The specifications of the new law are somewhat numerous, and there is danger that many of the preachers may neglect them all, because some of them may be found onerous.—Whatever else we might feel at liberty to treat thus, let us not longer be guilty of this great dereliction.—Let us get the baptismal register for each and every Church; let us at suitable intervals hear the children recite the Catechisms ordained by the General Conference; let us preach to them, and preach to parents respecting them; let us gather them into the class-meetings, as above prescribed; let us, in fine, recognize their relation to us, as the lambs of the flock, and no longer keep them, by our negligence, outside the fold, the prey of wild beasts of the forest; rather let us gather them into its very centre, and guard them by its most protective sanctities."

VALUE OF A COMMA.—In the priory of Ramessa there dwelt a prior who was very liberal, and who caused these verses to be written over his door:

"Be open evermore, O thou my door,
To none be shut, to honest or to poor."

But after his death there succeeded him another, whose name was Raynard, as greedy and covetous as the other was bountiful and liberal, who kept the same verses there still, changing nothing therein but one point, which made them run after this manner:

"Be open evermore. O thou my door,
To none, be shut to honest or to poor."

Afterward, being driven from thence for his extreme niggardliness, it grew into a proverb, that for one point Raynard lost his priory. [Sel.

THE REV. JAMES M. WELLS,

LATE OF THE ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

There is a class of ministers not properly appreciated by those who write contemporaneous history. Their names, save in Conference minutes or list of appointments, very rarely find a place in the public prints. They live laborious, useful, godly lives. They do the hard work of the ministry. They preach the gospel to the poor. They build up the waste places, gather congregations, organize Sabbath-Schools, convert souls, erect churches in out of the way corners. They preach the pure, plain, simple word of God, making their way felt and known among common people. They go any where—live on any sort of salary, rejoice in God that souls are won to Christ. They die gloriously.—"Let my last end be like his." And then, save in the hearts of those to whom they were the ministers of salvation, and a few of their ministering brethren who estimate them truly, they are forgotten. Yet their record is on high. Their names are in the book of life.

Among these we place the late JAMES M. WELLS. He had few advantages in early life, an imperfect knowledge of English was the sum of his accomplishments in the way of education. Young in years, with little knowledge of men or books, he entered upon the work of his life with deep feeling of insufficiency. With a sound mind, a strong constitution and vigor of body that seemed utterly unconscious of fatigue, a burning zeal that kept all aglow by the continued unction of the Holy One, he went to work—work to him, not by a mere figure of speech, but actual, to be done.

Few men were more successful.—Luke's description of Barnabas seems written for him, so exactly does it portray him. "He was a good man, full of the Holy Ghost and of faith, and much people was added unto the Lord." There was a revival in every work he filled, be it mission, circuit or station. He prayed for it—he preached for it—he infused his own strong faith into the hearts of his people. God answered—the work prospered—and in these times of refreshing he was ever foremost—never sparing himself—in the pulpit, in the prayer meeting, in the family. In the altar, the last lingering penitent, no matter how lowly, at the latest hour of the night, might feel assured Brother Wells would never desert him. There he was, praying with earnest, heart-felt importunity, directing by word of exhortation, cheering with a song, sympathising with him in his distress, and rejoicing with him when he had found peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ. He was truly untiring. When wearied to exhaustion by continued labors, others retired to rest, Wells was on hand, fresh seemingly as ever. Neither flesh nor spirit flagged. Thus for some twelve years. Then the wear and tear of continued, unceasing toil began to tell. Still, however, though a constant sufferer, able to accomplish an amount of labor rarely undergone by the strong and healthy.

He was very studious, anxious to learn and willing to be taught. He made the ministry his sole business, gave himself wholly to it. He thought of it, always labored to make everything subserve its accomplishment.—His books (he had some two hundred well-selected volumes,) were studied slowly and carefully, well marked for reference. His sermons sketched, sometimes of later years written out, not to be read, but preached, were baptized with prayer, so that if the sermon was a poor one, it rarely failed to make a good religious impression.

He was improving constantly as a preacher. In the last two years he had made very sensible progress in his studies; having more leisure he had improved it diligently and profitably. He was just beginning to know how to study, a difficult thing to learn when there has been no early training. He had corrected many errors in pronunciation and delivery, and put more system into his sermons and public addresses. Energetic and persevering, he would have fitted himself for more extended usefulness had he been spared longer. He was a thorough Methodist. He loved the church of his choice as he did the mother who bore him. He studied her doctrines and usages. He had realized in his own experience the high grade of Christian attainment which her standards hold forth. And in his defences and explanations of her polity on points called in question by other denominations, after a fashion peculiarly his own, he was often singularly happy and successful.

A strong pervading sense of duty was ever present with him. What ought I to do? was his question. Once decided there was no faltering. This gave a manliness of tone and straight-forward directness of delivery which sometimes assumed in the eyes of those who did not know him well, the appearance of forwardness—a desire to exhibit himself. Modest he was, but never to the sacrifice of principle or compromise of duty.

He wore well as a friend and as a preacher. He was best beloved and best appreciated where best known.—No slight praise this. How few deserve it? In the circle in which he moved, (and he spent the largest part of his itinerant life in the bounds of the Tuscaloosa District,) no man possessed more fully the confidence of those who knew him. The religious of every name loved him. The irreligious respected him, with full faith in his integrity and piety. They believed in him.

He died as he lived, "in the faith."

Able to speak but little, that little was to the purpose, expressing unshaken confidence in God.

But all this of a man we never heard of! That's the very reason I write. I want you to hear of him, that henceforth you may value as they deserve those like him. And I am happy to believe there are many among us of the same character.

But what sort of a preacher was he? Was he really an eloquent orator?—Well, I am afraid not, in the ordinary sense of the expression. The newspapers never puffed him. He never made a sensation by his coming. Crowds did not jostle each other to hear him. Literary institutions never D D'd him. Neither circuit nor station ever sent delegates to the Bishop at Conference to secure him. Boards of stewards never thought it worth while to make arrangements as to salary with him in advance of his appointment. In fact I never heard of his pressing his own claims to a good place. His sermons were announced beforehand neither from pulpit or press. Truth to tell, all these signs were wanting. He was neither much praised, or flattered, or abused. He belonged to a different class. When men spoke of him, they styled him an acceptable preacher. "Acceptable," that's the very word. When he had been on a work for one year, the people wanted him again. The sinner converted under his ministry, the suffering, the sick, the sorrowing, whom he had comforted, with whom he had prayed and sympathised, longed for his return. They said truly, "Tarry with us, for we have learned by experience that the Lord hath blessed us for thy sake."

He was once on a negro mission. The man of all work—he was the very man for this difficult work. Here his health failed. Could you have heard, as I did, how feelingly and earnestly the simple-hearted darkies prayed the Lord to bless Brother Wells, to restore him to health, and send them their dear preacher next year again, you would have felt that there was something better than fame or flattery, and that was the portion of our of our acceptable preacher, a place in the hearts of his people. And this was all well bestowed; he deserved it, was worthy of it. He had them on his heart. How many have been first startled, and then won to interest and sympathy, as Wells, in the congregation in some wealthy church, lifted up his voice in earnest pleading prayer to God to remember the poor negro on the plantation, and bring him from his ignorance and darkness to the light of the blessed gospel.

But to return. Was he eloquent? In fact he was not even fluent. But if eloquence be the power of so expressing emotion as to excite similar emotions in others, then J. M. Wells was eloquent. In earnest, thoroughly so, honest altogether, sincere in the profound conviction that he was called of God to preach the gospel—deeply, solemnly impressed with the truth and weighty import of his message, his heart warmed as he filled with his subject—his stammering hesitation for a word or expression left him—his words flowed free, and in power in spite of the want of compactness in logic and the absence of rhetorical exactitude in expression.

The unction was there, and this not occasionally at rare intervals, but ordinarily in his daily ministrations. Those who heard him were impressed not with the eloquence of the man, but the solemnity and reality of the truth preached. The true mark of eloquence, result, impression, fruit, followed. Believers were edified, sinners converted, good done.

In the great day when rewards are distributed, the verdict of men will be often reversed. Many with large reputation, sought after, courted, caressed by the church, will have fewer stars in their crowns of rejoicing than our "unknown to fame," "acceptable" Methodist preacher, James M. Wells.

—I have been acquainted with him for ten years, known him intimately for four; been with him in sickness and in health; in prosperity and in deep affliction; in public and in private free intercourse, such as subsists among Methodist preachers, in that full, unreserved communion of soul, outspoken and overflowingly open, where hearts touch and thoughts are unveiled, and in this full knowledge, I record this my tribute to the memory and worth (in which I know many join me,) of one, who, gone forth from our ranks to the better company above, leaves few purer or nobler spirits behind him.

CORRESPONDENCE.

LOUISVILLE CIRCUIT, Mississippi Conference.

Rev. W. P. Dickinson writes August —: "Please say to the friends of Zion that we have had a glorious revival on Louisville Circuit. Two meetings, one at Union and one at Red Creek Church continued five days at each place. There were some thirty conversions and accessions to the church. Truly it was a refreshing from the presence of the Lord."

HOLMESVILLE MISSION.

Rev. H. M. Youngblood writes Aug. 6:—"The Lord has done great things for us. We commenced a meeting at China Grove 25th ult., and continued it eight days—during which time were 33 conversions and 31 additions to the church. Then transferred the meeting to Pine Grove and continued for three days there, having 9 or 10 conversions and accessions of membership.

Best of all, a cold church has been revived. Rev. J. Bowen was with us all the time, doing good service. Dr. Laney too, helped us. To God be all the glory, amen."

LIVINGSTON PARISH, Louisiana.

Rev. R. A. Sibley, who has the service of the mission covering all this parish, reports:—"I have been endeavoring to organize class meetings generally and to impress upon the mind of the church the importance of a holy life and as a means to the attainment of which, a punctual attendance upon class and family worship connected with daily private devotion. The Lord has blessed my efforts amongst this people, and the work has been gradually growing in interest, congregations increasing, and a general interest seems to pervade the mind of the same, while some are enquiring the way to Zion's gate. About thirty have been attached to the church under my charge up to this time. Seventeen appointments at first, and I have added on three more, making twenty appointments, embracing the entire parish of Livingston, with about six or seven hundred persons preached to.

Our last quarterly meeting imbraces 3d Sunday in October next."

PAULDING MISS., Aug. 13, 1856.

A protracted meeting has been in progress here for about a week, during which forty souls were added to the Methodist church. God has been with us, and a great work has been accomplished. Of all the strongholds of Satan, Paulding, according to its size and population, has had few equals; but the effects of this last meeting have been wonderfully displayed since its close. Where once wickedness held the sway peace and tranquility now reign, and we are blessed in a great measure with a God-fearing, church-going community. May many more such meetings be held.

Appeal to the Methodists of the South.

Dear Brethren:—We deem it of the utmost importance that the M. E. Church South, should be represented amongst the other denominations in the Metropolis of the United States.—They are numerous and strong. Since the division of the Methodist E. Church into North and South, a small number have adhered South, and have been taken under the charge of the Virginia Annual Conference. They are worthy of our patronage and consitute a centre of operations in this city, which we hope will be highly useful to the cause of God and available to Southern Methodism. We are collecting an interesting congregation. Here, not only those of this community who sympathize with us but also members of Congress and the numerous travellers and sojourners from the South can worship with us in perfect accordance with their Southern preferences; without the slightest disagreeable apprehension. We occupy an eligible site and a beautiful house of worship on 8th street, two squares directly north of the Patent Office. But in consequence of our recent organization in this city, and the smallness and comparative poverty of our membership, at the present, we are under the necessity of appealing to Southern Methodist for aid in liquidating the debt upon the Church and completing our plan of improvements, so as to place us in an independent condition. For these purposes, we need immediately, the sum of two thousand dollars. In the name of our common Christianity, of our beloved Methodism, and of our Southern institutions, we lay our cause before you, and humbly beseech you to come to our aid. This emergency can be readily met by you, and we propose to you the following very practicable method. Remit to me, as the pastor of the church, by draft, or otherwise, from five to fifty dollars immediately, "as God has prospered you," and it shall be duly acknowledged in the Richmond Christian Advocate. I regard this to be the cause, not of the few Southern Methodists who reside here, but of the entire South, whose religious interests ought to be maintained in the Metropolis of this nation. Now is the time to strike, and to secure a footing in this city. We must help ourselves. Others will not do it. I hold myself responsible for the faithful application of the funds. Send them on, at once, brethren. Our preachers will do us a great favor by assisting in this noble work. DAVID S. DOGGETT.

Washington D. C. July 26, 1856.

Dr. Wayland on Class-Meetings.

Dr. Wayland is, perhaps, the most able and learned minister of the Baptist Church in the United States. In an article in the New York Examiner of July 10th, he pays the following tribute to the Methodist Class-Meeting; it is in happy contrast with the manner in which some of his less informed brethren sometimes speak of this means of grace:

"We can do what others are doing. The Methodist class-meeting is an institution specially designed to gather together the scattered members of the communion into an organization that shall be the nucleus of a Church. It is an admirable system, and has been of infinite service in developing ministerial talents and extending the cause of Methodism in our country. It has done much more than this. In ten thousand instances it has kept alive the flame of piety, where it would otherwise have been extinguished, and trained up thousands and tens of thousands for the Heavenly Jerusalem. We do not need the name, or the form, but may we not have the essential thing, with all its attendant benefits?"

DOMSTIC MISSIONS.

REV. H. N. MCTYEIRE, Assistant Treasurer of the Missionary Society of the M. E. Church, South:

GERMAN CREEK MISSION, Alabama Conference.

I herewith transmit you my report for the third quarter:

I have received two on probation; baptized one adult and two children; discontinued one appointment and taken in two new ones.

Though we are unable to report any special seasons of the outpouring of the Spirit, yet there is a general interest manifest at all of our appointments.

Take Care of the Casket.

In many cases in which true Christians complain of the "hidings of God's countenance," of darkness and depression, the cause is solely physical disease; produced not unfrequently by an obstinate disregard to the will of God as expressed in the human constitution, made up of soul and body; and by which a certain amount of repose, relaxation, and exercise to the right working of both. Let me earnestly press it upon young and ardent students, that it is a very mistaken manliness to despise the demands of the body; that it is no self-denial, but self-indulgence, to sacrifice health and life in the pursuit of knowledge. Let me remind them that God will make them responsible for every talent committed to them, and for shortening those days which might have been many; and for turning those hours into darkness and distress which might have been hours of sunshine and peace. That must be no small sin in the eye of God, which he so often visits with an early death or premature old age; and which has deprived many a family of its most precious treasure, and the Church of its brightest hopes.—[McLeod's Memorials of Mackintosh.

AUTHORITY OVER CHILDREN.—When Moses demanded of Pharaoh that the Israelites, with their little ones, should leave the land of Egypt to serve the Lord, the latter seemed anxious to retain the children as hostages for the return of their parents. On this Dr. Scott has the following reflection in his Commentary:

"We should likewise remember that Satan and his instruments are extremely averse to our serving God with our sons and daughters; and that they employ various methods of keeping them from joining in his service. We ought, therefore, to be very peremptory in this concern, and be careful to initiate them, even when "little ones," in the ways and worship of God, for such is the kingdom of heaven. But, alas! many apparently religious parents act as if they were of Pharaoh's opinion, and supposed that the service of God was intended for men alone; for they allow their children to stay behind when they go to worship, and permit them to spend their time in dissipation and vanity; as if they would leave them under the yoke of Satan, the god of this world, as hostages for their own return to his service."

A SIMPLE RULE.—To ascertain the length of the day and night, any time of the year, double the time of the sun's rising, which gives the length of the night, and double the time of setting, which gives the length of the day.—This is a little method of "doing the thing" which few of our readers have been aware of.

TO SHAKE OFF TROUBLE.—Set about doing good to somebody; put on your hat and go and visit the sick and poor; inquire into their wants and administer unto them; seek out the desolate and oppressed, and tell them of the consolations of religion. I have often tried this method, and have always found it the best medicine for a heavy heart.

If the prudence of reserve and decorum dictates silence in some circumstances, in others prudence of a higher order may justify us in speaking our thoughts.

As often as a man lays out for God, he lays up for himself.

DEATHS.

Died—On the 26th July, 1856, in Washington county, Miss., Mrs. MARTHA ANN BROWDER, consort of James W. Browder.

Sister Browder was born in Halifax county, Va., on the 24th February, 1827. She was converted at the age of sixteen, and lived a consistent life by faith in the Son of God. When death came she calmly resigned herself into the hands of God, saying to her loving husband, "I shall soon be with Jesus."

Died—In Webster, Miss., on the 12th inst., 1856, GLANVILLE GLAZE, aged 25 years. He embraced religion in October last, and lived a good christian. He observed frequently just before he died, to W. P. Lloyd, his father-in-law, "Pa, I hope you could feel as happy as I do." May God bless all to die as he did.

W. P. B.

Died—On the 7th July, 1856, at his residence near Mississippi City, JAMES NEWELL, late deceased was born in South Carolina on the 7th of January, 1787. He was a member of the Methodist Church for many years. I have often heard him say when his friends would speak of the infirmity of his recovery, "Oh I don't want to live, but to see my wife and children. I have more inducements to go to heaven than to stay on earth."—His wife, who died on the 29th of January, 1856, would say to him "We shall soon meet again." Brother Newel lived a useful life, and was blessed with a triumphant death.

E. R. STRICKLAND.

Died—On Oak Ridge, in Morehouse parish, July 20, 1856, at his fathers residence, of Bilious Fever, Mr. JAMES L. DAVIS, eldest son of Mr. Allen and Martha Davis, in the 26th year of his age.

It is with painful feelings we have to record the demise of this amiable and interesting young man, whose acquaintance and friendship we have had the pleasure of enjoying for a season. Truly we can say that in the midst of life we are in death. We do not what a day may bring forth; and we know not why it is that the most lovely flowers that bloom on earth, are so soon and suddenly plucked and taken away from our sight to perfume the paradise of God. But Jesus Christ said, what thou knowest not now, thou shalt know hereafter. Brother Davis was a young man of promise in many respects. But our heavenly father, in his wisdom, saw fit to hurry him away in the morning of life, from the toils of time to the rest of heaven; from the affectionate embrace of his kind parents and many friends below, whose hearts his early death has drawn a pall of gloom, to the presence of God, his father, and the embrace of Jesus Christ, his Savior and loved ones of his family who have preceded him to the glory land.—Then the Church Militant on earth, to the innumerable company of angels, and the general assembly and church of the first-born, whose names are written in heaven. He was, while on earth, in many respects a promising young man. From his childhood, he was a moral, dutiful, temperate and industrious. Of him, it may be said that he kept the outward law; but he knew by experience its deep design until a short time prior to his disease. When after wrestling with God in mighty prayer, he was enabled to say in the fullness of his soul that all was well, and that he was ready to the heaven of God to rest with his Savior.—Then he became perfectly resigned to the will of God, exhorted his friends and companions to meet him in heaven. He spent his last moments in prayer to God, as he said that he would die praying.

We believe and sincerely hope that his pious and godly exhortations, and his manifest trust and confidence in his Savior when approaching the dark valley and shadow of death, has left a lasting impression on the minds of those who visited him whilst on his dying bed. His parents sorrow not as those without hope, for they feel confident that their son is safely landed in the kingdom of God. There they expect to meet him where parting shall be no more forever.—May our heavenly father console them by His spirit under this afflictive dispensation of His Providence, and finally bring them to His eternal joy.

Beyond the flight of time;
Beyond the reign of death
There surely is some blessed clime,
Where life is not a breath.
Nor life's affections transient fire,
Whose sparks fly upward and expire.
There is a world above
Where parting is unknown;
A long eternity of love,
Formed for the good alone,
And faith beholds the dying here
Translated to that glorious sphere.

OVERFLOW OF LAST ISLAND.

The apprehensions expressed by us yesterday for the safety of those on Last Island, have been fearfully realized by the melancholy intelligence we have to lay before our readers this morning. The accounts cannot necessarily be implicitly relied upon, as in the confusion and terror of the scene, it is not to be expected that a strictly correct account could be rendered. It will be seen that our friend, Mr. R. B. Brashear, promises us an accurate account as soon as obtained, which, when received, we will lay before our readers. From the information already received, it will be perceived that the rumors current throughout the city yesterday morning and the afternoon previous, have been more than confirmed.

The sorrow that now shrouds the homes of many of the most respected citizens of the State, gives sad testimony of the instability of life. Many that but a few days since were in the free enjoyment of health, and all that made life joyous and happy, are now dwellers in that other life of which man knows not. With paiuful solicitude we shall look for further details, anxious to learn that which we fear to hear.

Mr. Wm. G. Hewes, the President of the Opelousas Railroad, has favored us with a copy of the following letter:

Wm. G. Hewes, Esq.—Dear Sir—On my arrival here I find the Aubrey not yet arrived from the scene of disaster, but is expected to-night. I have taken the responsibility to detain the engine Terrebonne and two box cars of the freight train, and a car from the passenger train, until the Aubrey gets here, as the friends of some of the doomed are here and of course are anxious.

Mr. Bailey and family are safe, as they did not arrive at their destination. Rest assured I shall do all in my power to alleviate the suffering of all as far as possible.

In haste, Respectfully, TH. THAYER.

Bayou Boeuff, Aug. 14, 1856.

Mr. R. B. Brashear writes us as follows:

Brashear, (La.) August 14, 1856.

Editors Crescent:—News was received from Last Island at daylight this morning, by sail boat, that every house has been unroofed and thrown down save one; that those saved are on the hull of the steamboat Star, which occupies the site of the Muggah hillard-house; that one hundred and sixteen persons are missing; and many of those saved have broken limbs. Mrs. Maskell and child; Mrs. Reutrop, Wm. Rochelle, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Royster are among the missing, and doubtless lost.

I will forword you accurate accounts when received.

Yours, BRASHEAR.

The steamboats Major Aubrey and Archer sent out—the former went at daylight, the latter is now on the eve of going. One house only standing—Mr. Bethel's. R. B. B.

We are indebted to the conductors of the road for the following list of the lost:

Thos. Millen, wife and two servants; Capt. Schaltre, wife and 7 children; Mrs. Teicfare Landry, 2 children and 4 servants; Mrs. Anthony Como, 5 children and 3 servants; Mrs. Pruett, 2 children and 2 servants; Mrs. Darsine Reutrop and daughter; Mr. and Mrs. Turner; Mr. and Mrs. McRae and child; Mrs. Flash and sister; Mrs. Thomas Maskill, 3 children and 1 servant; servant of Thomas Ellis; John Muggah, wife and 2 children; Mr. A. Bryan; two children of Mr. Robinet; a child of Mr. Etier; infant child of W. W. Pugh.

All names not appearing in this list are safe, as far as known.

By counting over the above, we find there are but 108 names.

THE LAST ISLAND DISASTER.

We are indebted to a friend for the following letter giving further details of that terrible calamity. It will be seen that much of the matter embraced in his letter we have before published; but as he gives additional particulars, and his letter as a whole is a full and complete narrative of what transpired, we give it entire:

Bayou Boeuff, Aug. 15, 1856.

Messrs. Editors of the Crescent: According to request, I hasten to give you the particulars of the terrible calamity at Last Island.

Soon after the news of the overflowing of the Island reached here, the steamer Major Aubrey started to the relief of those who were said to be clinging to the steamer Star. She returned at 9 o'clock last night with about a hundred of them, and reported that there was a hundred more still at the Island awaiting other boats which were on their way down.

I have been able to gather the following particulars from those of the survivors with whom I am acquainted.

As you are aware, the weather had been very stormy for a day or two previous to Sunday, and it was particularly so in the neighborhood of this ill-fated Island; but on Sunday morning, about 10 o'clock, it began blowing a perfect hurricane from the north-east, and the water began rising with fearful rapidity, breaking clean over the Island. In fifteen minutes from the time that the wind rose and the water began rising, there was not a single house on the Island, and all was a promiscuous wreck.

The steamer Southern Star, which was anchored near, was blown ashore and bilged, and was thus the means of saving those that were saved; all who succeeded in getting to her were saved, while those who preferred taking their chances on the Island in preference to running the risk of being blown out to sea on her, perished.

The scene that followed the first tremendous gust of wind, I have been informed, beggars all description. One tremendous cry of agony went up, and in five minutes naught was to be heard but the howling of the winds and the lashing of the waters—two hundred souls had perished in that short time!

From what I can learn, the force of the wind must have exceeded anything on record. A gentleman informed me that boards and logs would be torn from the houses and whirled through the air like feathers; men and women were blown down and thrown about until they were either killed or stunned.

This terrible tornado only lasted about four hours, and then subsided very rapidly; the water fell as rapidly as it had risen, leaving dead bodies of men, women and children, mixed promiscously with furniture and debris from the fallen houses; in the meantime night came on with all its horrors, and nothing could be determined as to the extent of the disaster until Monday morning, and the following named persons were positively ascertained to have been lost:

Dr. Batey, lady, four children and two servants; A. M. Foley, lady and two servants; Adrien Frero, lady and son; Gabriel Grevenberg, Gaspard Ratin, Thos. Mille, lady and three servants; Homer Millo, lady and child; Michel Schlatre, lady, seven children and six servants; John Muggah, wife, two children and two servants; James Muggah and son, John Barlaffey, Mrs. B. A. Prewett and two servants, Ida Magill, Augustin Magill, Mrs. Crozier and three servants, Mrs. Bordis and servant, H. Landry and three servants, Michael Landry, Joseph Dugas, Ulysse Simoneau, Joe, (waiter) servant of Mr. Trousdale, C. A. Barilleau, child and servant of W. W. Pugh, Jean Avert, Wm. Rochelle, Achille Hebert, wife, child and servant; Mrs. T. Landry, two children and four servants; Mrs. A. Comeau, five children and four servants; L. H. Prewett, Jr., Mrs. D. Reutrop, daughter and servant; Mr. Turner, lady and servant; Mr. Reed, wife, child and two servants; Mrs. Flash and child; sister of Mrs. Flash, and child; Mrs. Thos. Maskell, three children and one servant; Mr. Midnight, two servants of Mr. Ellis, Mr. Case, P. Robinet, Simon Gimble, Levi Losp, Mrs. Eliol Hebert, Mrs. Emilline Babin, Mr. Homer Hebert, Mr. Stewart, Miss Fisher, Col. Fisher, Mr. Thompson, lady and three servants; Mr. McDonald, servant of Wm. Hland, servant of Joshua Baker, Mr. Royster and lady, negro man of Cheyney Johnson, Lewis, steward; Jane, chambermaid; servant of Mrs. Develin, servant of Mrs. Meade, child of J. Etie, and servant; servant of D. Berand, servent of Jonas Mersh, Mrs. Gerand and child; servant of Dr. Hawkins, servant of Mrs. Harris, Mrs. Roemage and servant, Mrs. Volsen and daughter, Mrs. M. Babin; Mrs. Eliof Babin, Mrs. Boudreaux, Mrs. Bell, John Schneider, F. Fitzpatrick, servant of G. A. Brinant, two children of Mr. Bontaton, Tom, three negro; Harriet, slave of D. Muggah; two children of Mr. Hindglas.

There are some incidents connected with this awful affair which I cannot refrain from giving you; among them was the heroic conduct of Dr. Batey's negro coachman. This truly faithful servant, on the commencement of the panic, seized one of his master's children, and accompanied his master and family to the highest point of the island; as soon as he perceived the wreck of the Star he tried to persuade his master to go aboard, but without success, and then he asked to be allowed to take the child that he had in his arms on board, but his master sternly commanded him to put the child down—he reluctantly obeyed, but in a few minutes, seeing that if he remained where he was, that he would inevitably perish, he caught up one of Mr. Pugh's children, and made for the wreck with it, and succeeded in getting there, and was saved. He says that if his poor master had permitted him, he would have saved his whole family.

One of Mr. Pugh's sons behaved like a hero, and throughout the trying time assisted his father in saving his brothers and sisters, with as much foresight, coolness and intelligence, as a man bred to battle with the elements.

Mr. and Mrs. Foley were seen to be carried away on the crest of a breaker, locked up in each others arms, and thus they died as they had lived, together.

Hon. W. W. Pugh's appearance on his arrival at this place was indeed truly heart-rending, his hair was matted with blood and salt water, and had changed its hue as had his beard. He was pale and emaciated, and in his arms he held with a convulsive grasp the dead body of his infant, the only one out of seven which he had not been permitted by an Allwise Providence to save. His conduct is said to have been perfectly chivalrous; indeed all that could be expected of a man of his exalted character.

The following are the names of those persons who were on the island at the time of the disaster and survived:

Capt. Thos. Ellis, planter, Terrebone; Mrs. John E. King, and sisters, Opelousas; Mr. Marsh and daughter, Newtown; Hon. W. W. Pugh, wife, six children and servant, Assumption; Mr. Antoine Comoe, two children and two servants; Dr. Hawkins, wife, child and servant; Dr. Lyle, Dr. Dupetier of Attakapas; Dr. B. F. Prewitt, Mrs. Harris and child; Dr. Roules and lady, formerly of New Orleans, now of Berwick's; two Misses Rodrigues and a niece; Mr. Nash, wife and children; Capt. Gates and wife; Mr. Trosclair and lady; L. Hebert and lady, Bayou Gonla; Dr. Bagly and lady; Mr. Herreux and family; Mr. Bowen Jackson, Opelousas; Captain Murphy; Mrs. Rantree; Miss Miller, Mr. Miller and lady; Desire LeBlanc, A. LeBlanc, of Napoleon; E. Liconta, of Napoleon; John Smith; Adolphe Rochelle; Mr. Baptiste, of the Island; John Davis and family; O. Mahasson, Sheriff of Parish of Assumption; L. Laforest; Mr. Ettier and wife, Newton; J. L. Lewis, wife and mother; A. Toffier and lady, Bayou Gonla; P. Marioneau; Mr. Desobris and family, Plaquemine; two Misses Clements, dec; Mrs. Darden & Co.; Capt. and crew of steamer "Star;" Capt. Dave Muggah and family; Mr. Voisin; Henry Muggah; Alfred Wadsworth; Mr. Mansfill and two children, of Franklin; Mrs. Dr. Lyman; Rev. Mr. McAlister; Mrs. Crotier and two sons, Bayou Gonla; Mr. Winter; Mr. Hert and lady, Plaquemines; Mrs. Leftrick; Mrs. Dickerson, dec; Miss Mary Mathison; Mr. and Mrs. R. C. Sims, of Carroll Parish; Charles Ballis, wife and child; Miss C. Hartman, Mr. Crank, Mr. Johnson, lady and four children, J. K. Smith, W. H. Winter and servant, T. Landry, G. A. Brunt, Miss Nichols, Franklin Pugh, E. Dufonta, V. H. Reutrop, S. J. Gotterman, Chas. Rhen, A. B. Cary, Mrs. Birdsall and son, Dr. Hay, Mrs. S. E. Klug, Miss Caroline Klug, A. E. Tyler, Louis Grevenberg, Miss Brunette, Desire Bernaud, lady and two children, Mr. Flash and lady, Mrs. Giraud.

Yours, truly. B.

P. S.—I have just learned that everybody is safe on Caillou Island, about which there has been such terrible anxiety. The water did not rise higher than five feet in the lowest parts of the island; while the higher parts were free from water. The persons who were there did not experience much peril, and I am exceedingly happy to state that no accident of any kind occurred.

I forgot to mention above that several of the bodies that were picked up on Last Island, were found to have been robbed, their pockets cut out, and in some cases, fingers which had had rings on them, were cut off. These outrages have been committed, it is said, by a set of piratical vagabonds who infest the bayous and swamps of the mainland. A party of gentlemen are forming here to go in search of them; if they are caught, woe be unto them, no tree in the parish will be too high for a gallows to hang their despicable carcasses on.

It is further reported that a negro, or quadroon, has been taken in the act of robbing a dead body, and that he is in custody. I cannot vouch as to the truth of the report, however. B.

EXTENT OF THE LATE STORM.

From our exchanges we learn that the storm which created such terrible havoc in our State on Sunday, the 10th inst., must have reached from one end of the Union to the other.

In Massachusetts there was a gale on the 8th inst., which, for duration and intensity, exceeded any thing known there for a great many years.

Over forty buildings were struck by lightning, including churches and others of a public nature. In some towns, the damage by the lightning, wind and rain, was very great, particularly in Wentworth, where property to the value of near twenty thousand dollars was destroyed. Railroads in that State suffered most severely, by having trees blown over their tracks and bridges washed away; travel was in consequence much impeded.

In New Hampshire the storm was most severe, blowing down barns and farm houses, destroying vast quantities of grain. The river rose to an extraordinary height, particularly the Merrimac, which rose eleven feet above its usual height.

In New York and Pennsylvania, the storm prevailed with more or less intensity. In Philadelphia the lightning struck several buildings, electrifying several persons, but without fatal results.

In Virginia they were visited by a violent storm and flood, which completely submerged a large portion of the town of Harrisonburg, sweeping away several houses and contents.

In Maryland, New Jersey and Delaware, more or less damage was done to the growing crops, many houses had all their window glasses blown out, or were unroofed, and hail fell in large quantities.

In Tennessee, a storm also raged on the 8th, which is described as having been terrific. Three trees in front of a dwelling house in Clarksville were struck by lightning and set on fire.

In Mississippi we learn that a storm, which for severity has scarce ever been equalled, commenced on Sunday, the 10th, and continued for three days, doing immense damage to the cotton crop.

In the Northern parishes of our State, the same storm committed universal havoc. Cotton and corn which, a few days previous, promised such ample harvest to planters, are now lying prostrate, so much damaged that the yield is reduced to at least one-third. Cane, where not flattened to the ground, it is said, will not be much injured.

Thus has this terrible storm swept from one end of the country to the other, blasting the well earned hopes of the farmer, and wrapping whole communities in mourning. Well indeed may it be said, the gale of August, 1856, will long be remembered.

☞ Caution to Travelers.—Travelers at this season of the year should always be careful to procure a supply of Dr. J. HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS, as it is now conceded by all who have tried this invaluable medicine that nature can be sustained, and when a traveler is subject to the various changes of water and diet, as he is compelled to be, these BITTERS are the most reliable medicine now in market. That they are what we represent, we can only refer to the people generally, who have tried them, and speak volumes in favor of the regulator of the stomach. For sale by J. ☞ Great Cure of Piles.—Camden, N. J., March 12th, 1855.—Dear Sir: It is with much pleasure I take this opportunity of informing you of the great benefit I have derived from the use of a few bottles of "Hoofland's German Bitters." For a number of years I have been sorely and severely afflicted with pain in the stomach, attended by severe attacks of the Piles, for which I tried a great many remedies, but without affording me any relief. Being advised to use the GERMAN BITTERS, I did so, using in connection for the Piles, your SPIKENARD OINTMENT, and I now inform you that they have entirely cured me and restored me to health, and I would advise all the afflicted to use your valuable medicines, etc. Respectfully yours, MARGARET REPSHER,

REVOLUTION IN ST. DOMINGO.

BY THE SOUTHERN AND NATIONAL LINES.

New York, August 15.—Advices from St. Domingo state that a revolution is in progress, growing out of the terms of the Spanish treaty which favors the Spanish descendants—there being the most numerous desire to hoist the Spanish flag again, and the citizens and soldiers are flocking to the Spanish Consul's office to register their names as Spanish citizens.

Great excitement exists, the tribunals and all public buildings being closed, and business entirely suspended.

The President and Cabinet threatened to resign.

The foreigners and Liberals are looking anxiously for some Government vessel to protect them.

The Liberals say the Spanish flag shall never again be hoisted.

The Spanish Consul is opposing the ratification of the treaty, and doing all in his power to thwart the measures of the American Consul.

Congressional.

Washington, Aug. 13.—Senate.—A message was received from the President, enclosing Secretary Marcy's letter in regard to privateering.

A bill regulating the compensation of the members of Congress passed.

The Senate ratified a treaty for the extradition of criminals with Austria and Baden.

Also a commercial treaty with the Two Sicilies.

Also a commercial treaty with Nicaragua—made under the former Government of Nicaragua.

House.—The House adhered to the Kansas Amendments and provisos to the Legislative and Judicial Appropriation bill.

Washington, Aug. 14.—Senate.—The bill for continuing the improvement of the Des Moines Rapides failed to pass over the President's veto. The vote stood: Yeas 32; Nays 17.

House.—The House still continues to adhere to Kansas amendments to the Legislative Appropriation bill.

Washington, August 15.—Senate.—One hundred and fifty thousand dollars for the extension of the Capitol, and half a million dollars for the Washington Aqueduct, were added to the Civil Appropriation bill.

House.—The House passed the Senate bill regulating Diplomatic and Consular salaries.

Also a bill appropriating $200,000 for the establishment of a naval depot at Brunswick, Georgia.

The Senate bill regulating the compensation of members of Congress was amended, by allowing $6,000 for the whole session

ADDITIONAL BY THE BALTIC.

Cotton Market Firm—Breadstuffs Declined.

Commercial Intelligence.

Cotton—The sales for three days amounted to 21,000 bales, of which speculators took 4,000 and exporters 2,000 bales. The market closed firm, with prices stiffer but not quotably higher.

Breadstuffs.

Manchester advices are more favorable. The weather has been good and the crop accounts are very favorable.

Breadstuffs show a considerable decline. Wheat is from 6 to 9d lower. Flour has declined 1s 6d to 3s. Provisions are generally unchanged. Lard is dull at 60s to 70s.

The money market is more stringent, there being a temporary demand at five per cent. Consols for money are quoted at 95¼ to 95⅝.

General News.

The Baltic brings but few items of interest.

Samgossa surrendered to the Royalists on the evening of the 1st, the royal troops returning without opposition and disarming the citizens.

We have no definite particulars, but it is certain that the insurrection is entirely at an end.

O'Donnell's future policy is unknown. It is reported, however, that he is attempting to conciliate the Liberals.

Marshal Pelissier has been raised to the dignity of a dukedom.

It is rumored that Louis Napoleon is suffering from a spinal disease.

Italian affairs are perfectly unintelligible. It is reported that France has remonstrated with Sardinia in favor of Austria. Denmark proposes to fortify the Sound, to which Russia is said to be adverse.

An explosion of 200 barrels of gunpowder at Salonica, Turkey, caused great loss of life and property.

Congressional.

Washington, Aug. 16.—The Senate passed the House bill extending the time of paying the Texas claim sixty days.

Postponed until December the bill for the settlement of the claims of the officers of the Revolution—their widows and orphans.

Passed the Light-house appropriation bill.

House.—Passed Senate bill extending copy-right to dramatic authors.

Passed Ocean Mail Appropriation bill with proviso terminating the compensation of the Collins' line, by 119 majority.

Senate Continued.—Post-Office bill amended and passed. The amendment provides for a semi-monthly overland mail to California—the expenses not to exceed $500,000 per annum.

Passed House bill regulating the diplomatic and consular system.

Annual Fortification bill; bills for the improvement of the Des Moines Rapids and Patapsco river over the President's veto.

House, Continued.—Passed Senate bill to protect citizens of the United States in discovery of guano Islands.

Also bill for the improvement of Patapsco river over the veto.

Receded from the amendments to the Legislative Appropriation bill, except the $20,000 appropriation for the expenses of the next Kansas Legislature, after which the bill passed.

Also passed a bill for the construction of a steam revenue cutter for New York.

Washington, Aug. 18.—Both houses were in session until half-past four o'clock Sunday morning.

The Senate passed the Ocean Mail bill with the House proviso, terminating the compensation to the Collins line.

Ratified the treaty with the Creeks and Seminoles, involving an appropriation of over a million acres of land.

The House insisted on the Kansas rider to the Army bill. Several appropriation bills are yet pending on disagreeing amendments.

Richardson, of Illinois, resigned his seat in the House.

The Army Appropriation bill failed in passage.

The appropriations amount to fourteen millions of dollars.

Many private bills failed to receive the signature of the President for want of time.

Congress adjourned sine die. There are rumors that an extra session will be called.

Sixty-one members received $3,000 each, for from the 4th of March, 1855, to the 4th of March, 1856, and the rest proportionate sums.

Quarantine at Bos

Boston, August 16.—The City Council has resolved to Quarantine all vessels from Southern ports where the Yellow Fever has been reported.

New York Market.

New York, August 16.—Cotton steady, with sales of 500 bales.

New York, August 18.—Flour has declined. State and Ohio, are quoted at $6 40; Southern, $7 25.—Nothing doing in Wheat.

Corn has declined.

River Intelligence.

Vicksburg, August 18.—The Southern Belle passed down at 5 o'clock this evening.

A young sperm whale was thrown upon the Atlantic shore of Long Island, near Quoque, on the 9th inst. This is the first whole of the kind ever seen in this country. An agent of Barnum's Museum bought it, and sent it by an extra car on the Long Island Railroad to the city, preserved in ice. Hundreds were flocking to see the monster.

The town of Pomeroy, Ohio, was almost totally destroyed by fire on Friday, the 8th inst. Sixty horses were burned, including all the business portion of the town, the Court-house and public offices. Two persons were killed by falling walls.

THRILLING NARRATIVE.

Plantation, Bayou de Large, near Houma, Parish Terrebonne, La., 13th Aug., 1856.

Messrs. Editors: Thinking that a history of a recent trip in search of pleasure and health to (towards) Caillou Island may interest your readers, I subjoin an outline of it.

On Thursday evening, after a pleasant ride of sixteen miles down the banks of the Bayous Terrebonne and Black, from the Terrebonne Station, through one of the richest sections of country in Louisiana, we (Miss L., Mrs. B., and myself,) reached the fine plantation of Mr. C., in whose hospitable mansion we passed the night. Our preparations for our contemplated excursion to Caillou were complete, and the evening was passed in joyful chat upon the anticipated pleasures to be enjoyed at this, the most beautiful of the group of Islands fronting our Gulf coast. Our fishing tackle was inspected and pronounced complete, and war was formally declared against the whole finny tribe—red-fish, trout, sheephead, flounder, etc., were to afford us amusement and grace our table. On Friday morning (the day dedicated by seamen generally to the demon of ill luck,) we loaded an immense plantation waggon to its utmost capacity with stores, provisions, baggage and bedding, and started the same for the point of embarkation on the Terrebonne, thirty miles distant. In the afternoon, our party, now composed of Mr. and Mrs. C. and their three children, Miss L., Mrs. B. and myself, accompanied by five able attendants, started in carriages. The evening was clear and fine, the roads excellent, and we rolled along merrily until we reached the plantation and residence of Mrs. D., in whose kind charge we left the ladies to refresh themselves with a walk and supper, while Mr. C. and myself proceeded to Jack Hibbles', the point of embarkation, to superintend the loading of our sail boat, and to provide comfortable quarters for the ladies.

We soon found, however, that comfort was out of the question. The boat (the best we could procure,) was but thirty feet long, and already loaded to its utmost capacity with the baggage and stores, so it was apparent that our party of thirteen persons, with Captain Chesnut and son, and two blacks for crew, seventeen souls in all, must be content on deck. The boat had a cabin three feet four inches wide, by five feet eleven inches long, by three and a half feet high, and was decked over, but as this cabin was already filled with baggage, and a perfect "black hole" at the best, the deck had the benefit of fresh air, and was preferred. I am thus minute as to the dimensions of this commodious cabin, for reasons that will become apparent as we progress. The ladies arrived at 12 P. M., heralding their approach to this abode of mosquitoes and alligators with a song, whose music rang cheerily through the dark aisles among the moss grown live oaks. Here we encamped until day break, when the cry of "all aboard that's going" roused all, and we were off, down the sluggish and black bayou Terrebonne.

Six miles, past the overhanging live-oaks, myrtle bushes and towering cypresses, brought us to the edge of the (to the eye) boundless sea marsh, through whose waving field of bright green grass wound the bayou, on and on, until lost in the distance. By noon, by alternately sailing, poling and cordelleing, we reached a low shell mound on the bank of the bayou, known as the "Temple," some six or seven miles from the edge of the woods. Here we stopped and landed, to stretch our weary limbs and refresh the inner man with a lunch. The wind, by this time, had freshened and hauled so much ahead as to prevent our sailing. Beating to windward with a crowded and overloaded boat, in a shallow and narrow bayou, was out of the question. We determined to await here until sunset, trusting that the wind would lull or become favorable, so that we might proceed by moonlight. We were, however, disappointed, and made the best arrangements we could for encamping for the night. The afternoon and evening being clear, we amused ourselves by fishing, and with a bright moon for the first half of the night, the time passed pleasantly.

This was the first experience in the lives of the female portion of our party in camp life and sleeping upon the ground, with the bright moon and stars overhead; but the novelty of the thing and the beauty of the night made it pleasant to them. Social chat and song made the time pass rapidly; the strong breeze sweeping over the broad expanse of marsh kept down the mosquitos and filled the lungs with the fresh and pure sea air. One by one sleep o'ercame us; all slept, dreaming not of the near approach of danger. I awoke suddenly; a dense black cloud covered half the sky to the south-east, and was approaching rapidly. There was no time to get on board our boat, which was anchored out in the bayou. We (Mr. C. and myself) wished to get the ladies into the cabin out of the rain, but we were too late. The squall struck us; hastily covering with blankets and shawls the ladies, who cowered together on the ground, we turned our backs to the storm and to the best of our ability protected them. The rain fell in torrents, the wind howled past us, and thus we remained from 2½ to 5 A. M., when the rain ceased, but not the wind. It is needless to say we were drenched and disconsolate; but putting the best face we could upon the matter, with many a joke we ate a cold breakfast and conveyed the ladies into the cabin of our sail-boat. The wind, which was now from the north-east, gradually increasing, our boat dragged her anchor until she rested against the bank. Whilst the wind was at north-east, we apprehended no danger from the rising of the water and consequent overflow of the marsh, and therefore remained quietly on board our boat, though the sea broke over her with great force every moment. Capt. Chesnut, his son, and all the negroes remained all day ashore, on the Temple.

About 6 P. M. the wind changed suddenly to the southeast and commenced to blow with ten-fold force. It shrieked and howled past us with tremendous fury. The water commenced to rise rapidly; our boat floated over on to the bank and dragged her anchor, which Mr. C. and myself had by this time buried into the shell bank. Myself and a negro man got upon the anchor to bear it down, but our weight was nothing. Our boat yet rubbed slightly on the top of the shell bank, and this prevented the full force of the strain coming upon the anchor. Something must be done instantly, for in ten minutes it would be too late. As soon as the boat floated freely so as to bring the whole strain upon her anchor, we would be swept resistlessly across the marsh. Slightly to the rear, and to right of the stern of the boat, I perceived a stunted hackberry tree. Could we get the anchor to this tree it might hold. Every man except Lewis (a black man) and myself, try and bear the boat over towards that tree. You, Lewis, help me carry the anchor across the bows of the boat to that tree. The boat drifts faster than we can carry the anchor—the grounds on a ridge of shells—we reach the tree, and firmly lash the anchor to it. Thank God, so far we are safe; if the tree but holds by its roots. By this time the water is over the top of the Temple, sweeping over it immense logs, as if they were mere straws.

Here comes the skiff (which had been all day on the top of the Temple, bottom up, coverlog Capt. Chesnut and son and the negroes) containing the Captain (who was a cripple from the effects of a wound in the foot from a stingaree,) and the negro women, guided by the negro men, through water waist deep, where, fifteen minutes before, the bank was dry. They tumble aboard, half dead and perfectly powerless from fear. Poor souls, I can't blame them; for though I was at sea two years, I never experienced a blow anything approaching to this. The spray blown from the tops of the waves strikes you in the face with force and power of hail stones; you cannot look to the windward without protecting your eyes. We chop off the large branches of the hackberry tree so as to protect it from the wind, and force by the boat all the trash lodged against the bows.

Now the wind suddenly hauls to the south and west of south; our boat's ice quarter bears against a large bunch of bushes, she lists over with the force of the wind; she is in danger of being capsized and swamped. The axe—one cut to each stay and rope connected with the mast; a dozen blows and the mast is over board. Glorious!—just in time; for the gunnale was down to the water's edge. All hands to the cable—haul ahead so as to let the boat drop clear of this bush, or we will be in "Davy Jones' locker" in five minutes. Pull, you devils, if you ever pulled in your lives—pull all of you, pull; we gain about half enough to clear the bush, the cable is jammed in a bush forward of the bows, the boat lists over more and more, we struggle, we pull with the strength of despair, we cannot gain an inch, but hold it as we have got. I look about me, Mr. C. and myself gaze into each others eyes, the thought is the same in both. We have done our best, unless God helps us now, we are gone. Our wives and children, must we all die this miserable death? If the boat turns over we are gone, for the marsh is one sea, overflowed fully six feet, and there is no land for miles. That bush might hold up one or two, but how long in the face of this hurricane? We could not reach the stunted tree or stump which holds our anchor, for the current rushes by with the force of a torrent. If we cannot save our wives and children we will die with them. All these things and a thousand others rushed through my mind during the few moments we held fast to that cable, and I have no doubt through Mr. C's. also. Again and again, with no better success, we struggle to pull our boat ahead so that her stern would drop clear of this unyielding obstruction. Those bushes were low and stunted, strong under the water, but thin and weak above, and our boat drew two and a half feet of water. When we had almost abandoned all hope, the wind and current, which had been hauling more and more to the westward and on our beam, suddenly forced the bow of the boat over to leeward, and of course ahead, (for the cable would not let her drop,) enabling us by a combined and powerful effort to clear the bush and drop our boat free to the cable. We now breathed more freely, and were safe, provided our cable did not part, our tree pull up by the roots, or the wind change again. Neither of these things occurred, however; we tried our pumps, loaded everything so as to bring the boat on an even keel, adopted every precaution necessary, and then waited for the storm to abate. The storm continued the whole night; and though the night was long and dismal, as you may imagine, we were satisfied, content that we had escaped with our lives. Soon after sunrise on Monday morning the storm had abated to such an extent that we were enabled to erect and rig a jury mast, out of the old mast which we had cut down and tied to the bush, and which still remained where we had made it fast. After arranging everything we took in our anchor, hoisted a rag of sail, and finally succeeded in getting back into bayou Terrebonne, within the woods. By sunset we had reached Mr. Chesnut's house, some fifteen miles up into the settlements. Here we landed and passed the night, and you can imagine what comfort, after being soaked for forty hours, we all felt to get into a house, put on dry clothes and sleep. The ladies, I must say, behaved nobly, for not a cry or murmur did we hear from them during the whole of this trying time, confined as they were in a miserable hole, three feet by six, without sleep, and wet, with hardly room to sit upright.

But for the exertions of Mr. C. and myself, aided by Mr. Chesnut and son, and the black boy Lewis, we would undoubtedly have been all lost; and I must confess that I had an unconquerable aversion to being drowned in such dirty and muddy water. From the edge of the woods on bayou Terrebonne to a point fifteen miles above, Compensation of Kindred Souls.

Why may not spirit hold communion
With kindred spirit here below—
Soul to soul, by no earth-bonds of union,
Nor over hope such bonds to know?
Why must we quench this higher nature,
That soul's divinest, noblest feature,
The loftiest gift of our Creator—
Ah! why must this be so?

O, how a glance of recognition
From eyes that ne'er again may meet,
Fills all our life with joy Elysian,
A joy we never can forget!
Let we must check the fountain's gushing,
Which all from soul to soul is rushing
While its rich waters might be flashing
Our hearts alone as yet.

Ah! why this ever restless longing
To meet a soul whose every tone,
The hopes and fears around it thronging,
Are but a reflex of our own?
O, is it wrong—this ceaseless yearning,
The hidden soul's volcanic burning?
May not that soul, in all its turning
Be to another known?

O God! why drop within the spirit
This subtle essence hast thou placed,
If none its fullness may inherit—
If we must wander through life's waste,
With none to know the fount of feeling
Which seeks for aye its own revealing,
And keeps, from echoes backward stealing,
Our little draught to taste?

It is not life, this dreamy aching,
This yearning for the soul unknown,
This effort to the inward breaking
Which finds on earth alone—alone,
Where can it flee? but up to heaven,
Hoping, its latent earth-throb given,
The world where nevermore are riven
Spirits of kindred tone.

IRVING.

America.

There is a people mighty in its youth—
A land beyond the Oceans of the West;
Where, though with modest rites, Freedom and Truth
Are worshipped; from a glorious mother's breast,
Who, since high Athens fell among the rest
Sate like the Queen of Nations, but in woe,
By shrewd usurpers outraged and oppressed,
Turns to her children calls for succor now,
And deems not Fate or Power in Wisdom's fullest flow.

This land is like the Eagle, whose young gaze
Feeds on fierce noontide beams, whose golden plume
Floats mirrored on the storm, and in the blaze
Of sunrise gleams when earth is wrapped in gloom;
An epitaph or glory for the tomb
Of murdered Europe may thy fame be made,
Great people! As the roads shall thou become!
Thy growth is swift as morn, when night must fade;
Thou in the desert there to bless at home
For Freedom! Genius is thy strong to rear
The monuments of man beneath the dome
Of a new heaven; myriads assemble there,
Whom the proud lords of land, in rage or fear,
Drive from their wasted homes;
Nay, start not from the name—America! [Shelley.

Thirty-Fourth Congress—First Session.

WASHINGTON, August 9.—Senate.—The Senate passed a joint resolution authorizing Professor Bache, of the Coast Survey, to accept a medal presented to him by Sweden.

Mr. Hunter reported a substitute for the bill regulating the compensation of members of Congress, giving them $3,500 instead of $3,000 per year, with a like per diem, as the law now stands. The bill provides that if any books be distributed to the members by resolution of either or of both Houses, a like grant for the same shall be deducted from the sum allowed, but provided that this shall not extend to books ordered to be printed during the session of Congress, for which members respectively may call.

House.—On motion of Mr. King, a resolution was adopted requesting the Post Master General to make special and vigilant enquiry as to the abstracted or detained from the mails, transmitted from Washington, books and public documents transmitted by Congress.

The House then proceeded to act on the sixty-seven Senate amendments to the Indian Appropriation bill.

August 11.—Senate.—A resolution was adopted calling for information as to what measures had been taken by Government in regard to the declaration of the European Congress respecting the abolition of privateering.

Mr. Douglas reported back the House bill to reorganize the government of Kansas, with a report taking the ground that the Senate bill is the best plan for pacification that the Senate can devise, and recommending that the House bill be laid on the table, as a test vote on its rejection.

Mr. Collamer submitted a minority report in favor of the enactment of the House bill.

The vote being taken, the bill was laid on the table—yeas 35; nays 13.

Mr. Weller moved that the Senate take up the Pacific Railroad bill. Disagreed to.

The Executive, Judicial and Legislative Appropriation bill was then taken up, and the Senate struck out the House Kansas proviso, by a vote of 30 against 12.

House.—Mr. Campbell, of Ohio, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill reducing the duties on imports, and for other purposes. The consideration thereof was postponed till the third Monday in December.

A message was received from the President vetoing the bill for the improvement of Desmoines Rapids. The bill then passed, over the President's veto—yeas 120, nays 54.

The Post Office bill was then taken up and passed without debate.

The Army Appropriation bill was taken up, as returned from the Senate, minus the Sherman proviso.

Mr. Pennington offered a substitute for the proviso, that no part of the military force of the United States shall be employed or aid in the enforcement of the acts of the Territorial Legislature of Kansas, until such acts are approved by Congress; this not to be construed to prevent the President from employing the regular military force to prevent invasion of the Territory by armed bands now residents, or any other body of non-residents acting as posse comitatus of any officer in the Territory. Adopted—yeas 101, nays 97. The bill was then returned to the Senate.

The Light House appropriation bill, and sundry bills of minor importance, were severally taken up and passed.

The house took a recess till 7 P.M., for political debate.

WASHINGTON, Aug. 12.—Senate.—Mr. Hunter asked that the question be now taken on the legislative, judicial and executive appropriation bill.

Mr. Trumbull said he could not vote for it, because the Senate had stricken out the clause providing no part of the money to be appropriated shall be expended for pensioning or drilling persons charged with treason or political offences in Kansas.

Mr. Bayard said he thought that was a good reason for voting for the bill.

Mr. Hale said he should vote against all supplies for the Government as long as they were coupled with an appropriation to pay the members of the usurping Kansas Legislature.

The bill was then passed by yeas 35, nays 12.

House.—Mr. Waldridge, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill for the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the western boundary of Missouri, in Iowa, north of 38 degrees and south of the 44 degrees of north latitude to some point on the Pacific Ocean.

August 13.—Senate.—A message was received from the President in answer to the resolution calling for information relative to the protocol of the Peace Conference on the subject of privateering.

House.—The House passed the bill extending the patent of the Adams printing press, by forty majority.

The House then took up the Senate's amendment to the legislative, executive and judicial appropriation bill.

Louisiana Intelligence.

The Lake Providence Herald, of the 9th inst., says a good shower is much needed in that village.

The Shreveport News of the 5th inst., has the following article on rain:

Since the last week we were blessed with an abundance of this article. Besides many showers, several very heavy rains have fallen during the past few days. We fear that the heavy rains have injured the cotton in this parish. They have had no effect upon "old Bat," who seems inclined "not to drink until we have low." No doubt a wise resolution, but we think it is a little too dry to stick to it; in fact, though we do not favor intemperance, we hope to see "old Bat" reeling along just as full as he can stick.

SHOOTING BY LIGHTNING.—The Shreveport Southwestern of the 6th inst., says:

We regret to learn that the new gin-house of the Rev. and J. W. Barrow, near Mooring Hill, in this parish, was struck by lightning last Wednesday evening, and consumed with about 45 bales of cotton, destroyed by fire.

We learn from the Mansfield Republican, of the 24 ult., that the late showers of rain in that section, but it came too late to benefit the crops materially.

The French nation is decidedly progressive at the present time. It has recently set forth an edict to all of the land, ordering spectaculars and playhouses to paste upon every bottle or pod of physic they vend a government tax for external use, a flaming red label. The words "Medicament for external use" are the edict. The object of this is to prevent the fatal mistakes which too often occur, by a person applying internal medicine to the outside of the body, or vice versa, being similar in every town and province. It is hoped that all persons will soon learn to recognize it as an indication of danger.

FOUR DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

ARRIVAL OF THE ANGLO-SAXON AT QUEBEC

The screw steamship Anglo-Saxon, from Liverpool on the 30th ult., arrived at Quebec on the morning of the 10th inst.

The Cunard steamer Canada, from Boston July 15th, arrived at Liverpool on Saturday evening, 26th July.

The steamship Washington, from New York on the 12th July, touched at Southampton on the morning of the 26th, and sailed thence for Bremen the same day.

The screw steamship Kangaroo sailed from Liverpool for Philadelphia on the same day that the Anglo-Saxon sailed for Quebec.

The Collins steamship Baltic, from New York on the 19th ult., had not been signaled when the Anglo-Saxon sailed from Liverpool at about 10 o'clock A. M.

The insurrection difficulties still continue in Spain.

Great Britain.

The Liverpool cotton market was firm, but quiet, at the prices current at the sailing of the Asia on the 26th ult.

Under the influence of fine weather and satisfactory reports in regard to the growing crops, the breadstuff markets show a general decline in prices.

The London money market exhibited no new feature, and Consols were firm at about previous rates.

The British Parliament was prorogued by the Queen on the 29th ult., until the 7th of October next, on which occasion the Queen delivered a speech. Her Majesty thanks her Lords and Gentlemen in Parliament for their usual assiduity in public duties, and especially for their support during the past war. Her Majesty says that the prosperity of the nation was not materially checked by the war, but expresses hopes that the general prosperity of her subjects will be augmented by the peace. The Royal speech then proceeded to say that Her Majesty "is engaged in negotiations on the subject of questions in connection with affairs with Central America, and hopes that the differences which have arisen on those matters between her government and the United States, may be satisfactorily adjusted."

Her Majesty takes the opportunity to thank India and her other colonies for their aid afforded during the past war.

The remainder of the speech is wholly devoted to home affairs—particularly to the county police, Cambridge University, joint stock companies, county courts, and to the coast guard.

Her Majesty closes with the usual compliments to the gentlemen of the House of Commons.

Previous to adjournment, Mr. Berkley asked Lord Palmerston when the Government would reappoint Consuls at New York, Philadelphia and Cincinnati. Lord Palmerston replied that the Government had not as yet taken any steps in reference to the matter.

The proceedings of Parliament were without interest in other respects.

The London Morning Advertiser undertakes to assert that Great Britain has assented to the surrender of the Bay Islands Colony to Honduras; Great Britain and the United States, with Honduras, agreeing to sign a triple treaty, binding the latter Power never to give up said territory to any other Government. The same authority also asserts that France approves of this arrangement, and has asked permission to become a party to the treaty.

The special committee of the British House of Commons have made their report in relation to the Danish Sound Dues, but they do not suggest any precise mode of adjustment of the vexed question. They, however, urge an immediate and final settlement of the matter, if practicable, by negotiation.

Spain.

Our advices from Spain continue meagre and unreliable. The telegraphic and public roads being in the hands of the Government, whose announcements say that on the 24th ult., the Royal troops commenced to bombard the city of Saragossa, whereupon the insurgents within demanded five days cessation of hostilities, which was granted.

Information conveyed to the London press, however, states that although the city of Madrid is quieted, the whole of the important province of Arragon continues in successful revolt. Newspaper correspondents further report that General O'Donnel and the Queen have already had disagreements, and that it is not improbable that Narvaez may succeed to the Ministry.

The Paris Moniteur contains an editorial exculpating General O'Donnel in regard to the present difficulties in Spain.

The same paper also announces that the Spanish Junta had decreed to the infant son of the Emperor of France the rights of Spanish citizenship.

Italy.

From Italy we have a statement by telegraph of a revolt in the Duchy of Massacarra. We are, however, without any reliable particulars. The Austrian officials state that the movement was insignificant, and that it was promptly suppressed.

The East.

We have nothing new from the late seat of war, excepting a reputed serious disagreement respecting the boundaries between Russia and Turkey.

India and China.

The Anglo Saxon brings Bombay dates of the 26th, and Shanghae to the 2d of June. The crops of tea and silks are reported very abundant.

STRANGE AFFAIR.—We copy the following from the Mobile Advertiser, of the 17th instant:

INVESTIGATION OF THE STRICKLAND & CO. CASE—Notice to Leave.—It is probably known by this time to every citizen now in Mobile, that for three or four days past our town has been in an intense state of excitement, caused by the discovery that abolition publications of an incendiary and insurrectionary character were being, or had been sold by the firm of Wm. Strickland & Co., booksellers. Upon these facts being discovered, a meeting of a number of our leadieg and most influential citizens was called for the purpose of examining into the matter, and of consulting as to the propriety of making a movement toward protecting the community by an immediate arrest of the evil. The meeting appointed a committee of calm and considerate men to investigate the matter, and after a careful and thorough investigatioe, they report to a second meeting the conclusions that they had arrived at, as follows:

"1st. That Messrs Strickland and Upson have wilfully and intentionally deceived the meeting in regard to the procurement and sale of the books in question, and that their statements on the subject, in view of the existing facts of the case, clearly ascertained, are little better than a tissue of falsehoods throughout.

"2d. That these two persons are either an prieclple, abolitionists, and are anxioue to propagate their faith on that subject among slaves and slaveholders; or

"3d. They are unscrupulous and unprincipled speculators, without any just sense of moral responsibility; and willing to make money by the indiscriminate sale of any and every kind of book, to any and everybody.

"In either case they are dangerous persons in a slaveholding community, and ought to be ejected from it.

"It is, however, desirable, for the purposes of exact justice, and in order to preserve that exalted conservative character which has always distinguished Southern communities, that the ejection should be peaceable and without the least personal violence: and the Committee would deprecate as the last of evils, and as a stain upon Southern character, any resort to violence, or any excess in accomplishing the end proposed.

"The Committee therefore recommend that three persons be appointed to wait on Messrs. William Strickland and Edwin Upson, and ahuounce the conclusion at which the meeting has arrived, and to inform them that unless they leave the city within five days, we cannot guarantee their personal safety."

The character of the evidence and of the books brought before the committee is such that it was thought not only injudicious but unsafe and dangerous, to make them public. The conclusions arrived at, as above stated, were therefore only submitted.

The report of the Committee was unanimously adopted, and in pursuance of it, three gentlemen were appointed to wait upon Messrs. Strickland and Upson. Yesterday morning these gentlemen proceeded to the store of Messrs. Wm. Strickland and Edwin Upson and ascertained that they had already left the city.

It is proper that we should state that we are informed that both Strickland and Upson were present at the first meeting, and were heard in their defence.

It is somewhat gratifying to know that, while the elevated character of those who had the management of this affair, afforded full assurance to all who were cognizant of the facts, that everything would be properly and carefully done—nothing in haste—still all cause for further excitement is removed by the speedy departure of the parties charged with the offence.

The following is a list of the gentlemen present at the meeting:

Dr. J. C. Nott, Hon. John Bragg, Rev. W. Hawthorn, Dr. J. H. Woodcock, Dr. H. S. Levert, Wm. P. Cleveland, A. Brooks, Joseph Sewall, Hon. A. P. Bagby, H. G. Humphreys, H. W. Brodnax; J. S. Secor, H. B. Holcombe, Dr. Mastin, John W. Manis, Hon. J. W. Lesesne, Dr. G. A. Ketchum, Wm. Boyles, Esq., J. H. Daughdrill, John Scott, Jacob Magee, Dr. F. A. Ross, Joseph E. Murrell, R. C. Macy, Hon. E. S. Dargan, Wm. Harris; John Hall, Godard Bailey and S. C. Stramler.

The examining committee was composed of the following gentlemen:

Hon. J. W. Desesne, Dr. J. C. Nott, Hon. John Bragg, Dr. H. S. Levert, Dr. J. H. Woodcock and J. S. Secor, Esq.

The committee who were appointed to wait on Messrs. Strickland & Co. were:

Dr. J. C. Nott, Dr. H. S. Levert and Wm. F. Cleveland, Esq.

A very large adjourned, meeting of citizens was held at the Court-house last night, at which his Honor the Mayor delivered a speech advising order, etc."

The United States sloop-of-war Cyane, commander Reib, from the West Indies via Key West, the 27th ult., arrived at Boston on the 9th inst. Officers and crew all well.

A card in the Boston Evening Traveller, of the 12th, announces the retiracy of Ferdinand Andrews, Esq. who has been the principal editor of that journal since its establishment.

Later from Texas.

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMSHIP LOUISIANA.

The steamship Louisiana, W. H. Talbot commanding, from Galveston and Indianola on the 14th inst., arrived on Saturday morning.

Capt. Talbot has kindly furnished us with the following memoranda:

In making the return passage from Galveston to this port with the Louisiana, I discovered the light ship on Ship Island shoal gone; also, at Last Island, out of twenty houses, only five remain standing. On the east end of said island saw a vessel ashore, with foremast standing; should judge her to be about three hundred tons; painted black, with white quarter rail; made signal to her, which was promptly answered, but not being one of distress, I proceeded on. On the east end of Timbalier Island I descried a signal of distress, and immediately proceeded to ascertain its nature. I landed with my quarter boat and found the second mate and one mae, who reported themselves as belouging to the Manilla, from France for New Orleans; they stated that they had been in tow of two tow-boats at the mouth of the Mississippi river, but could not succed in crossing the bar, and were backed into deep water egain and anchored; and that in the gale on Sunday, 10th inst., she had parted chains and was driven to the place of disaster. They report ten men lost.

Other bodies have drifted ashore nbout e mile east of them, but did not beloeg to their sldp. The captain was on his way to New Orleans by the island route.

I was also shown a panel door, grained, with blind in the upper part, with a white eomeled keoh, marked "21 in black figures; from appearances I should judge that it belonged to some steamer. About two miles east of Timbalier, boarded schooner John Rolffe from New Orleans, bound to Tampa Bay, with corn, hay, etc.; the vessel was high and dry, and desired to be reported. The Captain had gone to make arrangements for saving the cargo."

Capt. Talbot also reports that seveety-five or one hundred casks of liquors had drifted ashore at Timballer island, supposed to have been a part of the cargo of the ship Manilla.

Several bodies, well dressed, drifted on the island, supposed to heve been passengers of some vessel, also a "booby hatch," similar to those of the steamship Nautilus.

The ship Manilla went to pieces shortly after going ashore.

The ships C. D. Merwin end Bowdlich eve safe anchored et S. W. Pass.

By this arrival we have Gelveston papers to the 12th and others from the coast end interior.

The tremendous hurricane which has inflicted such terrible havoc on other parts of the coast, seems to heve extausted its strength before it reached Galveston. The News says as follows in regard to the weather:

A more unpleasaet day than yesterday we have seldom experienced. A gale from the Westward and Southward swept clouds of sand before it; the wind was hot es the sirocco, and the thermometer stood two degrees higher than the highest point it had previously attajeed during the season. Yesterday was a bad day for dry goods men and scribes. The dust permeated every crevice and found its way into the folds of muslins, and covered the paper or parchment which the clerks' swift pens were tracing. Everybody agreed that the 11th of August was a most disagreeable day, last from all indications, this, the 12th, will be very little better. Who does not wish for rain? and how gratefully a big shower would be received!

The San Antonio Herald denounces Mayor Devlee, in severe terms, for killing McDonald. The account of the affray is represented differently by the journals of each party, and the whole matter has assumed a party caste.

The Gonzales Inqeirer mentions the death of a negro girl in that place, from sun stroke—a rare cause of death in Texas.

The Methodist Church in Texas is composed of 21,521 white members, and 4,580 colored. Its preachers number 445.

The Gonzales Inquirer says, the wife of John F. Eastwood, the man who was lately murdered in that county, has since absconded, and she is suspected of having committed the murder.

The citizens of Honstoe held a public meeting on Saturday, the 10th inst., and passed resolutions expressive of their sympathy for Judge Terry of Calfornie, formerly of Texas, and now a prisoner of the San Francisco Vigilance Committee. The utmost confidence in Judge Terry's uprightness of deportment was expressed by the meetieg.

A Corpus Christi correspondent of the Galveston News of the 12th, writieg neder date of the 2d inst., says:

The Nicaraguen fever is raging here, and there are about forty young men, practiced rangers, who would be willing to go to the assistance of Walker if they had the means. A gentleman of veracity has authorized me to say thet he will give 10,000 acres of land, out West here, of undisputed title, for forty of Sharp's rifles, forty six shooters and transportation for forty men. Won't nobody take him up? If sey persons are willing to embark in this speculation, you may refer them to me.

A gentleman of Galveston informs the News thet a chicken had been hetched in his house by the heet of the weather alone. Rather tough.

The trial of Mayor Devine, of San Antoelo, for the murder of J. S. McDonald, was progressing. The evidence is said to be much in his favor.

GOLD FOUND IN AUSTIN.—The Austin Times says:

A negro boy was playing in the dirt removed for the foundation of Mrs. Frank's house, the other day, and found a lump of gold, which weighs 72 cents. It is almost pure. A German, from a haudful of dirt taken from n well, washed out 25 cents worth of gold. So we, too, have gold in Austin. Nobody, however, seems to care anything about these indications, not believing there is enough of the precious metal to make a fuss about.

We learn from the Central Texan that the saw-mill of Messrs. Barry, Montgomery & Cu., ebout seven miles from Anderson, Grimes county, was destroyed by fire on the 8th inst., together with a quantity of lumber.

The Waco Statesman gives an account of n difficuty which took place on the 10th ult., in McCleenan county, eighteen miles southwest of Waco, between Joseph W. Hardin, formerly of this place, and James M. Hardin, bie brother-in-law and, we believe, his cousin, which resulted in the almost instant death of James M. Hardin.

A Perilous Adventure.

We clip the following from the Rochester Union, of the 4th inst.:

A thrilling incident occerred at the Lower Falls Suspension Bridge yesterday, the perticulars of which have been related to us by an eye witeess. As usual on Suedsy, a large number of persons were congregated at the bridge—men, women and children—some engaged in welking across the bridge, others in viewing the structore trem the banks, etc. On the west bank of the river a number of boys were amusing themselves by pulling upon two guys, giving them an oscillatory motion. The guys were soue ninety feet in leegth, and attached to the bridge directly over the chasm and several feet from each other. They were fastened together in an iron staple inserted in the rock at the very brink of the precipice. Que of the boys, e lad about twelve or fourteen years of age, whose name we have not been able to ascertale, in order to show his daring, seated himself astraddle the guys, when suddenly the staple was wrenched from the rock, and the guys swung out over the river with the boy seated in the crotch, holding on with a hand grasped upon each guy.

The distance from the bridge to the water is two hundred and forty feet, and the position of the young man was about mid-way between! The accident was witnesed by a large number of persons, and so thunderstruck were they that many of them, both upon the bridge and the banks, threw themselves upon their faces, and it was some time before aey one could regain sufficient presence of mind to set about rescuing the lad from his perilous position. The youuster, however, exhibited n nerve worthy of an older head, and seemed to greatly enjoy his swing.

After the vibration of the guys had ceased, he commenced giving directions to those above him on the bridge as to the best method of affording him relief. A search of the neighborhood showed that no rope suitable to draw him up was to be had.

The youeegster then suggested the plan of making a rope sufficiently long to let him down, by piecing. This was done. The rope was let down to him and after he had fastened it to his waist, those above lowered him to the water's edge! He gained the bank, and scampered off for the lower landing as fast as his legs could carry him, and our informant says has not been seen since in the vicinity of the suspension bridge.

Altogether, this is one of the most perilous adventures it has been our lot to relate for some thue; and although the recklessness of the boy in seating himself as described, richly entitles him to a wholesome cowhiding, yet his conduct and presence of mind while suspended at such a height above a rapid current, is certainly worthy of admiration.

We trust this adventure will prove a warning to the many thoughtless persons—men and boys—who visit the bridge, and who are in the habit of performing feats of the most reckless character.

The Vicksburg Whig, of the 12th, has the following item:

THE VICKSBURG AND SHREVEPORT RAILROAD.—We are glad to chronicle the fact that the Vicksburg and Shrevepert Railroad Company have received their first locomotive. It is e splendid one, from the workshop of Richard Norris & Co., of Philadelphia, and was received last Saturday by the steamboat Morrisett. This new and elegant locomotive, the pioneer on our great Western railroad, is called the "Madison," in honor of the parish of that name opposite to us. The company have five miles of rails laid down, and in a few days more the primeval forests of Madison parish will awaken for the first time to the shrill snort of the iron horse. The compaey are actively pressing forward their work, and at an early period they hope to have the road completed, and the cars running as far es Richmond, e distance of about twenty-five miles.

THE STORM AT NATCHEZ.—The Netchez Conrier, of the 13th inst., has the following about the storm:

When we were closing our columns on Monday evening, the rain was still beating, the clouds dark and lowering, and the wind whistling most melancholy, but strong notes. After dark, the storm grew still wilder, and from that time on until towards noon yesterday, we have rarely seen a gale of greater violeece. An immense quentity of rain has fallen, and the power of the wind-blasts can be judged frotn the fact that many of the old rooted and large ornamental trees in the city, have been prostrated. For over thirty-six hours has the storm prevailed—probably rivaling in its fury any September or mid-winter gale ever known.

We expect to hear of vast damage to the growing crops. No fields of cotton could have stood such blasts and such rains, except with material injury. Ie all probability the storm has been n general one, eed we may be prepared to hear throughout adjoining States of the !uiudation of low lands, the blowing down of crops, end the destruction of cotton bolls. Considering the season, the gale has been beyond all precedent.

The packet steamer Southern Belle, duo Tuesday morning early, only arrived from Vicksburg yesterday evening.

DOCTOR HOOFLAND'S

CELEBRATED GERMAN BITTERS, prepared by DR. C. M. JACKSON, Philadelphia, Pa., will effectually cure Liver Complaint, Dyspepsia, Jaundice, Chronic or Nervous Debility, Diseases of the Kidneys, and all diseases arising from a disordered Liver or Stomach.

Such as Constipation, Inward Piles, Fullness of Blood to the Head, Acidity of the Stomach, Nausea, Heartburn, Disgust for Food, Fullness or Weight in the Stomach, Sour Eructations, Sinking or Fluttering at the Pit of the Stomach, Swimming of the Head, Hurried and difficult breathing, Fluttering of the Heart, Choaking or suffocating sensations when in a lying posture, Dimness of Vision, Dots or Webs before the Sight, Fever and Dull Pain in the Head, Deficiency of Perspiration, Yellowness of the Skin and Eyes, Pain in the Side, Back, Chest, Limbs, etc., Sudden Flushes of Heat, Burning in the Flesh, Constant Imagining of Evil, and great Depression of Spirits, etc.

The proprietor in calling the attention of the public to this preparation, does so with a feeling of the utmost confidence in its virtues and a reputation to the diseases for which it is recommended.

It is no new and untried article, but one that has stood the test of ten years' trial before the American people, and its reputation and sale is unrivaled by any similar preparations extant. The testimony in its favor by the most prominent and well-known physicians and individuals in all parts of the country is immense, and a careful perusal of the pamphlet, published annually by the proprietor, and to be had gratis of any of his Agents, cannot but satisfy the most skeptical that this remedy is really deserving the great celebrity it has obtained.

TESTIMONY FROM LOUISIANA.

The German Bitters superior to all preparations now in use.

JACKSON, La., August 15, 1854.

Dear Sir—I feel bound to express my gratification in part for the incalculable benefit I have derived from the use of two bottles of your German Bitters. I have found them to be all you recommended them to be, and cheerfully recommend them to the public as a safe and reliable remedy for the diseases they are intended for, and superior to all other preparations now in use.

Very respectfully, yours, H. DIPPENHEIMER.

THE BITTERS ALL THEY ARE REPRESENTED TO BE.

JACKSON, La., August 20, 1854.

Dear Sir—I have used your German Bitters, and find them all they are represented to be, and cheerfully recommend them to the public as an excellent medicine.

Respectfully yours, W. F. FAULKNER.

L. MAYER says:

HARRISONBURG, La., May 27, 1853.

Your German Bitters is a very valuable medicine. I have disposed of all I have received of you, and wish a new supply immediately.

DR. RAYBOLD QUAIL says:

TRINITY, La., June 30, 1853.

I have for the last year used the German Bitters prepared by you, in my practice extensively. It will shortly be the only medicine of the kind that can be readily sold here, and I believe that in less than one year there will be more sold in this vicinity than in any other part of the country.

DR. RABE says:

FRANKLIN, La., June 24, 1853.

Your German Bitters have become very popular here, and I wish a fresh supply immediately.

E. A. ADAMS & CO. says:

RICHMOND, La., June 2, 1853.

Your Bitters give universal satisfaction to all who have used them.

You should bear in mind that these Bitters are entirely vegetable, thereby possessing advantages over most of the preparations recommended for similar diseases.

The ensuing scholastic year will commence on Wednesday, the 1st of October.

The Institution has entered on its sixth session under the auspices of the same Principal. A sense of duty, interest and pleasure rends his future connexion with the Institution permanent and perpetual.

The apparatus, Chemical, Philosophical and Astronomical, is large and well selected.

There is a numerous cabinet of minerals and fossils in connexion with the Seminary.

There is a library of more than one thousand volumes accessible to the pupils, which will shortly be increased several hundred volumes.

The number of musical instruments, pianos, harp, guitars, etc., is always sufficient to meet the wants of the department.

The institution is furnished with a large and excellent collection of maps, charts, diagrams, plates, globes, etc.

The grounds of the Seminary have been enlarged and the entire premises tastefully enclosed.

UNIFORM.

The Trustees and Principal at a meeting lately held, adopted a uniform for the following reasons:

1st. To secure economy in dress. It is impracticable to secure it otherwise.

2d. Our young ladies are of diverse pecuniary conditions, as is but to be expected where such a number are thrown together, and this diversity is published to the world by the different styles and quality of dress on all public occasions.

3d. On public occasions we have often, as well as the young ladies, been mortified to hear this diversity remarked.

4th. Without a uniform, there being no rule in the article of dress, the region of whim and caprice is left boundless, and the trouble of satisfying these endlessly diverse fancies in every article, is burdensome and annoying in the extreme. For the above and other good reasons, we have adopted a uniform, and recommend it to our patrons and the public. It must be regarded as a law of the institution.

LETTER FROM CHINA.

SHANGHAI, CHINA, May 30, 1856.

Dear Brother McTyeire:—You have no doubt heard by this of the affliction of our mission, that is, the departure of two of our beloved brethren and their families for their native land. It was indeed our greatest affliction to see them leave the field at so early a period. But we should not repine at this, for the ways of God are not as ours. I hope to see them both return and others with them. We are in great need of soldiers to fight the battle of God in this land, for the evil one, the power of darkness, has his cities and villages well fortified, and his soldiers are numerous and well drilled. One native preacher, whose name is Lieeu, or more properly Lieuw, has just returned from from Nankin, where his master lives. I will give you some little of what he says concerning the Imperialists and Insurgents in his own words.:

"I left Shanghai on the 22d day of the Chinese third month, (April 26, 1856,) for Nankin. Had not gone but a little ways before we were compelled to lie up on account of adverse winds until the following day, when we received on board more passengers, increasing our numbers considerably.—That day brought us to Wong-du about night, here we had to lie up for the the night, for our Captain was afraid to proceed after dark. Wang-du is a village. The next day we proceeded to Qunz; saw a walled city, and there passed the night. We reached Lu-chu, a large city. Here we made inquires as to the best route, because at this place there are different canals leading off, and every day there is a favorable wind for some one or the other. We left almost immediately and soon came to a place called Shu-ze-qua, guarded by China Imperial officers, who are stationed there for the purpose of examining all who pass, and are also required to tax every article of value.

On the next day, after having passed this place, we reached a walled city called Qo-sih. On the next day, which was the sixth from Shanghai, left Qo-sih and reached a large village called Chit-tsz-yeen. We were not able to reach Tsaug-tser-fu. I then called a small boat and with my wife went to her father's, about 18 le, or 6 miles.

Returning to Uhit-tsz-yeen we left for Qo-oo-kung. Here the people were badly frightened, expecting the Rebels every day. I heard that Nieung-koh-fu had three cities in its bounds entirely destroyed by the Insurgents. At the above-mentioned city there were many Imperial soldiers expecting daily the approach of Rebels. After leaving this place all was quiet for a while.

On the first day of Chinese fourth month, (Sunday, May 4th,) I passed Tsuh-che-jor, a large bridge and connected with a Custom-House, where we again were made pay a sum for the privilege of passing. After passing that place we did not go far, as it was not well to travel at night on account of thieves and pirates. The next day I procured two wheel-barrows and in this way started from my home in the county of Nankin, distant from me more than a day's journey. Night overtook us thirty le, or ten miles from home, in a small village, and we put up in a rice shop. Because of there being no empty rooms we were compelled to sleep on the ground. Very early the next day we left the place, and in half a day more I reached my native home with my wife. I was there six days. While there I heard that last year in the 12th month, (which was in January,) a place called Sack-poo-jor was taken by the Rebels. I heard also that some large cities round Nankin had been taken by the Rebels, and the people suffered much for want of food, all supplies being cut off.—Happily our Heavenly Father looked upon the people in their distressed situation and sent them a deliverer. An eminent Mandarin Tsary Kar, clearing and recovered the above-mentioned place, Soch-poo-jor. The people of Nankin Province wore much rejoiced.

At this time rice is cheap and all things suitable for cooking is also cheap. On the 7th day of the 4th month, (which was May 10th,) four Rebels were out at one of the gates of Nankin, (the city of Nankin has thirteen gates,) and passed through the country, inquiring of all with whom they happened to meet concerning the position and strength of the Imperial forces, for they were spies sent out for that purpose. There happened to be a little boy passing along, and knowing that they were Rebels, informed the Imperial soldiers who were in the rear, they did not seem to suspect any thing of the sort. They were immediately taken, stripped of their clothes and washed with oil from head to foot, and then cotton was put upon them and it set on fire, beginning at the feet and burning to the head. This is practiced by both parties, and is the heaviest punishment inflicted. Rebels are continually coming out of Nankin, and they are often slain by the people and cast into the canals that pass through the conatry. The entire growth around the city is cut down and used by the the soldiers. While there in my Western house I heard much, all of which I could not write.

The Insurgents pray night and morning and sing, and also at the time of eating give thanks. They observe Saturday as Sabbath, the seventh day. None are allowed to use opium, if so they are immediately slain.

On the ninth day, (which was May 12th,) I left Nankin. At night I stopped at a village called Sa-tonz-isnouz. The next day we reached a village called Ban-zih. Here I got a boat and left the district of Nankin on my way back to Shanghai. In a few days we reached Pa-law-oo, and after about a le or three miles beyond, met with about eight hundred soldiers, all of Canton. One soldier leaped upon our boat, waving his sword, knowing neither the law of God or of his country, said very angrily that the boat was to go into the Imporial service. All on board were badly frightened, using the most beseeching language to let us pass. He would not listen. How miserable we felt you can imagine. We then collected more than a dollar from all on board and gave him. He then listened to our entreaties left us. Not daring to continue on that way, because of the many hundred Imperial boats, we turned and went another way to a place called Se-wong-ging. I heard also that many thousand soldiers in the Imperial service had gone to a place on the Yang-tiz-kieng, called Tnag-po, in order to protect the people in case of an attack from the Rebels, and had already taken many of the people's boats and stolen much property. I saw one boat which had been plundered and four hundred dollars cash taken from its owner. We, knowing this to be the case, a short time before reaching the place did not dare to go forward, but drew back and went another way. About midnight by moonlight we escaped. The people in this part of the country fear the Impe-realists as much as they do the Insurgents. It was not long before we reached Tsaug-Tser-fu, and, on inquiring, found it was not best to stop on account of robbers who infest the place. So we proceeded on farther, and while making a visit to some of my relatives, men were sent out by some of the Mandarins with orders to seize all boats for immediate use, as they were expecting many soldiers from a distance. We had to give them nearly a dollar before they would consent to let us pass. Jesus was with us and brought us safely through the lion's den. Not one of us had been touched or injured.

About the middle of the month, (which was the 18th of May,) we arrived at a place called Boo-sih, and here we came in contact with soldiers sent out by Mandarins in every direction, with orders to take every boat for immediate use. But we, knowing their desire, took an old flag and hoisted it, saying it was already in the employ of some Mandarin. About night the next day we reached Su-chou, and here they were seizing boats. Fortunately they did not trouble us. After passing Su-chu on my way to Shanghai, all was quiet. I reached Shanghai on the 19th, (which was the 22d of May,) and again entered upon my duty of preaching the gospel."

My dear Brother McTyeire, the mail closes in a few hours, and I have written this in quite a hurry. There is nothing new at Shanghai. Almost the whole time they are slaying men in the city. Yesterday four were slain for stealing money. I thank you very much for your kindness in sending me the New Orleans Christian Advocate.

I am yours, most affectionately,

J. WILLIAM LAMBUTH.

THE OLDEST MINISTER.—The oldest active Methodist preacher now in the country, and, we believe, the oldest in the world, is Daniel Webb, of the Providence Conference. He joined the itineracy in 1798.

Can a Clergyman marry himself? In the Court of the Queen's Bouch, Dublin, November 10, 1855, this question was decided in the affirmative; all three of the judges concurring.

As they, who for every slight infirmity take physic to repair their health, do rather impair it: so they, who for every trifle are eager to vindicate their character, do rather weaken it.

DEATH OF A MUTE.

Mr. Editor:—A large and sorrowing concourse of the citizens of Baton Rouge have just returned from the funeral of Marcus Cheatham. Seldom has a more profound sentiment of regret saddened the countonances and penetrated the hearts of our entire population. As I turned away from the grave where was buried so much of the noble and the good, a respected friend requested me to furnish you an account of the life and last hours of the departed.

Marcus S. Cheatham was born in the State of Mississippi February 24, 1835, and from early infancy was deaf and dumb. Early dedicated to God in baptism, he lived during the first few years of his life, without of course, any religious education, though the subject of many prayers. When Marcus was quite young his parents removed to Baton Rouge. The desire of securing his mental improvement in 1846, induced his kind and devoted parents to place him in the Kentucky Institution for the Deaf and Dumb, under the care of Mr. J. A. Jacobs. His improvement was rapid, and as he advanced to the completion of his course it became evident that very few of his fellow pupils could compete with him; especially was this the case in English composition, in which he made proficiency alike creditable to his own mental capacity and the zeal of his accomplished instructor. He was not alone taught the truths of science, but, avoiding all grounds contested by the different sects, the great truths of Christianity were also faithfully inculcated. The importance which Mr. Jacobs attached to this may be best expressed in his own words:

"Having been engaged in the instruction of the deaf and dumb over thirty years, there is nothing upon earth I can look back upon with any sort of satisfaction, no part of my life or conduct that affords me a ray of consolation, but the hours I have spent in giving religious instruction to my pupils. They have been the happiest, nay, the only happy hours of a life full of cares, anxities and labors, and shrouded often with darkness and sorrow."

Under such instruction Marcus formed the habit of daily reading the Bible and of secret prayer, and, it is to be hoped, gave his heart to God.

In 1852 he returned to Baton Rouge, where he was welcomed by his only surviving parent, an affectionate mother, his sister and brothers, and a large circle of acquaintances. His agreeable manners, high toned sentiments and remarkable intelligence, failed not soon to attract a large circle of admiring friends. Though a mute, he possessed social qualities of a high order, and always deeply interested all who engaged in written conversation with him.

He entered the Louisiana Institution for the Deaf and Dumb at its commencement as a pupil, and distiaguished himself at the exhibition before the Legislature in March, 1853. He remained, however, but a short time a pupil, and on the death of Mr. Hanson, in December of the same year, was appointed a Monitor or Tutor in the Institution. He secured the warm affection of his pupils, who seemed to love him as a brother, and the lively gratitude of their parents. Finding his duties in the Institution too confining to suit his tastes, he resigned his situation to engage in another employment, and was attacked with his last illness while residing with his mother, to whom he had previously expressed his sorrow that his attention had been too much directed from religion, and his strong desire, to use his own words, to become "a good Christian."

His illness, which he at first supposed the cholera, but which proved a constipation of the bowels, commenced on Friday last. Though his sufferings were intense, he bore them with the firmest resolution, and seemed more grieved for the sorrow of his kind mother and warm-hearted brothers, than affected by his own intense agony. Sensible that his end was approaching, on Wednesday, the day of his death, he sent for a friend who fully understood the siga language, and who remained with him until the closing scene.

Oh that I could describe to you what was there presented, and paint each color of the tableau there displayed in all its startling distinctness.

There lay a mute, whose ear had never heard the words "God," "Jesus," "heaven"—who had never stood by the death-bed of one like himself of sealed ear and silent tongue, nor had he ever stood in the death-chamber of the Christian blessed with speech, and had translated for him the glorious words of triumph that rise and roll upward with such heart-mourning transport. He, a child of silence, had never heard or known the exhortations and monitions so common to the Christian's dying chamber. Alone, with no example to encourage, no hand but that of the Saviour to sustain him, he was to pass through the dark valley of the shadow of death.

"I wished you to come," said he to his friend, "that I might talk to you who understand my signs, who have often given me good and kind advice, and whom I love, that I might talk to you about heaven, Jesus and the bar of God, before whom I must so soon stand. My mind I find somewhat dark. I do not wish to go to hell, away from God; not that I am thinking of its torments so much, but oh! to lose the society of angels, never to see Jesus, and never with my unclosed ears to hear the songs and praises of heaven. I know I have wandered away from God. Years ago I loved to pray to him and read his holy word, but of late I have been led away, and striven too little to be faithful in my duties. Before I took sick, however, I began again to read my Bible, and to pray to God. Oh how sorry, how very sorry I am that I have not loved God more, that I have ever forgotten him." After a few moments he requested that Rev. Wm. H. Crenshaw, an endeared friend, should be sent for, and with great joy welcomed the proposal to receive the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. Mr. C., on his arrival, by the aid of the interpreter, spoke to Marcus of the love of Jesus, his willingness to forgive sin, and his strong desire that all men should be saved. These words, like the sweet notes of music to those that hear, like the memory of past joys, seemed to enter the heart of the dying mute, and again distinctly reveal to him the true foundation of hope. "Yes, yes," said he, "I believe in in that Saviour, I love Jesus."—And then in that silent chamber, with death so near to one so beloved, the communion was administered, and the accompanying words and exhortations communicated to the sufferer. Pain seemed forgotten and the glories of heaven opening to the view. As these present bowed in prayer, his were the only eyes not drowned in tears. As he looked toward his weeping mother, tears just started to his eyes, enough to show he still felt as a son, but as he turned his gaze upward, a smile of sweet resignation spread over his countenance which told of hopes beyond the grave.

This solemn ceremony ended, he said, "I believe in Jesus, I believe in Jesus, he forgives my sins; I love him more than all else. This earth, for me, is passing away. Its sorrow and afflictions will soon be finished. I go to heaven to praise God, with the holy angels. O yes, my ears which have been closed here, will soon hear the anthem which the angels sing." A portion of the fourteenth chapter of John and the twenty-third Psalm were then read to him by signs. As the Psalm was finished, with joy beaming on his countenance, he said: "These are my feelings. God is my shepherd. 'Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil; for God is with me." I do not wish to get well, I would rather die and go to heaven. Here I am tempted, I have sorrow and trials; there all will be peace and joy. I love Christ, he is my best friend." Turning to a brother who had just entered the room, he said: "I am about to die, become a Christian and meet me in heaven." To his mother, "I love you, but it is better I should die; I have nearly passed the sufferings of death, were I to live they would be for me to endure again; I would rather die and wait to meet you in heaven with Jesus and the angels."

Relatives and friends, all who approached his bed-side, received warm testimonials of affection in his graphic signs, and to all he expressed the most ardent wishes of meeting them in that better world, where tears shall be wiped from all eyes, and where sorrow and sighing shall flee away. And in that death-chamber stood the old, the middle-aged and the young, and all wept, but tears there shed were not all of grief; grey-headed Christians wept in joy over the triumph over their glorious faith, and that a way had been found by which even the children of silence might behold opened before them the pathway to happiness, to heaven, to God. And even his afflicted mother and affectionate brothers, and his extensive circle of relatives wept not as those who have no hope, for there lay that beloved one meeting death with the noble heroism of a Christian, beating back its terrors and triumphing over even its final agonies, admiaistering to those so dear to him words of hope and consolation. But a few moments before death he took the hand of his eldest brother, and said, in signs so expressive that all could understand, "O my beloved brother, meet me in heaven." He looked upward, a smile, not of earth, gathered on his countenance; a strange light beamed from his eyes, he raised, his hands made the signs, "Heaven, angels, the song of the blessed God!—they wait for me!" His hands fell by his side and Marcus Shelby Cheatham was no more. J.

Baton Rouge, Aug. 13, 1856.

A SPIRIT OF TATTLING.—No attentive reader of the Epistles of the New Testament can fail to be struck with the annoyances and evils that this produced in the apostolic churches, and as long as the tongue continues to be the unruly member it will work evil in the same way. We do not speak of the malignant backbiter, or the spiteful detractor, who is always seeing some object for the discharge of venom, for those gliding reptiles are found elsewhere, and when known lose half their power to injure. But really good and well-meaning people often set on foot whisperings and doubts, and complaints about mere trifles, that pass from lip to lip, until at last they reach the minister in the form of apparently formidable dissatisfaction. He concludes that he has lost the affection and confidence of his people, and is, perhaps, guilty of some imprudent words or acts himself, which are reverberated through the whispering gallery, until they come back to him in a loud and multiplied echo. The natural result of this is a speedy separation. All this might have been avoided by a little of the gift and grace of silence, which is often so much rarer and better a gift and grace than that of speech.—[Central Presbyterian.

Speak of other peoples' virtues, conceal their infirmities. If you can say no good, say no ill of them.

To render good for evil is God-like, to render good for good, is man-like; to render evil for evil is beast-like; to render evil for good is devil-like.

Carry yourself submissively toward your superiors; friendly toward your equals; condescendingly towards your inferiors; generously towards your enemies; and lovingly towards all.

We remember many things we should forget (as injuries, disappointments, etc.,) but forget what we should remember, viz: God and our souls.

It signifies nothing to say we will not change our Religion, if our Religion change not us.

If a man lives and dies a mere professor, it had been better for him if he had lived and died a mere heathen.

The duty of religion flows from a principle of religion.

If you mind nothing but the body, you lose body and soul too: If you mind nothing but earth, you lose earth and heaven too.

LATER FROM CALIFORNIA.

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMSHIP GRANADA.

The steamship Granada, Captain Giffin, from Aspinwall and San Juan August 22d, with California mails and passengers, arrived here last night about half-past 12 o'clock.

The following is a list of the passengers by the Granada:

E. J. Davis, Mrs. Strong, Mrs Legare and son, Miss Legare, P Pecan and two children, Mr Levy and lady and two children, Joseph and Mary Boyd, Mr Rawe, J Chittenden and son, Mrs Chapman, N H Aydlas, John Richards, Col Jacques H Coleman and 11 in the steerage.

By the arrival of the Granada we are in possession of papers from California to the 8th, from Panama and Aspinwall to the 19th, and Nicaraguense up to the 5th inst.

The following summary of the news in California during the fortnight previous to the sailing of the steamer, we extract from the True Californian of the 5th inst:

We send off by the steamer to-day more melancholy and startling intelligence.

On the afternoon of the 24th of July, Joseph Hetherington, a native of Carlisle, England, but who came to this State in '49, from St. Louis, Mo., met Dr. Andrew Randall in the bar-room of the St. Nicholas Hotel, on Sansome street, and renewing an old difficulty which had its origin in some money transactions between the parties, committed an assault upon him by seizing his beard. At this insult, Randall commenced drawing a revolver, and Hetherington also drew his. Two shots were fired by Hetherington and three by Randall. The last shot from Hetherington's pistol entered the left temple of Randall, and penetrated the brain. Randall immediately fell, and was conveyed to his apartments in the same hotel, where he lingered until Sunday morning ensuing and expired.

Hetherington was seized by the police of the Vigilance Committee and conveyed to their rooms and locked up. On the death of Randall, the Committee proceeded at once to his trial for murder. It was clearly proven that Hetherington had been pursuing Randall for months, with threats that he intended to shoot him. Randall had borrowed money of Hetherington, which the latter found it impossible to get back. This brought on quarrels and bad blood, which ended by a determination on the part of Hetherington to take Randall's life, which determination he took no trouble to keep from the ears of others. Hetherington was therefore convicted of murder by the Committee. He had also been cleared by the courts of killing another man, named Baldwin, about two years ago.

The Committee had also been engaged upon the trial of Philander Brace, for the murder of Captain West, near the Mission, more than a year ago. His guilt was clearly shown, and by his own admissions, as well as his behavior after his arrest, he must have been one of the most abandoned men of his age, only 22, that the world has yet produced.

Both these men were sentenced to death, which sentence the Committee proceeded to put into execution on the afternoon of the 24th day of July.

A scaffold was erected on Davis street at the intersection of Sacramento. Long before the hour arrived, every approach to the spot was blocked up by a dense throng of curious spectators, composed of men, women and children. Every house-top was covered, and such was the rush that the roofs of several buildings gave way under the pressure.

At the appointed time, a large force of the Vigilance troops, consisting of infantry and cavalry, and numbering at least four thousand men, surrounded the gallows, with fixed bayonets and drawn sabres. The prisoners were then conveyed to the scaffold in carriages.

Hetherington was perfectly firm and composed. Not a nerve quivered, and although his arms were pinioned behind his back, walked up the steep steps of the scaffold without assistance.

Brace had to be assisted up the stairs, but when his eyes fell upon the gaping multitude, a fiendish spirit of violence seemed to take possession of him, and he passed his few remaining moments in repeating the most blasphemous and obscene curses and imprecations.

Hetherington made a few remarks, but was much interrupted by Brace. At length a signal was sounded upon the large bell of the Committee, the two men were swung into eternity, and the horrible spectacle upon which twenty thousand human beings were feasting their eyes, was brought to a close. Their bodies were afterwards handed over to the Coroner, who proceeded to convene a jury, which has not yet brought the inquest to a close.

The greatest indignation has been produced in this city and throughout the State by the failure of Palmer, Cook & Co., to pay the July instalments of interest due upon the State and City Bonds. This banking firm received the money, and has the same, or, ought to have it, in their vaults. They publish a card, in which they state that they did not transmit the funds because their partner, Mr. Wright, informed them that he had enough in New York to meet this liability. Our people are far from being satisfied with this explanation.

It is said that the State Treasurer, Dr. Bates, sends on money by the present steamer to take up these claims in case they yet remain unpaid, which Messrs. Palmer, Cook & Co. insist there can be little danger of.

On the 23d of July, a brick building standing near the corner of Pacific and Montgomery streets, belonging to Michael Reese, fell with a crash. No one was hurt.

On the 24th July our city was thrown into considerable excitement by the return from Honolulu of the notorious Edward Bulger, who was banished on the 5th of June by the Vigilance Committee. He was immediately re-arrested and locked up by the police of the Vigilance Committee, and as it had been often declared that the penalty of death would be inflicted upon any that returned, many thought that Bulger would certainly be hung. The Committee afterwards published a card, in which they stated that there had been a mistake in not reading to Bulger his sentence, and that he was consequently ignorant of the penalty of returning. They therefore concluded not to execute him, but declared it as their fixed determination to hang any of the others that might return. There can be no doubt that they will carry this threat into execution, should occasion offer—which Heaven forefend! Bulger will be sent away again.

A saw and flouring mill, belonging to Judge David S. Terry and Mr. Hodges, on the Moquelumne river, in San Joaquin county, was destroyed by fire on the 24th July.

A number of attempts have been made during the past fortnight to fire Sacramento and San Francisco. Three different efforts were frustrated in one week at Sacramento. In this city, about three o'clock in the morning of the 27th July, a diabolical attempt was made to burn Samuel Brannan's Express Building, on the corner of California and Montgomery streets. The hall matting was rolled up, placed against one of the doors, saturated with camphene, and set on fire. Fortunately, a gentleman passing, succeeded in removing the burning mass before the flames had communicated to the wood work of the door, and thus saved, no doubt, a large destruction of some of the most valuable property in the city.

On Sunday, 27th July, Mr. Wm. F. Mullins, while handling a fowling-piece, fell, striking the hammer upon the foot, which caused it to go off. The charge passed through the calf of Mr. Mullins's leg, and a portion lodged in the face of a Mr. Cramer. It was some time before a surgeon could be procured, and in the meantime Mr. Mullins had lost so much blood that he died the same night.

The commissioners appointed under an act of the last Legislature to select plans for the proposed Capitol building at Sacramento, have received a number from architects in different parts of the State, but as yet have made no choice.

Highway robberies are becoming very frequent in the interior. It is said some of the villians that were driven out of San Francisco by the Vigilance Committee have taken to the road.

The whole amount of coin turned out by our Mint during the month of July, was $2,319,000. Besides which there were $452,167 87 in unparted bars.

A destructive fire occurred on the morning of the 4th August, by which three wooden buildings on Pacific street, between Montgomery and Kearny, were consumed. Three horses perished in the flames, and the house of Eagine Company No. 10, just finished, was considerably damaged. A member of the fire department named Larcomb was badly injured by being accidentally struck with an axe.

The Clerk's office of the U. S. District Court was entered by burglars on the night of the 3d August, and thoroughly ransacked. Money to the amount of some $300 was stolen, but none of the valuable papers disturbed.

Slight shocks of an earthquake were felt in this city on the morning of Sunday, August 30.

Mrs. Hayne played out her engagement at the Metropolitan, which was very successful, and is now taking a respite for the benefit of her health, and to recover from the fatigue of her arduous application. Her popularity here is yet at its acme.

EMIGRANTS FOR KANSAS.—The Columbus (Ga.) Enquirer, of the 21st inst., has the following:

The company of Kansas emigrants, raised chiefly by the exertions of Messrs. Baker, Johnson and Clayton, of Harlowe county, Ala., are expected to arrive here to-day, under the command of Capt. H. A. Clayton. We are glad to learn that they will be joined by several persons here—the printers, as usual, taking the lead.

FOUR DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMSHIP BALTIC.

The United States mail steamship Baltic, Comstock commander, from Liverpool, arrived at New York at an early hour on the morning of the 17th inst., having left Liverpool on the 6th.

The Cunard steamer Africa arrived at Liverpool about half-past 10 o'clock on the morning of Sunday, the 3d inst.

General Summary of News.

By the Baltic we receive four days later intelligence. The following is a brief summary of the news:

AFFAIRS IN SPAIN.—Saragossa has [illegible] The Queen's troops took [illegible] out residence. The [illegible] dictatorship, and the [illegible] ayuntamento and provincial deputation has been named in Catalonia, and the various bands of insurgents which sought refuge on the mountains were dispersing rapidly.

All the details that reach us of the proceedings at Barcelona, concur in representing the fighting as desperate, and the conduct of the Queen's troops after all resistance had ceased, as ferocious in the extreme. On the 24th, for instance, three days after the fighting had ceased in the city, two battalions of National Guards, arriving to assistance of the citizens, were met in the plain by the Queen's cavalry, and every man of them cut to pieces!

Seventeen individuals engaged in the insurrection at Barcelona have been shot—they were executed three by three.

Affairs in France.

Reports are current that the Emperor is in a really critical state of health. His illness consists in a development of the malady of the spine, with which he has been long afflicted. He is able to attend to business, and is not in immediate danger. He would return to Paris on the 5th or 6th inst., but would leave on the 10th or 11th, accompanied by the Empress for Biarritz.

The Paris Siecle complains that of the three lines of transatlantic steamers plying between Havre and New York, namely: the New York and Havre American line, the Cunard British line, and Gauthier frere's French line, the latter, owing to the absurd customs regulations of France, actually pay heavier dues than the other two. Further, the Siecle says that Havre is becoming the shipping port of Europe, and already exceeds the trade of Liverpool with New York.

Marshal Pelissier and suite arrived at Marseilles on the 1st instant. On landing the marshal found awaiting him a letter from the Emperor conferring on him the title of Duke. All the French ships in harbor, as well as the British war steamer Caradoc, saluted the marshal, who soon after landed to receive an address from the municipality of the city, and then departed for Plombieres to meet the Emperor.

Affairs in Italy.

A letter says that the Austrian Government is alarmed at the attitude which Sardinia assumes towards it in Italy, and has begged the French Government to represent to the latter that, in order to preserve the tranquillity of Europe, a change of its policy would be desirable. The French Government has accordingly made a communication of a confidential character to Sardinia, hinting that she might assume a less hostile attitude and lona towards Austria, without lessening the influence she exercises in Italy. The view which Sardinia will take of the mouition remains to be seen.

Affairs in Turkey.

Advices from Constantinople, of the 26th ult., mention that the city will be entirely evacuated by the Allies, and the hospitals restored to the Turkish authorities by the 15th of the present month.

The squadron under the command of Admiral Lord Lyons, one part at Smyrna and in the Pirœus, and part off the coast of Syria.

The Gazette contains a notice to mariners, that various lighthouses in the Dardenelles, Bosphorus, and Black Sea were relighted on the 1st of June.

Affairs in Great Britain.

The citizens of Norwich gave a banquet to Gen. Windham, on the 2d inst., on his return from the Crimea.

Hon. Robert Lowe, Vice President of the Board of Trade, has left London for a brief tour in the United States.

The Gazette publishes an order by the Queen, permitting persons decorated by the Emperor of the French to wear the insignia.

The U. S. frigate Susquehanna arrived at Gibraltar on the 23d ult., six days from Fayal and sixteen from Key West. She would leave in a day or two for Spezzia, touching at some of the ports on the eastern coast of Spain.

General Codrington had arrived at London. No demonstration awaited him, as it did Marshal Pelissier.

Eleven civilians, laborers, and mechanics, have been arrested and committed to jail for having sided with the militia rioters recently at Nenagh.

Central American Intelligence.

From the Panama Star, of the 8th, we learn that private letters had been received in that city containing the information that Walker's position in Nicaragua was a most precarious one, he having only twelve hondred men with him; while Rivas, besides having a thousand well armed troops, fortified in Canandagua, has the sympathies of the whole people of the country with him. Hondoras and Guatemala were organizing their forces for the purpose of invading Nicaragua, and driving Walker out, and that they would commence operations as soon as the dry season commenced.

We, as a matter of course, must receive the above with every allowance for the prejudices and hopes of the paper from which it is extracted; but even if it be true, we are pretty sure that Walker could not be driven out as easy as the Central Americans seem to think.

We have files of the Nicaraguense to the 3d inst., but cannot find in it anything to warrant the belief that Walker's cause was weak; on the contrary, from the bold stand he is taking in regard to punishing traitors and discharging soldiers who have served out their time, we would conclude that he was anything else than frightened at the preparations which were being made against him.

The steamer having arrived at such a late hour it is impossible for us to give as full a summary of Nicaragua news as we should have liked. In to-morrow's edition we will try and give everything of an interesting nature.

From a decree published in the Nicaraguan, we learn that the Government of Nicaragua have made the first step towards a regular organization of the Judiciary. A court of First Instance for every Department in the Republic has been appointed.

The jurisdiction of these courts is set forth in the decree as embracing all cases where the title or possession of land is in question; in all cases of admiralty or maritime jurisdiction; in all matters pertaining to the estates of deceased persons; in all criminals cases, and, generally, in all cases beyond the jurisdiction of the alcaldes.

The Judge has power to enforce his decrees; he may appoint a clerk and Marshal, at the same time designating their fees; and for their services at present, shall receive one hundred and fifty dollars per month.

As a matter of course, as always will be the case, legal business is flowing in on the attention of the Court; and we doubt not there will soon be other organizations of the same sort.

The following persons were publicly shot in the plaza at Masaya for having conspired against the Republic: Desiderio Calvo, a wealthy merchant of Masaya; Domingo Ant. Berclaran; Moises Avendano; and Felipe Perez—all natives of the country. The exact nature of the crime is represented to have been an attempt to persuade the soldiers of the army to desert by offering to bribe them, and of being in correspondence with Rivas.

REVOLUTION IN COSTA RICA.—A vessel which arrived in port on the 12th inst., for Tumaco, brings us further intelligence respecting the disturbed state of Costa Rica.

It appears that another revolution has been attempted against the Government, but President Mora succeeded in quelling it, and arrested some of the leaders. Five of the officers of the Government troops who were made prisoners for their connection with the revolutionary party, were banished by Mora to Peru, but the vessel put in here, where they were enabled to land.

The Mayor of St. Augustine has ordered all vessels from the West Indies, Mexico, South or Central America, Charleston, New York, and Key West to perform quarantine in order to guard "against infectious and pestilential diseases."

Doubtless the citizens of Charleston will be indignant at being classed with South and Central American ports, but whether that indignation would prove so contagious as to need the intervention of quarantine, is a question on which doctors would probably differ.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 30, 1856.

SWAN LAKE CAMP-MEETING.

Accepting the invitation published with a notice of the Camp-meeting for Swan Lake Circuit—"Preachers and people affectionately invited to attend"—we left the city on Wednesday evening, 21st inst. Friday night landed at Lake Providence and consigned ourself to the cordial hospitality of W. L. Knox, Esq. Brother Knox, besides being Sheriff of the Parish of Carroll and planter, does the receiving and forwarding of Methodist preachers at this point. Rev. T. Beard, and Col. McNeil, of Holly Springs, were already on hand. The Louisiana Conference will be glad to know that Brother Beard has been transported, and will labor until the annual session as Tract Agent. Fortunately for Louisiana, Memphis Conference, in zeal and ability, has reached the exporting point.

Soon after breakfast, with an outfit of a light buggy and a span of nimble-footed mules, we were bowling along a hard road to the ground. Our traveling companion, Col. McNeil, on the look-out for a settlement, was in raptures with the country. It was enough to make a poor parson long to possess "a foot of land." On the border of the Lake is the happiest combination of residence and plantation we ever saw. In front a water-view, for boat sailing and fishing, the yard shaded by oak, China and pecan trees. In the rear, immediately adjoining, cotton growing one and two bales to the acre, with corn, fruits and vegetables. The levee system has redeemed much alluvial from inundation; and notwithstanding the broad green fields and thrifty homes about, the wealth of this Goshen has hardly been sampled. We advise no planter to come and see it unless he is ready to move to it. With a poor heart will he, afterwards, scratch on sand banks and clay hills.

About fifteen miles South-West, and on the Bayou Tensas, we came upon the camp in the thick woods. Every thing is new, and fragrant of freshly split oak and ash wood. The stand is shaded with boughs newly cut. The Presiding Elder, Rev. N. A. Cravens, is pushing the battle bravely, with his helpers, Revs. Goodwyn, Collins, Hawkins and McGaughey. The meeting has been in progress two days. Songs and praises salute the ear before the tents are seen. Right off, we find ourselves in deep water instead of shelving banks. Christians are seeking a deeper work of grace. Sanctification is the theme of tent-talk and bower-prayer.—Brother Hawkins has just concluded the eight o'clock sermon on the Pauline text—sanctified soul, body and spirit. The atmosphere is renewing, fraternal greetings cordial. There is not a brick within a mile. The latest fashions have not arrived. Losers and pleasure seekers have not found out the place. Lovers of God are here and seekers of religion.

During the day and Sabbath following, the crowd became larger and more promiscuous, but maintained a serious tone. On Saturday, after three o'clock sermon, the first invitation was given for those who would confess themselves sinners—to ask the prayers and counsels of God's people—to seek the forgiveness of their sins. By Sabbath morning nine or ten conversions were announced. Up to our departure nineteen or twenty.

Happy day, happy day,
When Jesus took my sins away.

The preaching was mingled with many words of exhortation. It was ministered with directness to the conscience—appealing to an awakened experience. We trust more good than even any present or human estimates will cover, was done. Such an occasion has been likened to a scattering shot into a flock of birds. Many fall on the spot, and others, only wounded, fly away, to fall afar off, alone.

It happened with some, at this camp-meeting, as elsewhere. Because others were more demonstrative of spiritual benefits, they undervalued their own. While one shouts, another may "commune with his own heart and be still," and just as happy. A mourner in seeking pardon may hinder his way by wilfulness—planning for himself a sudden or bright conversion. And one that is born of God may fall into a similar error, especially in the presence of those "shouting happy." The wind, earthquake and fire, were not more powerful or divine than the "still, small voice." Our Heavenly Father blesses all his obedient children, but to each his blessing suits.

Brother McGaughey, the pastor of the circuit, was most of the time confined to his bed by sickness. We were sorry to leave him there. May his valuable life be spared.

The friends have determined to locate a permanent camp on a spot near Baxter's Bayou. Much water is there—a spring. The distance from Lake Providence is about the same. A shed is to be put up that will turn rain as well as sunshine, and a smoother order of puncheon seats.

Sunday afternoon the missionary collection was taken up. The previous hour would have been better, as numbers were leaving after dinner. The congregation small as we saw during meeting—but it yielded us five bales of missionary cotton and enough money subscribed and paid to bring the amount up to $500, which was all we asked for.

Monday, after 11 o'clock preaching, Dr. Goff tendered a seat in his buggy. A pleasant evening with his family—a night's rest under his roof and a downward bound steamer comes along punctually as if sent for. To the Presiding Elder, preachers and people of the Lake Providence District we wish many such Camp-meetings.

ANNUAL TWO-DAYS' HOLIDAY MEETINGS.

Under the head of Domestic Missions are, oft-times, reports of the labors and successes of our preachers among the servile population of the South, that would create a sensation if reported from Yoruba or the Ganges, or from Boorialiboolagah. But, because they are at home, our readers underrate their moral grandeur and significance; and because these things are done at the South, they are carefully ignored by the prints at the North.

Take the report of that hard-working and judicious missionary among the slaves—Rev. Wm. P. Miller—from East Alabama. Will the Independent or Tribune, of New York, republish it? We should like to see it. But no! such things can't be expected. We challenge them.

Will the Northern Christian Advocate please copy it, as an offset to the dirty and slanderous articles of its correspondent "Argus"—who has been writing a series on Southern slave horrors. If they delight in things pure and of good report, it ought to be a pleasure to them to hand round such fairly written and moderate articles, showing the facts of Southern slavery.

Christian masters, great is your responsibility. Your family is large.—We have immense opportunity for doing good to the souls and bodies of men. Read these missionary reports and be encouraged to go and do likewise.

GALVESTON, August 15, 1856.

Brother McTyeire:—Permit me, if you please, to notify the preachers of your Conferences and especially those of Louisiana, that the first volume of our German Evangelical Apologist is in a few weeks to be completed. It is with great gratitude to God, and hearty thanks to our beloved brethren in the ministry that we acknowledge it. The Lord has blessed our labors and our brethren have remembered our work. Indeed some of our Louisiana brethren have acted most nobly. We have 170 subscribers in New Orleans, some at Plaquemine, many at Minden, and two at Allen's Settlement. Further, we have 16 at Mobile, and at Pensacola, Tallahasse, Key West, etc., etc., Rev. J. M. Hofer has alone 60 subscribers among his members and hearers.

Our whole list of subscribers is swelled up to the number of 1000, including agents, during these few months, and immense good has been done. It would be very cheering indeed to some of your readers, if they could read the letters and encouragements which we daily receive from every part of the Union, and I trust Brother Hofer will translate Brother Vorden-Bimcu's and other late letters for your Advocate.

I discover a great hindrance to our German work in its not being enough appreciated. This lays in our insufficiency of American correspondence.—We fear to make mistakes, and so we do not write at all, although we love the American language and are improving rapidly.

As we are left, by the Missionary Board to ourselves for support for the coming year, we therefore most earnestly solicit the assistance of our brethren in the ministry. Do not pass a German house on your circuits but you get down and tell them that they can now get a German weekly paper, filled with news, miscellany and religious information, all for only one dollar. Let them give you, in their own writing, the address. You collect the money and send us their Post-Office, Parish or county, etc.

Brethren, if we, with Advocates and Apologist, by the agents we have, do not stir and take the world, it will be our own fault.

Let us hear from you soon. Get some of your rich members to subscribe for their German neighbors and they will experience that Germans are a grateful people. Read Brother Hofer's translations on the above subject, and may the Lord bless you and sustain you in your labors throughout all these regions.

Address me at Galveston, Texas.

Yours in the love of Christ,

PETER MOLLING,

Editor of Evangelical Apologist.

DOMESTIC MISSIONS.

UCHEE COLORED MISSION, Alabama Conference.

Rev. H. N. McTYEIRE, Assistant Treasurer of the Missionary Society of the M. E. Church, South:

This missionary work among the colored people is one of the most noble and glorious I ever contemplated. It is the missionary field of the Southern Methodist Church. We must do it, no one else will. I think we should turn our attention towards this work particularly, for it is of more importance than all our other missions put together. A great and effectual door is opened and there are many adversaries.—Our missionary plan, our missionary doctrine and our missionary character, stand high in the estimation of owners of slaves generally. They do not want any change—they don't desire it connected with the circuit work. They want it special. They greatly prefer to have their Missionary whose heart and soul is in the work of the salvation of their servants. Neither, as a general thing, do they desire to select a man from among the locality for themselves. They generally prefer that the Conference or at least the Presiding Elder should make the selection.

Our doctrine is the only doctrine free from predestination, preached in this country, teaching all, both bond and free, that denying ungodliness and worldly lust, we should live soberly, righteously and godly in this present world, and in the world to come give an account for the deeds done in the body.

A great many planters believe as I do, that Calvinism is as dangerous to the negro as Universalism or Infidelity, removing all restraint and fear by fate, and teaching that whatsoever they do was "ordained to be done from the foundation of the world." Our missionary character is the praise of all the churches, except one.

This, the Uchee Mission, is growing in the favor of God and man. Oh Sir, if you could have been with me for the last two weeks at our Annual two days Holiday-Meeting, held entirely on week-days, you would have rejoiced with us and have had something to say to all the friends of missions that would have been profitable.

The first we held at Soule Chapel before the fourth Sunday in July, and had a large congregation. The circuit preacher, Brother Strickland was with me, and we expected Bishop Andrew, but in that was disappointed, his daughter dying about that time. Brother Strickland took up his missionary collection at Soule Chapel the next day, and raised $184 25 from that small Society. He preached a very good sermon on the occasion. He is a fine manager, and proved himself so to be on that occasion.

We then proceeded to Mount Zion, a place you have heard of before on this subject. I should have been glad not only for you to have been there, as one of the strong friends of the cause, but it seems to me if all the enemies North and South had been there they would have given up their opposition, to see on Monday morning, a large congregation of colored people, I suppose at least five hundred, well dressed, all with dinners to stay all day, and hear the gospel and worship God; the old and decrepid brought in wagons; young children, all ages and sizes, to be catechized. We numbered the Catechism Class, there were seventy-eight present; many of them knowing all Caper's Catechism No. 1.

But the lovefeast on Tuesday morning, at 9 o'clock, exceeded any thing I ever saw or heard. No extravagance, superstition or wild-fire. I requested them to be short, for there were many to speak; to be calm, for all wanted to hear. These rules were complied with strictly, until near the close, when several of Brother J. A's. people alluded so touchingly to the death of their old master, giving us his last dying charge to them to meet him in heaven, etc., and that they were resolved to do so, and were on the way; just at that moment Brother J. A., the present master arose and began: "I cannot refrain from saying a few words, for that old master to whom so many of you allude, was my venerated father," and with tears flowing freely and bosom heaving with emotion, he went on to say "he would rather see his family, (meaning specially his servants,) happy in the service of God, and to be the humble instrument in some manner of leading them safe to heaven, than to add field to field and house to house." He also assured them that the sun never went down without his presenting them all before the throne of mercy.

The calmness ended and shouts of glory to God filled the house. Such rapture and fullness of joy I have seldom seen.

In the afternoon there were ten baptized and received into full church membership, and about forty children a year old and under were baptized and the Lord's Supper administered.

I haave held two more of these meetings, the third at Wachoocha and the fourth at Shady Grove. All substantially the same—all good meetings indeed.

In conclusion, I have admitted near 100; baptized 75; catechized my last round 423; preached, as near as I can make out to about 2,600 every round.

Glory be to God, who so loved these poor as to provide means for their salvation, and thank God I am permitted to preach the gospel to them.

Introductory Speech of Rev. C. K. Marshall,

ON LAYING THE CORNER-STONE OF THE CENTRE BUILDING OF CENTENARY COLLEGE, LA., JULY, 1856.

Friends of Literature and
Gentlemen of the Faculty and Board of Trustees:

This occasion is one of no ordinary import. Commencement day is the great Sabbath of college life. To many young gentlemen connected with this Institution, this is one of the most momentous days of their being. For years they have awaited its coming with mingled emotions of hope and fear; and from the distant future they will look back upon its joy-lit summit as one of the most memorable of all the days past. To the friends of home education it is a day fraught with hopes and hallowed with prayers which render it sacred to them.

In addition to the ordinary duties of this day, we have collected on this spot to lay the corner-stone of the splendid superstructure, the gradually rising walls of which arrest your attention and fill your breast with emotions of profound satisfaction. The spirit with which the enterprize goes on, and the imposing aspect which the work already presents, gives cheering earnest of the pleasure the benefactors and the builders who are carrying forward the plan; the professors and teachers who shall occupy its halls, and the pupils and patrons, will enjoy when, not the corner, but the cope-stone, shall come to its place with "shoutings of grace unto it." Every philanthropic spirit, every liberal and enlightened mind must rejoice, especially at this crisis in our national affairs, to witness such a day and service as this. It is a day of conquests; a day of the mighty rousing of the people for the establishment of their own schools, and shall be swiftly followed by many other days and doings of a similar kind. Men feel assured to-day, in this assembly, that the cause of home education in the largest sense, is fixed among the inevitibilities of Providence. And come what may, with His blessing, the business of learning is deemed so first-rate in importance that its solemn work can never be ignored or slighted on this soil again. Never did this College see a brighter day than this. The day of small things has not been despised, consequently the day of noble things is now upon you. The future of your corner must be upward and onward, and Centenary take rank with the best educational agencies of the land. While we gaze upon the older buildings with their laurels of those powers for usefulness which virtuously employed must result in their everlasting well-being.—This new edifice is not only a fresh pledge to the cause of learning, but in a large and appropriate sense a temple reared to God, His service and worship. For, all diligent study, all efforts to acquire knowledge are but other forms of rendering homage and praise to heaven. Well may it cheer our hearts to see its fair proportions rise; well may it awaken pleasing emotions to contemplate its speedy completion, and the important facilities its ample plans will give to the work you have to do.

The services of this moment are peculiarly interesting. This day, this hour has been set apart for laying the corner-stone in conformity to a time-honored usage when buildings of great importance or public utility were to be constructed. Precisely when and with whom the custom originated we are unable to tell. The corner-stones of Egyptian pyramids may possibly hold the secret in their unexplored repositories. The Masonic Fraternity holds some interesting reminiscences which have been saved from the waves of the elder time, under which lie, irrecoverably lost, so many valuable treasures, but nothing which can definitely settle this question. That Society is familiar with the laying of ordinary corner-stones, and the committee of arrangements at one time contemplated with much gratification their assistance and their ceremonies on laying this stone. But, with characteristic frankness, they acknowledge that they were not equal to the task. This is the only corner of this building deemed fit and proper to receive the symbolic stone, but we find the Masons bound to ignore all corners except the North-East. With them it must be there or nowhere; with us unfortunately, like "point no point" to a traveler on our inland sea, the North-East angle of this structure is "corner no corner," place no place; altogether nearer "nowhere" than any other possible spot where we could deposit this beautiful marble ark with the gems and treasures with which it will soon be stored. We all regret it. As a Mason I could but realize a great disappointment. Still, Masonry has done, and can do noble things—chide her not if she cannot do everything. Their declinature is most trying to me because it imposes a large amount of labor on me and takes me altogether by surprise.

That labor, however, is relieved by the pleasure I enjoy on being able to command the resources and assistance, in the present sevices, of a Society far more ancient, more venerable, distinguished and immutable than that of the Masonic Fraternity. I refer to the Abrahami Filliorum antiqua fraternitas.—This venerable Fraternity was founded by the Patriarch Abraham, the father of the faithful and the "friend of God." With so illustrious a founder, the Washington of his age, it is not to be wondered at that a long line of the most distinguished worthies should have perpetuated its existence, maintained its ritual, and gloried in the "faith" which cements and binds the brotherhood to this day wherever its doctrines have been embraced. Abraham was a builder. On one occasion he reared an altar on Mount Moriah. The precise form of the structure we cannot certainly declare. But as an humble member of the Fraternity I will take leave to presume that it was circular, because the annulus, or ring, was in that day used as a symbol of the Deity, and the altar was erected as an act of homage to the True God. If circle-shaped it had no Masonic corner. Consequently the officers and members of our Fraternity are bound to respect alike all points of the compass. That altar was built on a mountain summit. We have selected this beautiful elevation for ours, and we place the corner-stone higher up on the superstructure than is the custom of our younger kinsman.* We have the authority of an imposing precedent, and we hope that all fair-minded Masons will congratulate us on the superior advantages and distinction we possess and enjoy; for we would not have them for a moment suppose we would honor their Fraternity less, but as in duty bound, the Abrahami Filliorum antiqua fraternitas more. And while we so honor our higher Fraternity, we rejoice to know that thousands of the highest Masons have been initiated into its more sublime and more enlightening mysteries.

The past, the present, the future, all belong to us. From remote and dusty centuries, through all their eventful fortunes, amidst the conflict of nations, the rise and fall of Empires, the growth and decay of cities, the building and consecration of sacred temples, this Fraternity has been present, by its representatives, to take a part and exert a benigu, humanizing and religious influence, and record its history and deeds with letters composed of the noblest structures of science, philanthropy and Divine worship. This day witnesses similar offices, and future generations shall never want for faithful members to execute the high behests of the venerable orders.

Nor shall its worthy members fail of honorable promotion and a just reward. They shall have full and ennobling labor for their hands, peace for their conscience, and exhaustless supplies of food for the growing demands of the ever expanding mind. The faithful student will meet with histories and biographies fraught with curious phenomena of friendship, love and heroism; of virtuous deeds and philanthropic labors, under circumstances and of a character the most remarkable ever known since time began. Their employments will be adapted to the peculiarities of an industrious and dignified fellowship, than which none are better calculated to unfold the character, impress upon it the image of true greatness, strengthen moral obligation, and open the way for a useful and honorable life. At a future day we shall "open the door" for the reception of worthy applicants from all the inferior "Fraternies" who are in pursuit of "more light." May the spirit of this Abrahamic Fraternity ever preside over this Institution—reign through its halls, cheer its dormitories, and bless the young hearts that shall throb within these apartments when ours are pulseless and cold in the silent grave.

NOTE.—The Board of Trustees, Faculty and several Societies connected with the College, having made arrangements to deposit certain memorials in the corner-stone, now proceeded in their respective orders, to present them to Rev. Mr. Marshall as the orator of the occasion.

*The first story of the building was up and the next one going forward rapidly, but no suitable time till this offered for these services.

UNIVERSITY OF LOUISIANA.—We call the attention of our readers to the advertisement of the Medical Department of the University. It is in full working order. Abler names in their Departments than the Professors, we have not in the South.

Notice—There will be a Camp-Meeting at Otopa'a Camp-ground, in Pike county, beginning on the first Friday in October, and ending the following Tuesday or Wednesday. Also, a Camp-Meeting at Adams' Camp-ground, in Amite county, beginning on the third Friday in October and ending as above. The preachers, both itinerant and local, and the people generally, are affectionately invited to attend.

REVIVALS.

GEORGETOWN CIRCUIT, Miss. Conference, Aug. 12.

Brother McTyeire—Permit me to say to your readers that the Lord of hosts has visited us on this circuit in mercy. On the 19th of July we began a protracted meeting at Poplar Springs, which lasted five days and resulted in three or four conversions, three accessions, one sanctification and much spiritual profit to the church. It was indeed a refreshing time, and I trust much lasting good was done.

On the 26th of July we began a three days' meeting at Bethel. Two precious souls were converted and many of the members were much revived. Here also I think much permanent good was done.

On the 2d of August we began a meeting at Providence, which lasted six days. It was a glorious meeting. Many members and rejoicing converts thanked God they came to that meeting. I have not witnessed such displays of divine power for years. I do not wonder that angels rejoice over the conversion of sinners when it produces such joy on earth. Again and again did husband and wife get their "feet upon the rock and a new song in their mouth, even praise to God." These were scenes that stirred men's souls.—Few looked coldly on; many a parent's heart leaped for joy as a beloved son or daughter exclaimed "I am happy—God has blessed my soul—glory to his name." The local preachers generally in attendance came up to the help of the Lord, and mainly to their labors instrumentally do I attribute the good done. "For as soon as Zion travailed she brought forth her children." There were over thirty conversions, including a few reconnections, and twenty accessions to the church. A number of the converted are the heads of families, and all of them with three or four exceptions adults—hence we hope they will make us valuable and faithful members. "Bless the Lord, O my soul, and all that is within me bless his holy name."

Fraternally yours,

L. ERCANBRACK.

HILLABEE CIRCUIT, Alabama Conference, August 20.

Brother McTyeire:—The little boy sent by the Conference to Hillabee Circuit is doing well. He has, within the last few weeks, held three protracted meetings. The first at Mount Moriah Church, where the membership had become quite cold and much needed a revival. The meeting lasted seven days—the church was made alive to God, sinners were awakened, many were converted, and twenty-six accessions.

The second was held at Smyrna, and continued six days. Twenty-three were converted, many backsliders reclaimed, and thirty-five accessions.

At Ebenezer the meeting was continued nine days. This place was just ready to be given up as lost. They are now alive, and we hope will do well in future. The number of conversions as yet is not known. Thirty joined the church. This makes one hundred and ti[illegible]-six since the commencement of the present conference year.

We hope and pray that much more will be done, and this year will tell well for our young Brother. The local brethren have done much in this good work. Yours in Christ,

S. E. SWOPE.

AUTAUGAVILLE, Alabama, August 18, 1856.

Brother McTyeire:—We have just closed a meeting at Robinson's Springs, conducted principally by Brothers Norris and Freeman, which resulted in twenty converts. Up to this time there have been upon the circuit this year about one hundred conversions, 32 whites and 78 colored. Our prospect for a plentiful ingathering is bright.—We expect to bring up the amounts assessed for Conference and necessary purposes, and we trust all the claims of your, (our) excellent paper with a respectable number of new subscribers.

DANIEL DUNCAN.

BUTTAHATCHIE CIRCUIT, Alabama Conference.

The Lord is blessing his people on this circuit. Some several days religious exercises at Wise's, embracing the third Sunday in July, conducted by Brother Hiams, assisted by local preachers and exhorters. Several souls were converted, and twelve added to the church. The third quarterly meeting now in session, having been protracted from 2d inst. Up to this time we have had some twelve or eighteen conversions, and as many members added to the church. The Presiding Elder for this district, Columbus, says "there have been conversions at every quarterly meeting, so far, on his third round."

J. W. SHORES.

CAHABA MISSION.

Brother McTyeire:—We have had a gracious revival on this mission, which has resulted in the conversion of seventy souls and sixty-seven accessions to the church. Pray for us that this may be as the drop that precedes the mighty shower. All that I can do for your paper I will do. Believe me

Your true friend in Christ,

J. C. PITTS.

Letter from Our Fayre Ladye.

KENILWORTH, England, July 22, 1856.

A short ride of ten miles brought us to a collection of small farm-houses and hay-stacks, just beyond which was a fine old square tower—once called Mortimer's Tower—and built by the Earl of Leicester, for an entrance to Kenilworth; but the gates have been pulled down, the opening filled up, and the spot on which Queen Elizabeth once guided her horse's feet is now a dwelling-house, and we were admitted into the front yard by a small wicket gate. The first glance at the ruins shows only the side of Cæsar's Tower, which is but a small part of these grand remains of the olden days of the Virgin Queen. We walked slowly and reverently on, for to all of us the sad story of Amy Robsart rose up vividly, until we were facing the front, and then the extent and grandeur of Kenilworth, majestic in its ruins, was before us. The old guide, who had crept after us, now began, in his [illegible] rations and yet flowing vein, to tell us all that [illegible] memory could recall of its dates and history. He [illegible] very enthusiastic, and took great pains to point out each spot of interest, and to put us in the exact places where the very best view of each separate portion could be given, and but for his care we should have missed many fine points. It was very evident that the old man had studied the castle with some thing of an artist's eye, and was as proud of it as if it had been the noblest on earth. I wish I could give you his very words and make you see each spot he pointed out; but all I can do is to reproduce faintly enough, the impression his story made on me. We were standing in what had once been the lower or base court of the castle—(it is now a smooth lawn) The law range of buildings called Henry the Eighth's, because he had partly built them, and which used to enclose the inner court, and form the mass of buildings into a square, as all castles are arranged for safety's sake, is now gone entirely and no trace is left beyond a few of the foundation stones. Over to this the ruins formed three sides of a square, and side differing in style and age from the others. The on our right, as we stood facing the spot where Henry the Eighth's building once stood, is very massive and solid, having once had arched Norman windows, and bearing other evidence of nearly a date as the beginning of the eleventh century, but now with the square frame and Gothic tracery of Elizabeth's day which was the Earl's doings, in making it conform to his own notion. This is Edsor's, or the Norman Tower. History tells us that the manor of Kenilworth was given by Henry I. to Geoffrey de Clinton, one of his Norman barons, who built this tower, and in the possession of whose sons it remained for three generations. Next to these, forming the angle were the kitchen buildings, also gone entirely; and now rises up next, the Dungeon Tower, forming, with its narrow slits for windows and its heavy dull look, a great contrast to the architecture of the remainder. But little of this is left, and ivy has crowned it almost entirely; and of poor Amy Robsart's tower, close by there is only a window left, and we had not the satisfaction of knowing that it was the window belonging to her room—for this that is left is only the first story. Her room is entirely gone and our guide gave us a bit of the crumbling stone, which lay all about, telling us that it was probably one of those that formed her chamber. Sir Walter Scott, (to whose novel the gentleman continually refers, as the most authentic record of the castle and its life, in the Earl's time, and so it undoubtedly is,) says the towers were three stories high, and the second story poor Amy was concealed in, while the lower room (the one whose window we saw,) was used as part of the kitchen offices. It was then called Merwyn's Tower, from a legend that an unfortunate Welsh man of this name, had been there imprisoned and had there died, in Simon de Montfort's time. How could we flatter ourselves that we were looking upon the same scene that greeted Amy's eyes as she peeped cautiously out and saw the Queen and the Earl walking in the "Pleasaunce," and the garden. These are gone; and the beautiful lake that once nearly surrounded the walls, and the fine groves are no more here. Cromwell's soldiers cut down the trees, drained the lake and battered down all that they could, and now a fine field of grain is growing above the bed of the lake, and the gardens are all cut up by straight fences and are choked by weeds. Next to this and forming almost one side, is John of Gaunt's "Time-honored-Lancaster's" buildings. Although all crumbling and ivy-hung it is very beautiful, consisting of a fine dining-hall, with high Gothic windows, enough remains of which are left to show how grand they once were. From the back of these windows are very fine indeed. Their date is about the thirteenth century, and with their lights and yet strength they contrast most advantageously with the Norman part. Cromwell's soldiers were able to destroy all of this, but they broke away the flooring and part of the sides and roof, and made the whole place indefensible. But in so doing they doubtless added much to its picturesqueness, which was certainly far enough from their thoughts. Beneath this grand banqueting hall was the servants' hall, itself a fine room. And now we come to the apartments of the Queen in her sojourn here. From our curiosity is still more huffled, for amid these various odd rooms there is no certainty which one formed the bed-room of the old, hard-hearted Elizabeth. But some one of them must be the one, for our guide ventures to tell us that this little room was her breakfast chamber, (for she generally ate with the ladies only,) and that that queer shaped closet with its magnificent window, was her drawing-room; but I fear he is only practising upon our evident readiness to believe anything. Trusting to him, however, I have brought away a bit of ivy from Mervyn's Tower, and a wild rose from the top of the Queen's rooms.

From here we were shown into a vault below some of the ruins, which was used as a dungeon. A dark and gloomy enough it was. In the walls were the holes where once strong rings were fastened, to which the unhappy prisoners were chained, sometimes by both hands and feet, and sometimes they were kept in an upright position, against the hard wall for days and days. It was horrible to think of, and then remember all the mirth and festivity that was going on just above their heads, while they, as gentle blood, perhaps, were pining silently and slowly away. Barbarous as our time is, it cannot be as bad as those days of chivalry. Of Leicester's building, there are grand and lofty towers remaining, showing sufficient remnants of beauty and gorgeousness for our imaginations to picture out the rest. But the twittering of the swallow has taken the place of the sword and the trumpet, and the accord of musical instruments as each player tried to exceed the other in praise of the vain, fluttered, cruel Queen; and ivy has mantled the towers and draped the walls in folds of the rich and fantastic tapestry; and the fine [illegible] windows, with their delicate tracery, of Leicester's own drawing-room, are now crowned with moss and mildew, and owls flit in and out and swallows have made their nests in every nook. The whole scene is desolation, and the flitting images of knights and fair ladies, the pomp and pageantry of the court, the beautiful Amy and the handsome Earl die out in a mind, and give place to sad thoughts of the mutability of all human things, and the remembrance that we too, must fade away as these, in spite of their power to have done.

Twilight is settling down, and we step back to take a last look at each beautiful arch or wonderful window, and then silently turn to have a last view of the whole mass. How beautiful Lancaster's dining-hall is now, in the gray light, and what strength there is in Cæsar's Tower; and the ivy creeping over it, striving to hide, by its loving embraces, all the blemishes of time. Again and again we turn back, as we can scarcely turn altogether away from the dim, gray towers, so venerable with age and so honored for their old associations. As we walk on we are pointed to the site of the old tilt-yard, where the tournaments were held, and fancy again becomes truant and brings up vividly the images of the Queen and the Earl, Walter Raleigh and of Shakspeare, who may have been here, and of many other famous names; and as we drive away, our thoughts are strange admixtures of the past and present. But Amy Robsart is chief of all, and we sigh over her sad fate and almost rejoice in the desolution that has befallen this grand abode of her husband.

The history of Kenilworth is as varied as that of any old place here. At first, as I have told you, Henry I. gave the manor to Geoffrey de Clinton, who built the Cæsar Tower; his sons kept it for three generations. It then fell into John of Gaunt's hands, and when Henry Bolingbroke, his son, was banished by the king, Richard II., confiscated them; but [illegible]

After the restoration the old ruin and the ad...joining lands, which are very extensive, were given ...to Lawrence Hyde, and through him (either by mar...riage or in a direct line,) they have descended to the ...present Lord Carlisle, who keeps the place in order. ...On going back to Warwick we were shown, in the ...parish old Church, the tomb of the Earl and that of his ...first wife, who survived him; and their effigies the ...size of life, were resting on top, while above were the ...coat of arms and a long list of his titles, etc. Ano...ther, his brother, lies here, too. We were much ...more interested in the two to know that they were ...brothers to Lady Jane Gray's husband—that most un...fortunate Dudley. I must have done, but love still ...lingers over the remembrance of the visit as I did ...over the ruin itself. The impression such a grand ...wreck as this makes upon one who has never seen a ...palace before, is very much the same that an old church ...does before. Too tremble and hush your breath, and ...move in awe and reverence. Time's power and man's ...helplessness are brought forcibly to mind.

May my words give you at least a faint idea of this noble pile. If they do not, it will not be from want of trying. Yours, K.

For the N. O. Christian Advocate.

Tribute of Respect.

At the Third Quarterly Conference of the Baltimore this Circuit, Alabama Conference, held at Mount Hebo August 2d, 1856, the following preamble and resolutions were offered by Rev. J. W. Shores and unanimously adopted:

Whereas, In the dispensation of an All-wise Provi...dence our worthy Brother Jesse Horne, one of the Stewards of this Circuit, has been removed from our midst by death. Therefore, be it resolved by this, our Quarterly Conference,

1. That in the death of Bro. Jesse Horne his family have been sadly bereaved, the community in which he resided have lost a correct and valuable citizen, and the church a worthy member and faithful officer.

2. That his afflicted family are entitled to, and do receive, the kind condolence and christian attention of this Quarterly Conference.

3. That the foregoing be entered upon our journal, a copy be sent to the bereaved family, also to the Methodist Banner and New Orleans Christian Advocate for publication.

DEATHS.

Died—On the 14th July, 1856, in Newberne, Green County Alabama, Miss HANNAH HAZARD, aged about 50 years.

This estimable lady had been a member of the Methodist Church for near twenty years and had shown in a retired sphere the silent beauties of the christian life. Her hand was open to charity, her heart to God. The unmarried she was domestic and kind her happiness at home, in the house of a sister, with whom she walked the path of life for half century without separation.

One thing in her character illustrates the triumph of religion over death in a remarkable manner. She was by nature and habit of life, extremely timid of death, had avoided the sight of it and cherished a dread of it all through life. But when it came nigh her she was able to say, "O death, where is thy sting, and O grave, where is thy victory? For the sting of death is sin and the strength of sin is the law, but thanks be unto God who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ." Thus has our blessed Savior delivered one more of those "who through fear of death had been all their life time held in bondage." FRANCIS M. GRACE.

Died—On the 7th of June, in Madison county Miss., SAMUEL C. DIVINE.

The death of a good man is a public calamity whether he has held exalted stations or moved in the most unobserved retirement. His industry, frugality and piety as seen at his own fireside; his integrity and generosity as they are illustrated beyond the bounds of his household make him an example fit to be followed—a benefactor of his race. We owe it to the churches to treasure up the memories of such; to owe it to ourselves to become familliar with characters like these. Such an one was Samual C. Divine.

Bro. Divine was born in New York, Feb. 7. 1799.—His parents emigrated to Mississippi Territory in 1802. When a little child he was left an orphan and grew to manhood necustomed to all the privations and labors incident to the early settlers of this country. There was little to distinguish his early manhood.—He was temporate and moral showing a reverence for religion but like others learning it to be sought for later in life.

In 1837 he joined the Methodist church and was made the partaker of the regenerating grace of God at a Camp-meeting held in Madison county, Miss.—His after life was one of growth in grace and usefulness in the church. He divided his earnings with the poor and gave liborally to all the benevolent enterprizes of the church. The class and prayer meetings were to him places of peculiar interest and loving them he profited ever by them.

A very short time before his death, as he walked from the class room in company with his Presiding Elder, Rev. J. H. Harris, he said that he felt that his time was short; with no indication of disease it was strongly impressed upon him that his reward was nigh at hand and that no cloud sintervened. His trust was in God, and he had the witness of his adoption. Death found him waiting, his lamp trimmed and burning. The language of triumph was upon his lips as he ceased to speak to the friends who wept for themselves and his shout of victory is mingling now with the songs of the redeemed.

If the uttered and felt sympathy of the vast multitude who bore him to the place of burial can soften the anguish of a widowed heart or give comfort and hope to children bereaved of a father. The sad mother and her children have been lightened of much of the burden of sorrow which has been laid upon them for "he was a good man and full of the Holy Ghost," and the church and the community love the character and revere the memory of the man who filling all the stations of life was an Israelite indeed, in whom was no galle. WATKINS.

Died—On the 20th of August, 1856, at the residence of Thos. W. Brown, near Rocky Springs, Claiborne county, Miss., MARY GEORGE, infant daughter of Rev. Dr. Thos. H. and Sarah R. Capers. Aged 2 years and 2 months.

Died—On the 11th of July, 1856, HENRY CLINTON, son of Edward E. and Mary E. Satchel. Aged 8 years.

"Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven.

MORTALITY IN NORTHERN CITIES.—In the city of New York there were 651 deaths during the week ending on the 17th inst. In Baltimore there were 175 during the same period; in Philadelphia there were 334; in Boston 102.

CLOSE OF THE SESSION—KANSAS PROVISO.

The following is the clause attached to the Army Appropriation bill by the Freesoilers and Abolitionists in the House of Representatives, which was rejected by the Senate, and which finally eventuated in the loss of the bill, compelling the President to issue a proclamation convening an extra session of Congress:

Provided, however, It is hereby declared, that no part of the military force of the United States, for the support of which appropriations are made by this act, shall be employed in aid of any enforcement of any enactment of the body claiming to be the Territorial Legislature of Kansas, until such enactments shall have been affirmed and approved by Congress; but this proviso shall not be so construed as to prevent the President employing adequate military force; but it shall be his duty to employ such force to prevent the invasion of said Territory by armed bands of non residents, or any other body of non-residents, acting or claiming to act as a quasi committee of any others in said Territory in the enforcement of any such enactment, and to protect the persons and property therein, and upon the fullest and most extensive legal information, from all unlawful searches and seizures; and it shall be his further duty to take efficient measures to compel the return of and withhold all arms of the United States distributed to or to said Territory, in pursuance of any law of the United States authorizing the distribution of arms to the States and Territories.

The Senate regarded this proviso as an improper restriction on the constitutional prerogatives of the President, as commander-in-chief of the army, and accordingly rejected it. The House of Representatives persisted in it, and the disagreement was referred to two or three successive committees of conference, in the hope that the difficulty might be reconciled, but without avail. The Freesoilers fought for the proviso with a zeal and pertinucity worthy an honest cause. At half-past 11 o'clock, on the evening of the 18th inst.,—the hour of adjournment having been fixed at 12—Mr. Wilson, of Virginia, apprehensive that the bill might be lost for want of time, moved a suspension of the rules to enable him to offer a resolution extending the session two hours. To suspend the rules requires a vote of two-thirds. A two-third vote could not be got in favor of the proposition; and, precisely at 12 o'clock, Mr. Speaker Banks declared the House adjourned.

Such a thing has never before happened in our national legislature; and, it is to be earnestly hoped, will never happen again. The refusal of the House to vote indispensable supplies to the Army is the first step in the path which leads to actual revolution, for it practically nullifies the constitution and renders nugatory the Executive Department of the Government. The Constitution directs that the President shall see the laws faithfully executed; and to enable him to execute those laws, in case of resistance, has placed the military arm of the country at his disposal.—The army cannot exist without supplies are appropriated, and must disband, leaving the President powerless to the due and prompt execution of the laws of the confederacy. Let the doctrine sought to be forced on the people by the fanatical advocates of the above proviso obtain generally, and what inevitably follows? Why, that no unscrupulous opposition in the House of Representatives may at any time render our Government nugly-ward and a reproach—a nothingness and a shadow. If they can disband the Army by refusing supplies, they can disband the Navy by refusing supplies—may break up the Federal Judiciary by declining to make the appropriations necessary to its support—may deprive us of representation in foreign countries, by refusing to pass the Civil and Diplomatic Bill—may, in fine, upset the whole Government and render our matchless constitution as worthless as a sheet of waste paper.

These are considerations to which we invoke the profound attention of all classes of our countrymen, especially those residing above Mason and Dixon's line. If a reckless majority to the House of Representatives can thwart the Senate, and render neuter the constitutional authority of the President, as in the above recited case, it is high time some radical alterations were made in our national charter. Any system of government, no matter how despotic, would be preferable to the horrible tyranny and confusion inevitable to the carrying out of the infamous principle embodied in the late action of the House of Representatives.

Were we to speak as sectionalists, we would not care a fig about the defeat of the Army Appropriation bill in a pecuniary sense. The sums sought to be appropriated amount to twelve or fourteen millions of dollars, about ten-twelfths of which are expended in Northern States and Territories. From this vast expenditure of money the South derives little or no benefit, although she contributes a large proportion of it. By defeating the bill, the Freesoilers will injure their own section infinitely more than the South; and but for the dangerous principle involved, we would not care how often they played at the game of biting off their noses to spite their faces.

That the bill will fail, notwithstanding the extra session, seems quite evident. On Saturday, according to telegraphic dispatches published yesterday morning, the Senate, by a decisive vote, refused to recede from its position; and although Senator Clayton's resolution for the appointment of a joint committee at conference probably passed yesterday, it is unlikely it will emount to anything.

So it is quite possible the mightiest nation of modern times will shortly be without the shadow of an army, and the first officiel personage of the Republic left without the means to execute the laws, protect our frontiers, or discharge his duties! However, "we shall see whet we shall see."

ANOTHER ACCIDENT ON THE JACKSON RAILROAD—Several Persons Injured.—Yesterday morning, while the passenger train was going up it met with a serious accident when about one hundred yards from the Tangapaho station. It appears from the account given by the passengers, that a cow was on the track, and the conductor, finding it impossible either to scare her off with his whistle or to stop the train in time, was forced to let it run over her. The engine struck her, throwing her to one side of the track, and the train was passing on in safety, when, unfortunately, the cow, in her efforts to get up again, got in the way, and the rest of the train ran over her, breaking all their couplings and throwing the last car off the track. This car ran some forty or fifty feet over the cross ties and the bank, when it suddenly swerved to one side and went completely over. There were some twenty-five or thirty passengers in it at the time, nearly all of whom were more or less injured; none seriously, however, which, we are informed by persons who were in the car, seems miraculous, as the wheels were thrown one way and the body of the car another, the windows and doors being completely smashed up.

Accidents of this nature are becoming alarmingly frequent on this road. It would be well for the Company to institute a very strict inquiry into the causes, and if any are guilty of carelessness or neglect of duty, let an example be made.

PROGRESS OF RELIGION.—The "Presbyterian Critic" has an article from the Rev. Dr. Stuart Robinson, in which it is stated that, "after a careful comparison and summing up of the religious statistics of the various denominations, the Evangelical Bodies of the United States now number 30,000 ministers, 4,000,000 of church members, 15,500,000 connected by education and sympathy with them, $70,000,000 invested in church property, $20,000,000 annually raised for the support of ordinances at home, $4,000,000 for the spread of the church abroad, and 12,000,000 of sittings in their houses of worship. In this estimate no account is taken of the many millions of dollars invested in schools, colleges and seminaries, under the control of Evangelical denominations. Thus it appears that, out of a population estimated at 26,500,000, nearly two-thirds of the whole are members in full communion or under the direct influence of Evangelical churches."

DUTY ON SUGAR REDUCED.—The Emperor of Russia has acceded to the recommendation of the Minister of Finance to reduce the import duty on sugar. For the space of six years, starting from the 1st (13th) of August of this year, the duty on all sorts of raw sugar imported by way of sea is to be reduced to three rubles per pound. The excise duty on beet root sugar is, however, to remain unaltered during the same period.

We learn from a dispatch dated Portland, Maine, August 18th, that on the day previous, the Cumberland train of cars ran over a wagon, immediately killing two little girls and fatally injuring a boy,—all children of a Mr. Falmouth.

Facts cannot be questioned, when the people of any country bear testimony as in the case of Dr. J. HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS. Not only have we the individual evidence of the land, but almost every paper in the Union is commenting upon the great benefit derived from the use of these celebrated Bitters; besides various diplomas awarded them. These are all weighty facts that cannot help but convince the most credulous that it is at least worthy of trial. For dyspepsia in any form, these Bitters are a certain cure when used as per directions on bottle. For sale by Alexander Norton & Co., 21 Poydras street; Cady & Holmes, 7 Gravier street. au30 1t

THE WAR IN KANSAS.

PROPERTY DESTROYED—HOUSES BURNT.

Lecompton Deserted by Gov. Shannon and Citizens.

SECRETARY WOODSON AND SHERIFF JONES PRISONERS.

Extensive Preparations for War.

BY THE SOUTHERN AND NATIONAL LINES.

St. Louis, August 22.—The correspondent of the Republican, writing under date of the 19th, says that Gov. Shannon and nearly all of the citizens of Lecompton have deserted the place.

Secretary Woodson's house was burned, and he was a prisoner.

Sheriff Jones was also in the hands of the Free Sollers.

The house of Gen. Clark, the Indian Agent, was burned, and himself and family detained as prisoners.

Extensive preparations are being made for war everywhere.

A steamer had arrived with three companies of volunteers, ready for the field.

Three companies of cavalry and one of artillery intended leaving Leavenworth city on the 19th. A bloody conflict is daily expected.

St. Louis, August 23.—Advices from Kansas state that the excitement in Jackson, Clay and Lafayette counties, Missouri, is intense. Three thousand men are expected to take the field in a few days.

The dragoons had prevented an attack on Lecompton.

Shannon had gone to Lawrence.

St. Louis, August 21.—We have reliable intelligence from Kansas to the 20th. Lecompton had not yet been attacked by Lane, though a movement on his part was hourly expected.

The Freesoilers have made fortifications near Lecompton, to serve in case of a repulse.

Four hundred volunteers have gone to Kansas from Jackson county, and large forces are being raised in other counties.

Robinson and Brown are still in custody. General Smith has ordered all disposable forces to prepare for service.

A call is published here signed by a large number of our most influential citizens for a meeting on Monday night to consider Kansas affairs.

Death of a Congressman.

MIDDLEBURY, Vt., August 23.—Meacham, member of Congress from this District, died this morning of congestion of the brain.

Congressional.

WASHINGTON, August 23.—Senate.—The Senate adhered to the amendment to the Army bill, by a vote of 35 to 33. [This is a palpable error—the vote was probably 35 to 19. Eds. Crescent.]

The bill is undoubtedly killed. Clayton offered a resolution for a joint committee of conference, which lies over until Monday.

House.—The House tabled a resolution restoring the Missouri compromise by a vote of 101 to 83.

The House took the former Army bill from the table, and adhered to its amendment by 98 to 97.

Yellow Fever at Charleston.

COLUMBIA, S. C., August 21.—It is reported here to-day, by private advices, that there is a large increase in the number of cases of yellow fever at Charleston.

Domestic Markets.

NEW YORK, August 23.—Flour is still improving. Ohio $6 50 to $6 75; Southern, $7 to $8. Wheat has advanced. Southern Red, $1 57; Western White, $1 61. Western Mixed Corn, 66c. Mess Pork, $19 25. Whisky, 33½c. Sterling Exchange, 9½.

NEW YORK, August 23.—Cotton is firm with sales of 800 bales. Freights heavy. Sales of 1,000 bbls. Spirits Turpentine at 41c.

CINCINNATI, August 23.—Flour, $5 70 to $5 00. Whisky, 26c.

THREE DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE

ARRIVAL OF THE NIAGARA AT HALIFAX.

NEW YORK, August 25.—The Royal Mail steam ship Niagara, from Liverpool on the afternoon of the 16th, arrived at Halifax (en route for Boston) this evening.

The Cunard steamer Persia arrived aut at Liverpool on Friday night, 15th.

Commercial.

COTTON.—There has been no change in the market since the departure of the North American.

The sales of the week amounted to 37,000 bales. The market closing dull.

LIVERPOOL, Aug. 16.—The sales yesterday amounted to 6,000 bales, the market closing dull; Orleans Fair, 7d.; Uplands Fair, 6¼d.; Orleans Tres Ordinaire, (at Havre,) 98.

BREADSTUFFS.—Our Manchester advices quote the market as generally unchanged. Better grades of Wheat are 2d higher. Flour is unchanged, with a moderate business doing. Corn is 6d higher.

The supplies of breadstuffs are small. Ohio Flour 33s. to 34s. Southern 30s.

Beef is dull, with a declining tendency; Pork is dull; Lard—prices are unchanged, but little business doing.

The weather has been favorable for agricultural purposes, and our accounts of the grain crops are generally favorable.

Monetary.

The money market is tighter. Consols, for money, are quoted at 95¼ to 95¾.

The bullion in the bank of England had increased £62,000.

The news by the Niagara is of little importance.

Our dispatches contain absolutely nothing in the shape of news.

The affair of the Isle of Serpents turns out to be a mountain manufactured out of a molehill.

Spain is quiet.

The crops throughout Great Britain will be fully average.

CONGRESSIONAL.

BY THE SOUTHERN AND NATIONAL LINES.

WASHINGTON, August 26.—Senate.—Crittenden gave notice of his intention to introduce a bill to alter and amend the Kansas Nebraska act.

Weller introduced a bill to abrogate certain laws of the Kansas Legislature, including test oaths.

Wilson offered an amendment for abolishing the laws of said Legislature in relation to slaves and slavery—for the release of persons charged with treason—providing for the election in November, and for the punishment of illegal voters. Some debate ensued but no action was taken.

House.—The Special Committee on the McCullen and Granger cases, reported no further action necessary.

Domestic Markets.

NEW YORK, August 26.—Cotton is dull, with sales to-day of 500 bales.

NEW YORK, Aug. 26.—Flour is lower; State is quoted at $6 to $6 25. Wheat has declined; Western Red $1 56; Southern White $1 67. Mixed Corn 62c. Whisky 34c.

CINCINNATI, Aug. 26.—Flour is higher, and selling at $5 90 to $6. Whisky 26c. Lard 12c, Molasses 55c.

Mr. Delano, one of the editors of the London Times, has arrived in New York. Everybody leaves London for an excursion in August and September, the steadiest months in the London year. Instead of bolting over to the continent, where all the world goes every year, to the same places and over the same road, Mr. Delano, like a man of sense, means to have a peep at Yankeedom. The Times is a vast affair, with as many editors as there are departments. The political department is under Mr. Delano. It is he who is commander-in-chief of those famous leading articles that are read all over the world. He never writes a line, but he must read every word before published, and nothing appears he does not mark orthodox.

Hon. Robert Lowe, M. P., and Vice President of the London Board of Trade, arrived in New York on Wednesday from Boston. He came out in the Canada to pass the Parliamentary vacation. Mr. Lowe is also believed to be one of the conductors of the London Times.

Fate of the Nautilus.

We have been favored by Mr. John Price with the following report of the loss of the Nautilus, taken by himself from James Frisbee, who arrived here yesterday morning in charge of Mr. Cooper, on the F. M. Streck:

The United States mail steamship Nautilus, Capt. J. S. Thompson, sailed from Brazos, St. Jago direct for New Orleans at about 7 o'clock, A. M., Thursday, 7th inst., with fine weather and a smooth sea. At about 3 or 4 o'clock in the afternoon I informed Capt. Thompson that having an unusually large number of passengers, and being short of ice, thought the fresh provisions would spoil. He immediately changed his course for Galveston, the weather continuing fine, and about 12 M. on Friday, the 8th, made the High Islands about 30 miles to the east of Galveston, and arrived at Galveston, at the Brick wharf, about 4 o'clock, P. M., and discharged several cabin passengers, three ladies and three or more gentlemen, among them Capt. Blakely, formerly of the steamer Swan, of Brazos, and one woman, a steerage passenger. We lay at Galveston about one hour—just long enough to allow me time to procure the necessary articles; and after taking on board about 25 passengers and the mails, we got under way and proceeded to sea; crossed the bar about half-past 5 o'clock, P. M., and shaped her course for the S. W. Pass, with fine weather, which continued until Saturday, the 9th. When we left Galveston the latter ports were open fore and aft, when, at about 5 o'clock, a fresh breeze sprung up, from the N. E.; closed the lower portion of the ports; at 7, P. M. made Ship Island Shoal light, passing inside of the Shoal; wind increasing from the same quarter all night, with a heavy sea. On Sunday, at about 8 A. M., the wind had increased to a heavy gale, (could not get down in the between-decks to close the upper ports, but lowered them down,) and a heavy sea, with heavy rain. The ship was kept head to sea as long as possible, and, finding no other resource, Captain T. attempted to wear ship; got into the trough of the sea, and would not wear. He then had the main mast cut away and the vessel listed over to the starboard, the bulk head in the between decks gave way, and all of the stock fetched away to the leeward, (the foremast blowing away at the same time) which caused the ship to lay over on her broad side.

I then went up on deck, and after standing there a few minutes holding on to the weather-rail, I saw the passengers coming on deck. I then looked forward and saw Capt. T. coming aft as if to notify the passengers that the ship was in danger; immediately after which she capsized—the passengers and crew endeavoring at the same time to get on her bottom. Some six or eight succeeded, and immediately after a heavy sea struck her and washed them off. I swam off a distance and found a piece of the wreck, on which I got, and looking back to the wreck I saw a few persons on her bottom, after which I saw no more of her, having drifted out of sight. I saw about twenty-five or thirty persons in the water around me holding on to parts of the wreck, among whom were Mr. J. T. Kerr, the purser, Mr. Giles, the first mate, Chas. Desaulzier, the second engineer, Mr. McGill, the second clerk, and a number of the crew, but did not see Capt. T. After floating about half an hour I fell in with Mr. Johnson, the chief engineer, on a large piece of the wreck. I then got on with Mr. Johnson, the piece I had not being sufficient to buoy me up. I asked him if he had seen Capt. T.; he said he had not. We were together two days and nights. On the third day Mr. Johnson became delirious, and notwithstanding my utmost endeavors to keep him on the wreck, he either fell off or jumped off while my back was turned, and was drowned, despite my continued efforts to save him. I then saw two persons, one of whom I supposed to be the first mate, on a part of the wreck, and the other a short distance from him on a large log with roots. I saw another person, who I think was Mrs. John Wells, a passenger from Brazos. The next day I missed the man that I supposed to be the mate, and on the fourth day, being near the log, had my piece going to pieces, I jumped overboard and swam to the log, but before I reached it, the person that was on it fell overboard, and I saw him no more. I then got on the log, and on the next day picked up a panel door belonging to the wreck and laid it on the roots, on which I slept occasionally, and on Monday, the 18th, was picked up by a boat from the F. M. Streck—not having had anything to eat or drink for eight days but about half a pint of water, which I caught in one of the panels of the door during a shower on Sunday, the 17th. I had nothing on at the time I was picked up, but the waist of my pants, the rest having been washed off of me. When I first saw the yawl I could not wait for her to reach me, but jumped overboard and swam towards her, and was taken on board the schooner Jane Elizabeth, and removed from her to the F. M. Streck, where I was kindly trented.

RECOVERY OF MARE OF THE SUPPOSED LOST.—Further Disasters by the Gale.—We yesterday afternoon received notes from Messrs. H. E. Lawrence and A. R. Ragan, by the Opelousas Railroad, from which we are much gratified to learn of the safety of Mr. and Mrs. A. M. Foley, of Lafourche. Mr. Wm. Rochelle and a negro servant of Mrs. Hlue's, and one or two other servants. These persons were found in the marsh by the vicinity of Last Island, where they had subsisted on crabs, crawfish and rainwater since the storm.

Mr. Rochelle and one of the negroes came up to Berwick's Bay, and brought this intelligence. Mr. and Mrs. Foley were in the house of Mr. Miller, on Bayou DeLarge, with the others. Mr. Foley had received a slight injury on the shoulder; the others were not injured, but much exhausted by their sufferings.

A steamer left Berwick's Bay on Saturday evening for Mr. Miller's, for the purpose of bringing the persons there up to Mr. Brashear's, at Berwick's Bay, and a company was to have started yesterday or today with a steamer to search the whole coast and adjacent marshes, it being believed that there are yet many persons on the islands or in the marshes, who may be found. We shall await further intelligence from there with much anxiety.

We are informed by a correspondent at Iberville, Parish of Vermillion, that the storm raged there on the 10th and 11th with terrific violence. Every house in the village was leveled to the ground; trees were torn up by the roots and blown to great distances, even the tomb stones in the grave yard were thrown down and broken up. Several persons were injured in the village, but none killed. In the vicinity, sugar houses and dwellings, negro houses and barns, were all blown down and strewed about the fields, and we were pained to learn that five persons were killed by the falling of houses upon them. The crops, as might be expected, have suffered terribly, and it was thought that they were irretrievably ruined. Immense numbers of stock have been scattered and killed. It will take the planters a long time to recover from the effects of this gale, though they are said to bear up like true men under this severe visitation of Providence.

TEHUANTEPEC.—We are indebted for the following extract from a letter from Capt. W. C. Flanders to his brother in New Orleans, dated—

"Suchi, Aug. 14, 1856.—The road progresses rapidly, and will probably be crossed over by wagons by the middle of November from this place to the Pacific Ocean. Very few Americans are at work upon the road, but many natives, who are useful upon this work. Although this is considered the rainy season, still we have but little rain, and the river is nearly at its lowest stage, which at this season is said not to have been the case for many years. I occasionally hang upon a hand bar a day or two upon a stretch, but considering the stage of water and draft of the boat, everything goes as well as could be expected. One thing is certain, our's is the phaeer boat on this river, as no steamer has ever ascended it before."

AMERICAN SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION.—The report for 1856 has just been printed. The Society, during the last year, has employed 303 Sunday-School Missionaries, of whom 179 were "Student Missionaries." They labored in 25 different States and Territories, and organized 2,528 new Sunday Schools, having 16,470 teachers and 104,532 scholars; and visited and aided 3,320 schools, having 24,902 teachers and 173,191 scholars. The value of books gratuitously distributed during the year is $19,550 55. During the last five years the missionaries and agents of the Society organized 10,360 new schools, enlisting 65,600 teachers, and 400,000 scholars; and visited and aided 13,500 schools. Rev. Messrs. R. B. Campfield and S. H. S. Bissell, 59 Chambers street, are the district secretaries, and will take charge of donations for the Society.

Later from Texas.

The steamship Perseverance, Henry Sheppard commander, from Indianola and Galveston on the 23d inst., arrived here yesterday morning.

The Perseverance brought up the mails of the steamship Texas, that vessel being detained at the quarantine.

The following named persons were passengers on the Perseverance:

Mr. Sheppard and lady, T. Gonzales, F. Gonzales, Mr. Ognas, M. A. Conner, G. H. Lee, E. K. Bird, Mr. Alle and son, Col. Sharp, Mr. Schutz, M. Pickler, J. M. Moore, Mr. Henderson, Mr. Mitchell, Mr. Peckham, Messrs. Stevenson, Bonner, Jeffries, Capt. Compton, U. S. A.; Maj. Belyre, U. S. A.; Col. Mansfield, U. S. A.—37 on deck.

By the arrival of the Perseverance we have received papers from Galveston up to the 23d, and from Indianola to the 22d inst.

The Galveston Civilian says:

We are pleased to learn that young Bossatt, who was reported among the passengers lost by the Nautilus, was not on board that vessel. He had left by the previous steamer.

The list in our extra was made up from information collected here, and did not purport to be complete, as we had no means of procuring the names of all the passengers from the Rio Grande, of whom there were a number.

Capt. Jerry Smith, of Galveston, was one of the owners of the Nautilus. He had been offered $10,000 for his interest a short time previous to the storm. His policy of insurance expired on the 1st inst., and up to this morning he was uninformed as to whether it had been renewed.

MURDER IN SUMTER.—The same paper makes the following extract from a letter dated Sumpter, Trinity county, August 13th:

Our little village, on Friday morning, 8th inst., was the scene of an awful murder. Col. Adams deliberately shot and killed a man by the name of Matthew Tyler, whilst he was sitting in McAlpin's house. H. T. Barker, G. V. Mangum, Dr. Harrison and A. J. Adams, were all implicated. Justice Caldwell had been three days investigating the case. Mangum and Harrison were acquitted. Barker held to bail in the sum of one thousand dollars. The two Adams' have made their escape, and so far there is no tidings of them.

The Indianola Bulletin, of the 22d, says:

There is a general moving mania taking place among our up-town citizens. Two or three houses per day may be seen on their way towards Powderhorn. A general concentration is taking place—Lower Indianola begins to look like a large town already. A new wharf is about to be built—vessels can carry the same depth of water to Powderhorn as there is on the bar, and there will be no occasion to call for State aid "to knock the bottom out of the bay," as any attempt to keep a channel open above this point, where there is so much quick sand which fills up the channels during a gale, would require the whole amount now in our treasury.

The same paper says:

The two houses of our State Legislature have passed their mileage and per diem over the veto of the Governor.

ASYLUM FOR THE BLIND.—We take great pleasure, says the Austin State Times, in stating that a bill for the establishment of an asylum for the blind in this city has passed both houses of the Legislature; the sum of $10,000 is appropriated.

It appears from a statement in the Telegraph that two miles of the Houston-Tap Road have been completed.

The San Antonio Ledger, of the 16th instant, says:

The weather still continues to be excessively hot. During the week we had several slight showers, but not enough to do much service. The effect of the drouth upon the crops has been ruinous—the health of the city is wonderfully good.

The same paper says that the preliminary examination of J. M. Devine for the killing of J. L. McDonald was concluded last Friday. It continued four days, many witnesses were examined, and the testimony was somewhat conflicting. Judge Heraphill presided. Devine was bound over in the sum of $5,000 to appear at the next term of the district court. There was no unnecessary excitement during the trial, and all seemed desirous of abiding by the course of law.

FATAL AFFRAY.—Last Sunday evening, says the Victoria Advocate, of the 16th instant, a difficulty occurred between John Williams, an Irishman, and Henry Miller, a German, hands employed at a brickyard in this town, when the former stabbed the latter, and killed him on the spot. Williams is in jail to await his trial. The act was committed under the influence of partial intoxication.

The Bastrop Advertiser, of the 16th, says that they have not had any rain in that region, with the exception of a slight shower, since the 10th of May. The crops have suffered dreadfully in consequence, and it was supposed that many of the planters would not make corn enough to furnish them with bread, and that cotton will not yield half a crop.

We learn from the same paper that a most dastardly attempt had been made to murder Mr. T. J. Middleton, a peaceable resident of the neighborhood of Bastrop. The assassin shot at Mr. M. from an ambush, as he passed, luckily missing him, but killing his horse instantly and wounding a hired man who was with him. It was not known who it was that made this attempt, although Mr. Middleton suspected two persons.

The Brenham Enquirer says the scarcity of water is so great in Burleson county that a number of families have encamped at a large spring near the Yegua. Stock is said to suffer for the want of water.

OUTRAGEOUS RECKLESSNESS.—When the steamship Arabia sailed from Halifax for Liverpool she was leaking at the rate of 18 tons of water per hour. This was caused by her having run on to a rock, during a fog, when on her up trip from Boston. By this accident she lost her false and main keels, and garboard as far aft as the mainmast, and suffered other injuries of a serious nature in her hull.

That she should have proceeded to sea under the circumstances, is extraordinary, and shows an amount of reckless carelessness for human life which cannot be too strongly condemned.

Many of the passengers left her, and it is reported that many more would have done so, but their baggage was detained; why we do not understand.

The Messager du Midi mentions the recent discovery, among the archives of the Parish Church of Apt, (Vaucluse,) of three interesting manuscripts connected with the musical art, and particularly church singing. Two of these manuscripts, without date, are written in dots, as was the custom before the 11th century. The third bears the date of 1,000, and the marks of the notes are there connected by a red line. On of the pieces is a night mass for Holy Saturday.

It appears from the national balance sheet of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland that in the year ending the 30th June, 1856, the excess of expenditures over income was £21,569,402. The gross income was £70,283,778. The whole revenue derived from customs was not sufficient to pay the interest and expenses of management of the permanent debt. More than half the revenue was derived from excise, stamps, property tax, post-office, etc.

The Canadian Government has granted four million acres of land to aid in constructing a railroad from Quebec to Montreal, along the north shore of the St. Lawrence, to the city of Ottawa, and thence to Sault Ste. Marie. This road is to be completed in five years.

☞ We learn by the arrival of the steamer Texas, from Last Island, that fifty-six bodies have been recovered and buried; also, jewelry has been found to the amount of some $7,000 or $8,000. Among the bodies which were found, were recognized those of Capt. Gasper Ratier and Madame Rantlrop, from Attakapas. The rest were unknown by the persons on the steamer.

MURDER BY A WIFE BY HER HUSBAND.—We copy from the Canton (Miss.) Commonwealth, the following particulars of a most awful homicide which took place near that town:

Henry J. Osborn, residing in this county about five miles from Canton, was arrested on Saturday last, the 16th inst., for the murder of his wife. It appears from the evidence elicited on his examination, that Osborn had been in town during Saturday last, and on his return in the evening a quarrel ensued between himself and wife, when in a moment of passion he knocked her down and kicked her, causing death almost instantaneously.

Osborn was examined before Esquires Priestly and Whitcomb, and fully committed to await his trial at the next term of the Circuit Court, on a charge of murder.

THE SECONDS OF ETERNITY.—Prof. Mitchell in one of his recent lectures, describing the gradual tendency of the earth's orbit to assume a circular form, used the following magnificent illustration:

"Its short diameter was gradually lengthening and would continue so to expand until it should become perfectly circular, when it would again contract to its original shape and dimensions. And so the earth would vibrate periodically, and these periods were measured by millions upon millions of years. Thus," said Prof. M., "the earth will continue to swing back and forth, and to and fro in the heavens, like a great pendulum beating the seconds of eternity."

There was a very severe storm of rain and wind on the Hudson river, during the 19th and 20th insts. The river rose very rapidly on the night of the 20th, and overflowed the banks at Albany, carrying off thirty-six houses. Great damage had been done to the crops and bridges by this storm.

Later from Mexico.

The steamship Texas, Thomas Forbes commander, from Vera Cruz, arrived at the quarantine station on Monday morning, where she was detained and her mails were brought up by the steamship Perseverance yesterday.

The Texas reports the Tehuantepec Company's steamer Ledhorn as having arrived at Vera Cruz on the 20th inst., from Coatzacoalcos, and that the British steam frigate Tartar was anchored at Sacrificios.

By the Texas we have received papers from the city of Mexico to the 16th and from Vera Cruz to the 21st inst., from which we compile the following summary of Mexican intelligence:

The fifteenth article of the new constitution, which declares religious toleration, was voted down in Congress on the 5th inst. The article therefore goes back to the Convention for revision.

The bark Rebecca Adams, which was supposed to be lost in the Pacific, arrived safely at Acapulco on the 27th ult.

It was reported that there was a great deal of suffering in Acapulco among the poor, corn being very scarce and was selling at enormous prices. Besides the poor of the place, there was a number of Americans there that were connected with the Zerman expedition. Their condition is described as being most deplorable—utterly destitute and almost naked.

The law relating to the sale of the estates of the corporations is said to be succeeding well in Oajaca. The Constituyente, of the 31st July, in its report of the sales, mentions six large estates which have been purchased by the tenants; and at Colima the law had been well received by the people, and provision had already been made for the sales.

A man and a woman were publicly executed in Monterey, on the 18th ult., for murder.

The Mexican Extraordinary, of the 16th inst., says:

During the week Congress has done little or nothing, for the want of a quorum most of the time.

From the country the advices are of the most favorable character. Everything seems to be going ahead in the right manner. We have not received a paper from the States without its being filled with thanks to the Government for the law for the sale of corporation and church properties. This law will certainly be carried out.

From the revolutionary sections of the Republic there is nothing to cause serious apprehensions. In Sonora a revolution has been nipped in the bud and was ended before it had commenced. Vidaurri will undoubtedly be compelled to abandon his project and leave the country, and Col. Sayas, with his three hundred men will, if he gets his deserts, find a balm for his disease in a straight jacket.

The Mexican Government issued a decree on the 2d inst., granting to Col. Albert C. Ramsey the privilege to construct a railroad from Anton Lizardo, in the Gulf of Mexico, to Acapulco, on the Pacific Ocean.

On the 5th inst. there was the sum of one dollar and forty-nine cents in the National Treasury of Mexico.

A plan was on foot in the city of Mexico to construct various lines of railroad from that city to different towns in the Valley of Mexico. The first line is to be one to Tacubaya; afterwards lines will be run on to Coatrenas, San Augustin and other places. As Elbow Room.

There's room enough for all
In this wide world of ours;
Room for the rich, the sad, the poor,
For weeds as well as flowers;
Room from each nook to do
Or life's swift working loom.
Ye timid ones! flash down your fears,
Battle for "Elbow Room."

Say not your lofty lot
"Gives little good to do."
The path of duty lies, I wot,
Much, much work for you.
The lowliest, meanest plight
Perfects the tiny thews;
Man's worst estate is better far—
Then claim your "Elbow Room."

Rest thou the toiler on?
Work while "tis called to-day;"
Thou knowest not what day or hour
Thy Master seeks his pay.
Had not one talent, friend?
Bury it not and doom
Who hid his talent from the light—
And striven for "Elbow Room."

Up, Laborers, to your task!
The sun rides high in Heaven,
The hours fly in moments by,
Soon pass the years we're given.
The fields and hands that work
Know least of bitter gloom—
Then Sisters! Brothers! dare and do
To win your "Elbow Room."

Thirty-Fourth Congress—First Session.

WASHINGTON, Aug. 16, 1856.—Senate.—The Senate passed the House bill extending the time for Texas creditors to present their claims to the Treasury, and postponed till the third Monday in December the House bill for the settlement of the claims of officers of the Revolution, and of the widows and orphans of those who died in the service. They resolved that when the Senate adjourns to-day, it will adjourn to meet on Monday morning at 9 o'clock, for the consideration only of the appropriation bills, House bills, and those to which there may be disagreement between the two houses.

House.—The House passed the Ocean mail appropriation bill with an amendment—passed by 119 majority—providing for giving notice of the termination of compensation to the Collins line. Also passed thirty-two Senate private bills, and the Senate bill extending copyright to dramatic authors. The House took a recess.

WASHINGTON, August 18.—Senate.—The chair submitted a message from the President in answer to a resolution calling for Col. Fremont's accounts of his receipts and disbursements as an officer of the Government.

Several private bills were passed.

The report of the Committee of Conference on the Civil Appropriation bill was agreed to by both houses. It gives $50,000 for the Washington Aqueduct, settles the Baltimore Post-office controversy by appropriating $300,000 for the same, and providing for the selection of a site by a commission, including the Exchange building contract. The proviso that the construction of all public buildings, except for defensive purposes, be under civil superintendence was stricken out.

The House bill establishing a Naval Depot at Brunswick, Georgia, was postponed till next session.

Mr. Toombs, from the Conference Committee on the Army bill, reported that they were unable to agree, and moved that the Senate adhere to its disagreement and notify the House thereof. He thought there was no chance of an agreement, and was willing to let the responsibility rest where they belong.

Mr. Clayton wanted to leave the door open till the last moment. It was yet possible there would be an agreement. So long as there was the slightest hope of that result, he wanted to use conciliation, and he hoped the word "insist" would be substituted for "adhere."

Mr. Mason said he was willing to adhere, for he saw no chance of an agreement. He was in favor of meeting the enemy on the threshold.

Mr. Seward thought that must be figurative language, for the enemy of whom the Senator from Virginia spoke was the House of Representatives—a coordinate branch of the national Legislature—that body was in no sense the enemy of the Senate; with all deference to the Senator from Virginia public sentiment was, in his opinion, the friend of constitutional law and the principles on which our Government is founded.

Mr. Clayton said that if the bill was lost the army must be disbanded, or they could not be paid and fed. In that case it would be the duty of the President to call an extra session immediately.

Mr. Toombs consented to change his motion and let it be "the Senate insist." He said the argument had been told out that the army must be disbanded if the bill failed. Let it be disbanded, but keep the constitution for the protection of the people.

The motion to insist was agreed to—yeas 39, nays 12.

Mr. Bell, with reference to the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs in the case of L. Bartlett, which has been understood to reflect upon his character, stated that it was not the intention of the committee to express any opinion pro or con, but merely to spread before the country the evidence in an impartial manner without drawing conclusions.

The Senate then went into a resolution agreeing to extend the session till 5 o'clock, seven Senators only voting in the negative.

Mr. Slidell moved the vacancy occasion by the death of Mr. Mildred, Missouri, be sworn in.

The Speaker laid before the House a letter from Mr. Richardson, of Illinois, saying that he had resigned his seat.

Mr. Stanton, rising to a question of privilege, offered a resolution that a committee of five be appointed to investigate the charges made by Mr. Granger by Mr. McMullen this morning, and report their action to the House on the second Monday of December.

Mr. Cobb, of Georgia, made great objections, raised a point of order that no question of privilege was in order after the fact that the four remaining minutes of the morning hour were consumed by an inquiry as to consult the hour by a watch.

The Speaker decided that it was a question of privilege.

The resolution was then adopted.

The Speaker appointed Messrs. Simmons, Smith, of Virginia, Petit, Edie, and Fuller, of Maine, to investigate the assault and battery committed by Mr. McMullen on Mr. Granger.

THE KANSAS AMENDMENT.—At 11½ o'clock, Mr. Campbell's motion was disagreed to. Yeas 98, nays 103.

Mr. Keasbi moved moved the appointment of another committee of conference, but the Speaker declared the motion out of order.

Mr. Bryan offered a resolution that with the concurrence of the Senate the time for adjournment be extended two hours.

After the utmost of many objections and much confusion, Mr. Cobb, of Georgia, moved a suspension of the rules. He wished the majority to show the country their last real intentions in respect to the bill. The motion was refused—yeas 131, nays 68.

A resolution was received from the Senate to extend the time for adjournment two hours.

The bell was ringing for 12 n'clock, when Mr. Campbell of Ohio, moved to take up the Senate resolution extending the time of adjournment. The yeas and nays were ordered, but before the call commenced the Speaker announced the House adjourned, in accordance with the joint resolution fixing the hour.

The members lingered in the hall for a few minutes, some lamenting and others rejoicing over the defeat of the Army bill.

CONFLUENCE.—Soon after the Copernican system of astronomy began to be generally understood, an old Connecticut farmer went to his parson with the following inquiry:

"Dr. T., do you believe in the new story they tell about the earth moving around the sun?"

"Yes, certainly."

"Do you think," inquired the farmer again, "that it is according to the Scriptures? If it is true, how could Joshua command the sun to stand still?"

"Umph!" quoth the Doctor, scratching his head, "Joshua commanded the sun to stand still, did he?"

"Yes."

"Well, it stood still, did it not?"

"Yes."

"Very well, did you ever hear that he set it a going again?"

ONE OF THE STORIES.—Says C. A. R., in the Home Journal, I heard an anecdote the other day which amused me very much. I will give it you. It is on good authority—an officer who was at the mess when the conversation occurred.

A brother officer, (noted as a Munchausen,) was entertaining a mixed company with several stories, as is "Gordon Cumming," among the lions and tigers of India. Once he was out lion hunting, and had spent all his ammunition, when an old lion came up.

"At first," said the narrator, "I thought to fly, but as second thought I remembered it had been said to be possible to mesmerize an animal, whereupon I concentrated my forces, and brought my eye to bear upon his. Presently his tail dropped, and he retired backward, leaving me master of the field.

"Proud of my victory, I went out unarmed the next day, and met the same lion, and again tried the mesmeric influence; he still made preparations to give way, when a rustle in the jungle caused me to waver, and, in an instant he was upon me. I have nothing further to say, except that I could perhaps have killed him again, if the officer who had moved in the jungle had not shot him dead."

An old officer who was laughing at the boldness of the fib, solemnly said——

"I was the man who fired the rifle."

In no way dismayed, the other walked across the room with much complacency, saying—

"Give me your hand, I owe you my life!"

"My friend says it was one of the most admirable lies in the whole war, the lion-hunter not being thrown off his center for one moment.

It is said that a Yankee baby will crawl out of his cradle, take a survey of it, invent an improvement, and apply for a patent before he is six months old.

Dr. Chalmers.

Cockburn, in his "Notabilities of Scotland fifty years ago," sketches this celebrated personage as follows:

Another luminary, which for several years had been attracting notice, was now fixed in our Scottish sky—I mean Thomas Chalmers. I have known him long and pretty well. There can scarcely be a more curious man. When I first became acquainted with him, he used to leave his parish at Kilmany twice or thrice a week to lecture in St. Andrews on chemistry. And not confining himself to physical science, he stored his mind during this first stage of his course by a general study of the principles of moral and political philosophy. In this position of an indifferent minister, and a lecturer rather ardent than exact, he produced a strong impression of his energy and ability on all who were within his range. But it was only on being elevated by the deep religious feelings which afterwards took possession of him, that his powers were developed in their full force. From that moment he was a new creature: and devoted himself, as if with new faculties, to the moral and religious improvement of his countrymen. The high station which he soon attained wakened his ambition, and has dignified his powers. Of the result, in so far as it is contained in a constant and copious stream of published composition and of public exertion, any one can judge. But eloquence records its character fully. He is awkward, and has a low, rough, husky voice, a guttural articulation, a whitish eye, and a large, dingy countenance. In point of mere feature, it would not be difficult to think him ugly. But he is saved from this, and made interesting and loveable, by singular modesty, kindness and simplicity of manner, a strong expression of calm thought and benevolence, a forehead so broad that it seems to proclaim itself the seat of a great intellect, a love of humor, and indescribable look of drollery when anything indierous comes over him.

Under all the external disadvantages of a bad figure, voice, gesture, and look, and an unusual plainness of Scotch accent, he is a great orator; for effect, indeed, at the moment of speaking, unapproached in our day. Yet he seldom utters an extemporaneous word. His habit is to have every thing written, to the very letter. The success of the very few attempts at unprepared speaking which he has ever been obliged to make, removes all doubt of his powers, if he had chosen to practise it. But it is not his way. He feels stronger in building up beforehand, and giving the public the mere recitation. But then he premeditates and composes with an exact anticipation of his speaking position; and neither in recollecting nor in reading, could any one acquainted with his system discover that his memory or his eye were particularly engaged; and he does truly glow with the warmth of present conception.

Still, the habit impairs his power of reply. But it does not impair his general impressiveness. On the contrary, by withdrawing him from temptations of personality, and the little tricks and idle flashes of what is commonly called debate, it leaves him freer for his own loftier range, into which he rarely fails to put views and statements which, in truth, though not in form, are answers to all that can be said on the opposite side. But neither devotional fervor, nor enlightened philosophy, nor vivid language, nor luminous exposition, could produce the effect he does without the aid of his manner.

I have often hung upon his words with a beating heart and a tearful eye, without being brought to my senses till I read the next day the very syllables that had moved me to such admiration, but which then seemed cold. The magic lies in the concentrated intensity which agitates every fibre of the man, and brings out his meaning by words and emphasis of significant force, and rolls his magnificent periods clearly and irresistibly along, and kindles the whole composition with fire. He no sooner approaches the edge of his high region, than his animation makes the commencing awkwardness be forgotten, and then converts his external defects into positive advantages, by showing the intellectual power that overcomes them; and getting na at last within the flames of his enthusiasm, Jeffrey's description, that "he hurled his adversaries under the fragments of burning mountains," is the only image that suggests an idea of his eloquent imagination and terrible energy. Personally, he appears to me to be simple, affectionate and true, devoted to useful objects, and utterly unspoiled by applause. It was so much struck with the wisdom and energy of his system for the management of the poor, that I wrote an article in explanation and defence of it.

The Legend of the Wandering Jew.

A wild and terrible legend is that of the middle ages, which personified the Jewish nation by the traits of the Wandering Jew. It represents an old man, with naked feet, uncovered head, and long white beard, wandering ceaselessly over the earth. His face is pale, a mark of blood is upon his forehead, his eyes burn like saphires beneath their oblique lids. With an eagle-like nose, and blood-like lips, squalid and harsh in features, and clad in a coarse woolen gown, he aver, pursues with staff in hand his interminable journey. Speaking all languages and traversing all lands, knowing not the purposes of God concerning himself, and ever driven onward by a secret impulse, he is transported from place to place with the speed of the wind; and as the long centuries come successively to a close his old age renews itself with the vigor of youth in order that he may complete the weary round of ages. The people wonder as he hastens past. Once or twice only has he paused to tell his story. He was of the Jewish nation. Ahasuerus by name, and a shoemaker by trade. Dwelling in Jerusalem he persecuted Our Saviour, and was of those who cried "Crucify him!" The sentence of death having been pronounced, he ran to his house, before which Jesus was to pass on the way to Calvary. Taking his child in his arms he stood at the door with all his family to behold the procession. Our Saviour, weighed down by the heavy burden of the Cross, leaned for a moment against the wall; and the Jew to show his zeal struck the innocent one with cruel blows, and pointing to the place of execution, bade him go on. Then Jesus, turning to the unfeeling child of Israel, said:

> "Thou refusest rest for the Son of God:
> I go, but it must needs be;
> But for this thine share shall be no rest
> Or repose until I return.
> On forth on thy long journey.
> Leave thine own; traverse mountains and seas,
> Passing saints as they rest under the shade—
> Nowhere—not even in the tomb.
> As an example to the Universe, and bearing
> Everywhere the heavy weight of my curse,
> Much shalt thou long for death, thy abhorrance.
> But shalt not die until the day of judgment."

He assists at the crucifixion, and then goes forth a mysterious stranger, whose feet shall become familiar with all lands.

How age after age he longs for the sweets of death and the repose of the tomb! But in spite of death he must live on; his dust shall not mingle with that of his ancestors. He drags himself from a gloomy cavern of Mt. Carmel, shaking the dust from his beard, grown even to his knees. Nine grinning skulls are before him. He seizes and hurls them from the top of the mountain, and they go bounding down from rock to rock. They are the skulls of his parents, of his wife and six small children, all of whom have been able to die; but he cannot. He rushes into the flames of falling Jerusalem, and attempts to bury himself beneath the crumbling ruins of Rome; but in vain. Flying from cities and men, the wanderer seeks the solitary places of the earth. He climbs the everlasting mountains; passing beyond the region of verdure and of dashing torrents his feet tread the seas of amethyst and opal. Above him are only peaks shrouded in mists and eternal snows. The daring eagle soars not so high. There are no sounds save the cracklings of the glaciers. The soul seems almost to touch the heavens above. There surely the Wandering Jew shall rest? No. A pursuing angel unsheaths a sword of flaming fire, and, lo! the wanderer beholds once more in the heavens the drama of the Crucifixion. The way from earth to heaven is storied with myriads of celestial beings radiant with light. Before him are all the martyrs and saints and sages who have ever lived and died. For a moment he gazes upon the vision, and turns away chased by the sword of flame and demons of frightful form. Then he again wanders over the earth, ever with fine pieces of copper in his pocket, ever with the mark of blood upon his forehead. Maddened with the agony of life, he throws himself into the crater of Etna, but the boiling liquid and sulphurous flames harm him not. The floods of lava vomit him forth, for his hour is not yet come. Embarking upon the sea, the wind raises its surface into mountain waves—the vessel divides, and all perish save the Wandering Jew. Too light to sink in the ocean, its waves cast him upon the hated shore. He plunges into a hundred bloody conflicts without sword or shield. All in vain. The leaden balls rain harmlessly upon him; battle axes and cimiters glance from his charmed body. Where mounted squadrons fight with the fury of demons, he casts himself under the feet of the horsemen, and is unharmed, so rivited are his soul and body together. He says to Nero, "Thou art drunk with blood." To Christian and Mussulman, "Drunk art thou with blood." They invent the most horrible tortures for his punishment, yet injure him not. Leaving, in his vain pursuit of death, the lands that throb with life and industry, the Wandering Jew threads the solitary jungles of the tropics. He walks in poisoned air, and fierce lions and flat-headed serpents will only sport with him as he hastens by.

And thus he wanders:

> "Traversing mountains and seas,
> Passing neither in the cities nor the deserts;
> Nowhere—not even in the tomb."

Inheritance of Talent.

A contemporary says that great men usually inherit their talents from the mother. This is a popular belief, but not the less erroneous. The mistake has arisen from attending only to those cases in which the mother had a superior mind, to the neglect of the equally numerous examples where the father possessed remarkable abilities. Everybody quotes the fact that Napoleon derived his genius from his mother. Nobody mentions that Burns owed his vast abilities to his father. A traveler would commit a similar blunder who should describe all Americans as light-haired, or say that every Philadelphian was a Quaker.

The rule, for role there is, lies deeper. Great abilities, in a word, arise from such a fortunate union of the mental characteristics of the parents as renders the progeny a genius, though neither father nor mother, perhaps, were such. The catalogue of eminent men, if carefully made up and honestly scrutinized with a view to elucidating the truth, would establish this, we have no doubt, beyond controversy. For it is already known that the child takes its mental nature in about equal portions from its parents, and this fact at once leads to our conclusion, as well as explains why brilliant parents often have dunces among their offspring.

Let us illustrate this. A man has the purely intellectual characteristics in great force, but is wanting in will; he is consequently a dreamy philosopher, or a visionary speculator. He marries a woman, who, with but ordinary intellect, has immense energy. One child of this pair may combine the weakness of both parents; and will be in that event, an irrechalmable fool. But another may inherit the mother's will, with the father's intellect; and this child, unless ruined by a bad education, is certain to become distinguished. Or take another example. A woman of no remarkable abilities, but with a fine moral nature, is married to a man without principle, but possessing shining abilities. One child of this pair may have the good qualities of both parents, and become a Bunyan, a Nestor, or even a Washington. But another may inherit the deficiencies of either, to excess, unless carefully guarded, to become a brilliant villain. Or take a third instance. One parent may have much imagination, but little else, and the other nothing remarkable, but great perceptive faculties. The union of these two characteristics in a child will produce a poet. The transmission of either, to excess, unless balanced by strong reasoning powers, may make only a human monkey or a romantic fool.

The law explains also why so few eminent men belong to one family. There have rarely been two distinguished poets, painters, generals or even statesmen, who were father and son, or even brothers. The elder and younger Pitt, though both prime ministers, and both famous speakers, were strikingly dissimilar in their mental constitution, so that this example which seems at first to oppose our theory really sustains it. In fact, when we consider that the mind has so many and so dissimilar ingredients, ideality, casuality, benevolence, reverence, destructiveness, constructiveness, and that these are combined in millions of varieties in as many million persons, the wonder is not that two individuals, even of the same family, resemble each other so little, but that they resemble each other so much. Given the score and odd of separate lumps into which phrenology divides the brain, and take the child of any two persons whatever—and who shall say in what exact proportions out of the ten thousand possible ones, these qualities ought to unite?

There is too much frisky tanght for troth on this and similar subjects, not only in newspapers, but even in elaborate books. The reason is that few persons think soundly, or dare to deny preconceived or popular ideas. We would have every man, however, reflect for himself. "Prove all things: hold fast to the good."—[Philadelphia Evening Bulletin.

The Peddler at Swaffham.

The curious woodwork in the church of Swaffham, in Norfolk, England, has a singular story connected with it, and pretty well authenticated it is said to be, too.

A peddler living in the place, saw one night in a dream a supernatural figure standing by him, which said, "Rise, and go to London Bridge, and there shalt thou find a treasure."

The peddler was, it appears, unwilling to undertake so long a journey on this intimation, and took no notice of the apparition. The next night it stood before him again, and commanded him to begone instantly. Still his incredulity was insapemable. The third night the figure appeared again, and more urgently commanded him to set off forthwith; and that in such a commanding manner, that, on awaking, he determined to obey.

Having happily surmounted the tedious journey, taking only his dog as his companion, he came to London Bridge, for that there I should find a treasure; but treasure have I found none, and, unless I am the more fortunate, I shall go back as poor as I came."

"Never trust again to visions," quoth the other; "if I had been fool enough to be taken in by them, I might have been sent, ere naw, on as wild-goose chase as you have been. I dreamed, once on a time, that I saw a figure which bade me go to a town called Swaffham, in Norfolk, to a peddler's house lying hard by the church, and dig in a corner of his garden, for that I should find a pot of gold there; but I never went, and never intend to go; and you, methinks, had done well to stay at home, and mind your own business, as I did."

"Good evening, friend," quoth the peddler—"I'll warrant you I'll never come back and look for treasure on London Bridge again."

Back he and his dog journey to Swaffham. He gets a lend of a pickaxe, and with that and his apade, falls vigorously to work in the described corner of his garden. Presently he hits on something hard; he redoubles his efforts and turns it out; it is a large pot of gold.

With part of it he builds the church, and a magnificent perpendicular erection it is. In commemoration of the adventure, he had it carved on the wooden seats, where, however, much of it is now decayed; but the figure of the peddler and muzzled dog occurs on the seats, and on the basement moulding of the huge tower. The inhabitants of the place fully believe the story, and I see no reason to doubt it.

Lawyers Outwitted.

Not far from the city of Montgomery, in the State of Alabama, on one of the stage-roads running from that city, lives a jolly landlord by the name of Ford. In fair weather or foul, in hard times or soft, Ford would have his joke. It was a bitter, stormy night, or rather morning, about two hours before daybreak, he was aroused from his slumbers by loud shouting and knocks at his door. He turned out, but sorely against his will, and demanded what was the matter. It was as dark as tar, and as he could see no one, he cried out—

"Who are you, there?".

"Burder and Yancy and Elmore, from Montgomery," was the answer, "on our way to Tuscaloosa to attend court. We are benighted, and want to stay all night."

"Very sorry I can't accommodate you so far, gentlemen. Do anything to oblige you, but that's impossible."

The lawyers, for they were three of the smartest lawyers in the State, and all ready to drop down with fatigue, held a brief consultation, and then, as they could do no better, and were too tired to go another step, they asked—

"Well, can't you stable our horses, and give us chairs and a good fire till morning?"

"Oh, yes, can do that, gentlemen."

Our learned and legal friends were soon drying their wet clothes by a bright fire, as they composed themselves to pass the few remaining hours in their chairs, dozing and nodding, and now and then swearing a word or two of impatience as they waited till daylight did appear.

The longest night has a morning, and at last the sun came along, and then in due time a good breakfast made its appearance; but to the surprise of the lawyers, who thought the house was crowded with guests, none but themselves sat down to partake.

"Why, Ford, I thought your house was so full you cou d'nt give us a bed last night?" said Burder.

"I did'nt say so," Ford replied.

"You did'nt? What in the name of thunder, then, did you say?"

"You asked me to let you stay here all night, and I said that would be impossible, for the night was nigh onto two-thirds gone when you came. If you only wanted beds, why on earth did'nt you say so?" The lawyers had to give it up. Three of them on one side, and the landlord alone had beat them all.

To one who said, "I do not believe there is an honest man in the world," another replied, "It is impossible that one man should know all the world, but quite possible that one may know himself."

An old cynic at a concert the other night, read in the programme the title of a song viz: "Oh give me a cot in the valley I love." Reading it over attentively the old fellow finally growled—"Well, if I had my choice, I should ask for a bedstead."

Students will be received at any time during the session, and will be charged only from the time of their entrance to the end of the term. We would, however, respectfully urge all parents and guardians who design placing their daughters or wards in the institution, to do so at their earliest convenience, as it will tend much to the individual interest of the pupils, and the general prosperity of the school, facilitating, as it will, a proper arrangement of the various classes in their respective branches of study.

School books, stationery, etc., may be had at any of the various stores in the village at the usual prices.

Reports will be sent to parents and guardians quarterly, in which will be stated the health, improvement, social and moral deportment of their daughters or wards, with such other information as may be deemed important.

As the design of the Faculty is to render the instruction thorough, and lay the foundation of a substantial education, no young lady will be permitted to rank higher than her attainments will justly entitle her, nor to pass another department in the course of instruction without having made sufficient proficiency in the preceding studies.

The government of the school is to be understood as that of gentlemen—though parental, mild, yet decided and firm.—The institution, in a religious point of view will be conducted without reference to sectarian influence.

Pupils will be required to attend church at least once on the Sabbath and recite a Bible lesson on each Monday morning.

The scholastic year, embracing ten months, will be divided into two equal terms of five months, one immediately succeeding the other.

The first session commencing on the first Wednesday in October, and closing the last week in February; the second commencing on the first Wednesday in March, and closing the last week in July; at which time the annual examination will be held, and the usual premium bestowed upon those conferred. The vacation will embrace the months of August and September.

All applications for admission of pupils, etc., to be made to the President of the College.

A WORD TO MOTHERS.

THE most common disease to which children are subject is worms. In fact it is almost universal. Thousands of pleasing children die of it without the cause being suspected. The symptoms are so various that a diagnosis is often impossible. Mothers who would be on the safe side should administer WM. B'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE whenever the slightest indication of the complaint appears. If there are no worms in the system it can do no harm, and if there are, it will infallibly annihilate them and effect a radical and permanent cure.

The ensuing scholastic year will commence on Wednesday, the 1st of October.

The Institution has entered on its sixth session under the auspices of the same Principal. A sense of duty, interest and pleasure tends his future connexion with the institution permanent and perpetual.

The apparatus, Chemical, Philosophical and Astronomical, is large and well selected.

There is a numerous cabinet of minerals and fossils in connexion with the Seminary.

There is a library of more than one thousand volumes accessible to the pupils, which will shortly be increased several hundred volumes.

The number of musical instruments, pianos, harp, guitars, etc., is always sufficient to meet the wants of the department.

The institution is furnished with a large and excellent collection of maps, charts, diagrams, globes, etc.

The grounds of the Seminary have been enlarged and the entire premises tastefully enclosed.

UNIFORM.

The Trustees and Principal at a meeting lately held, adopted a uniform for the following reasons:

1st. To secure economy in dress. It is impracticable to secure it otherwise.

2d. The young ladies are of diverse pecuniary conditions, as is but to be expected where such a number are thrown together, and this diversity is published to the world by the different styles and quality of dress on all public occasions.

3d. On public occasions we have often, as well as the young ladies, been mortified to hear this diversity remarked.

4th. Without a uniform, there being no rule in the article of dress, the region of whim and caprice is left boundless, and the tender and cautious mind is subject to the most diverse fancies in every article, to burdensome and annoying in the extreme. For the above and other good reasons, we have adopted a uniform, and commend it to the patrons and the public. It may be regarded as a law of the Institution.

FOR WINTER, BROWN OF MERINO SHADE.

FAITH, HOPE AND LOVE---ARE THEY MOTIVES?

Mr. Editor.—In the Advocate, of the 6th inst., I find an article from Bro. Harris, on the subject of motives, in connection with Christian morality. I desire, with your leave, to examine this article very briefly, and to state the points on which I believe Bro. H. to be in error.

Some time since he recommended to our notice a work which taught a "religion standing equally above the fear of punishment and the hope of reward." Then, again, in an article of July 12th, (over the signature of Ignatius, Jr.,) he tells us that the religion for which he contends advocates the Pelagian doctrine of infant purity. "Every man commences life an unfallen Adam; every woman commences life a sinless Eve." And now, in his last article, he tells us there is much more of "the fear of hell in the modern pulpits than was ever dreamed of on the rock-based pulpit of Jesus." I need not say that Bro. Harris has placed himself at issue with Methodist teachings on these subjects—the fact is self-evident. He seems to court controversy upon them; why I know not. Has he not subscribed to the Methodist Articles of Religion? If so, how can he ignore Article VIII., which reads thus: "Original sin standeth not in the following of Adam, (as the Pelagians do vainly talk,) but it is the corruption of the nature of every man, that naturally is engendered of the offspring of Adam," etc. How, then, does Bro. H. tell us that every individual commences life an unfallen Adam? a sinless Eve? It is useless to tell us that there is more of error in his words than in his thoughts. Unless words are designed to conceal our thoughts, Bro. H. has avowed doctrines hostile to the truth of God, as expounded by the Methodists.

In his last article, Bro. Harris states that "the power to select motives" is "the whole gamut of freedom, human and divine." Now, what do we mean by "motives?" He replies: "A motive is that ultimate truth upon which the mind settles in the process of deciding the outward conduct." So, then, the freedom of God consists in the power to decide which of certain ultimate truths shall govern his outward conduct. But still I doubt if the reader knows what is meant by "ultimate truths." What are they? This is an important enquiry, because in choosing between them we are to find happiness or sorrow in these motive-truths. Let us take the scriptural proposition, "God is love." Is this an ultimate truth?—if so, then, a motive to influence my outward conduct? How can it do so? If I would be like God, I too must love Him, and the more I do love Him, the nearer I approach to Christian perfection. This is true enough. But why do I desire to be like God? That is the question. Is it a natural desire, or is it founded upon a weighty reason? Admitting that this proposition is an "ultimate truth," would it alone move any sinful heart to embrace the gospel?—has it, in a solitary instance, aroused the sinner and converted his soul? If it had never been written, "Follow peace with all men, and holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord," would any man desire to be holy whilst in an unconverted state? No. Unless there is some stronger "ultimate truth" reaching down into the depths of man's heart, you will not move him to accept Jesus. It requires something more than a knowledge of God's goodness to stir the heart of man. Paul himself complains that the goodness of God was ineffectual in leading men to repentance.

But let us examine these ultimate truths more in detail. Bro. H. says they are motives between which we are to decide, the motives which control our outward actions. The "ultimate truth" in the gospel is love; this ought to be the controlling motive of our lives. So Bro. Harris thinks. And here I take issue with him. The ultimate truth of the gospel is eternal life. To secure it is the controlling motive of the Christian career. In a regenerate state we love God; why? Not because he is infinitely holy and lovely in himself, but because he first loved us." Wherein is the proof that he loved us? In that he spared not his own Son, but freely gave him up for us all, that we, through his sufferings and death, might inherit eternal life. This motive, it is charged, is selfish, secular and unreasonable.—Certainly it is, if man is "a spontaneous flax of the divine;" but he is not, and never was. To recover his lost inheritance is the sole object of the gospel, and from the first prophecy in Genesis to the close of the Apocalyptic vision, he is regarded as a fallen creature, who can only fulfill the design of his creation—the glory of God—by becoming a new creature in Christ Jesus." The moving cause brought to bear by the Scriptures upon the heart of man is not, ultimately, the glory of God, but his own salvation. And this salvation, too, he is commanded to "work out with fear and trembling." It does not commence with fear and hope simply—they are not the schoolmasters that bring us to Christ, but they attend us through life: "Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling." "Let us therefore fear, lest a promise being left us of entering into his rest, any of you should come short of it." Because there is such a rest for the people of God, "Let us labor, therefore, to enter into that rest, lest any man fall after the same example of unbelief." Before any man can approach God, he "must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him." "Noah, being warned of God of things not seen as yet, moved with fear, prepared an ark to the saving of his house." Abraham looked for "a city which hath foundations," "desiring a better country, that is, a heavenly." Moses, in preferring the reproach of Christ to the treasures of Egypt, "had respect unto the recompense of the reward." And Paul (not to multiply quotations,) kept his body under subjection, lest having preached to others, he should become a castaway. Phil. ii: 12; Heb. iv: 1, 11; Heb. xi: 6, 7, 16, 26; I Cor. ix: 27. Now, according to the theory I oppose all these actions which are specifically said to be the results of hope and fear, are only introductory to Christianity. Let us take one of the above passages: "Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling." When this salvation is worked out it is finished, but no man is positively saved until death; whilst he lives he is in danger of apostacy—then he must work while he lives, and he must do so with "fear and trembling." Then it is evident that there must be something to fear—and what is it? Lest any man fail of the grace of God. And what then? The wrath of God, which must sink us to endless woe. On the other hand, running our race diligently and with fear, "we are saved by hope." And that hope is not yet in fruition, for what a man hath he cannot hope for. It is the reward in heaven.

Bro. Harris has great distaste for the "pampered theology" of the times. So have I. Our theology has been too highly fed. It has been suffering under the addition of German mystical terms and high-sounding, meaningless phraseology for a great while. I heartily wish we could prune it a little. I will take the "Elements" and the "Bodies of Divinity," and the "Institutes," with all their straight-jacket terms and hackneyed phrases, rather than a mass of fresh-coined words, seedy adjectives "long drawn out," and fearful compounds of Latin and Greek particles and substantives. I love campmeeting theology—a theology which uncaps the bottomless pit to the eyes and ears of perishing sinners, that snatches away the curtain and reveals the New Jerusalem descending out of heaven—that is the theology I prefer to all others. It melts the heart, subdues the stubborn will, elevates the mind and converts the soul. May God grant that every preacher's head and heart may be full of just such theology. If anything is "withered" by this orthodoxy, it will be the ambitious claims of a spurious religion, the dangerous sophistry of a dead formalism, and the cherished hopes of a false security.

Bro. Harris denies that hope and fear are motives, they are emotions. Indeed he says he "could never love a being who kept him wakeful with menacing wrath." Then he can never love God. For He has declared that "the soul that sinneth, it shall die." Now, Bro. Harris is certain that he will not sin, or else he fears the Divine displeasure. If he cannot sin any more, then I grant the penalty is null as to him. But if he is in danger of sin, he knows that God will be angry with him if he does it, and just so long as a possibility exists of his incurring the penalty, just so long will a fear of that event influence his Christian character and course.—Then, fear must be a motive, a moving cause—we must fear God, and depart from all iniquity, "for our God is a consuming fire." To deny the truth of this argument is to take one of the two following positions: either with the Antinomians contend that sin is not sin in a believer, or else that God is not displeased with sin. The first changes the character of God's law; the second alters the nature of the Deity himself: therefore neither can be true. Fear to offend God, incur his displeasure and ultimately the punishment of sin, connected, as it necessarily is, with the hope of reward in heaven, is the controlling motive of Christian morality and perseverance. So I believe. And yet "without love I am nothing." True, and why? not because love is a motive of religious action, but because it is religion itself. Then I cannot serve God without love, but I ought to serve him with fear. I am commanded so to do. "Love is the fulfilling of the law." It is the substance of experimental religion. But what motive leads me to seek it. I should say, with the Discipline, "a desire to flee the wrath to come." But Bro. H. says love is the motive. That is to say, that love is a motive before we possess it; at once cause and effect. Impelled, influenced by love we begin to love. Is that true? Then the bare knowledge that "God is love" must be the motive, or else the knowledge that he loves us is the moving cause. The history of a million of years may be drawn before the eye of man as a vast panorama, unfolding the evidences of the first proposition, that God is love; by showing his dealings with the unfallen creation, and the recital of them all, would not stir the heart of man. Why? Because he is conscious that he is unworthy such love, and his heart condemning him for his sins, would wrap itself in sullen melancholy or sink into despair. But bring him the proofs that "God loves me," and hope springs up in his bosom. Hope of what? That he will pardon me, receive me, and save me. He has no time to be concerned for his friends; he has no sympathetic tears to waste on the case of others—his own claims all his thoughts, all his prayers. But let him breathe a moment after his feet are taken out of the miry clay and placed on the rock, and his philanthropy is world-wide; he takes in all mankind in his supplications before God.

Bro. Harris admits that hope and fear are "preparatory agents or factors," but "they are dismissed from the sphere of moral life, and love is enthroned as the soul of moral being." He regards these "factors" as holding the same relation to the motive of Christian morality as did the Jewish dispensation to the Christian, that is, they introduce the soul to the sublimities of love. This may look well on paper, but what does it mean? Why, that hope and fear are the motives that lead us to Christ, but when we have found Him, we bow them out of our presence. We have no further use for them. "As for ourselves we will live above this rejoicing and trembling in the eternal embrace of love." Now, I frankly confess that I have no sort of use for such a theory as that. "Rejoice evermore." So says Paul. "I am above that, in the eternal embrace of love," says Bro. Harris.—"Strive to enter in at the strait gate," says Christ. "No need of that; I fear nothing; I am in the eternal embrace of love," says Bro. H.

The "pampered theology," in the estimation of Bro. Harris, "would prefer death on the gibbets of human reason and divine revelation, to life and safety in a Unitarian fort." It is a sad thing to read such sentiments from the pen of a Methodist minister. It grieves the sincere lovers of Zion to see her young men running wild over visionary schemes and fancies, ignoring the gospel of their fathers, and revelling in extravagant terms. "Let heaven and hell remain where orthodox geographers have placed them; serve God independently of either, through pure love of his holiness." As to the fear of hell, there is much more of it in our modern pulpits than was ever dreamed of on the rock-based pulpit of Jesus." These sentiments are not new. I know not where Bro. Harris received them. Whether from the Theologia Germanica or by following such critics as Greisbach and Tragelles—but this I know, that they form the ground-work of Universalist morality, from Murray down to Williamson, and they will tell you, from the time of the Apostles, these doctrines have been current. They advocate an unselfish religion—one that makes God the centre of attraction, because he is holy, and thither all our affections must tend, because we cannot refuse to love that which is lovely.—But, after all, what is the result of their disinterested love? Practically, they have no religion. Actuated by love, but the love of the creature only, they have no hopes for eternity, because there is nothing to fear. The consequence is they have no motives at all, and are therefore destitute of Christian enjoyment. And with all due respect for Bro. Harris, I must be permitted to say that his theory would be as destructive to vital godliness as Universalism. It is idle to say that love is a sufficient motive. Strike out the Christian's hope of heaven, deprive him of it as the stay of his old age, and you plunge him into a moral night, darker than the darkness of Egypt. Let this mark of the prize of his high calling be removed, and his soul would wear the weeds of mourning to his grave.

Disinterested love! Preach that doctrine to angels who have never fallen, if you will. Perchance they may understand it. Untainted by the breath of moral obliquity, it may be that they can appreciate it. But to the poor dying sinner, hanging by a single thread, suspended over the flames of endless woe, vibrating back and forth a few moments, and then to be precipitated to the bottomless abyss—preach it to him! Sooner tell him, as he lies there, in the very jaws of destruction, how punctually Mazzaroth and Arcturus keep their appointed vigils; describe to him the track of some wandering comet; portray the beauties of the lily of the field; amuse him with vain conceits; until the cord shall break and he be lost in the flames beneath. Disinterested? The first utterance from his terror-struck soul, when it awakes to a sense of its danger, is "Lord save, or I perish!" And when the waves roll high, and the winds roar tumultuously without, the language of the Christian heart is > "Jesus, lover of my soul,

> Let me to thy bosom fly,
> While the nearer waters roll,
> While the tempest still is high;
> Hide me, O, my Savior, hide,
> Till the storm of life be past;
> Safe into the haven guide,
> O, receive my soul at last!"

"Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, which, according to his abundant mercy, hath begotten us again unto a lively hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, to an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for you who are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation, ready to be revealed in the last time. Wherein ye greatly rejoice, though now for a season, if need be, ye are in heaviness through manifold temptations: that the trial of your faith being much more precious than of gold that perisheth, though it be tried with fire, might be found unto praise and honor and glory at the appearing of Jesus Christ, whom having not seen ye love; in whom, though now ye see him not, yet believing, ye rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory, receiving the end of your faith, even the salvation of your souls." I Peter i: 3—9.

That text will do when the revival waters are deep enough to launch the "Old Ship of Zion."

Christ's Sacrifice.

Surmount, if you can, your customary indolence, and form an adequate idea of the dignity of the sacrifice of Jesus Christ, in order the better to judge of the dignity of those souls of which his blood was the price.

Go, learn it in heaven. Behold the Deity. Approach his throne. Observe the "thousand thousands ministering unto him, ten thousand times ten thousand standing before him." (Dan. vii 10.) See his eyes sparkling with fire, and his majesty and glory filling his sanctuary, and, by the dignity of the victim sacrificed, judge of the value of the sacrifice.

Go, study it in all the economies that preceded this sacrifice. Observe the types which prefigured it; the shadows that traced it out; the ceremonies which depicted it; and by the pomp of the preparations, judge of the dignity of the substance prepared.

Go, learn it on Mount Calvary. Behold the wrath that fell on the head of Jesus Christ! Behold his blood pouring out upon the earth, and him, your Saviour, drinking the bitter cup of divine displeasure! See his hands and his feet nailed to the cross, and his whole body one great wound; observe the unbridled populace foaming with rage around the cross, and glutting their savage souls with his barbarous sufferings; and, by the horror of the causes that contributed to his death, judge of the death itself!

Go to the infidel, and let him teach you the dignity of the sacrifice of Christ. Remember, on this account he attacks Christianity, and he hath some show of reason for doing so; for if this religion may be attacked on any side, with the least hope of success, it is on this. The truths of the Christian religion are incontestible—but if there be any one article of the gospel which requires an entire docility of mind, an absolute submission of heart, a perfect deference to God, who speaks, it is the article of the sacrifice of the cross.—Weigh the objections, and by the greatness of the difficulties judge of the dignity of the mystery.—[Saurin.

When a christian considers the goodness of God's ways, he wonders that all the world doth not walk in them. But when he considers the blindness and depravity, and prejudice of the heart by nature, he wonders that any should enter upon them.

From the American Messenger.

QUENCHING THE SPIRIT.

A few years ago as I was labouring in our western wilds, an individual rode up, and taking me by the hand, inquired earnestly, "Will you go and see a dying young man? He is in agony, and says there is no hope."—There was no time to be lost. I went with him. After climbing many a rocky ascent, I came into an open path, which soon conducted me to the house. Anxious ones stood weeping without, and soon held both my hands, conducting me up a long flight of steps to the room of the dying man. Not a word was spoken. Other hearts were to full and my own was sinking beneath a weight of responsibility. Earnestly seeking the Divine blessing, I ascended the steps. On reaching the top, a venerable mother approached me, saying, "I am glad you have come. Do speak to my son; perhaps he may yet be saved." I pressed the hand that led me in, and in a moment the most heart-rending scene was before me. A young man in agonies of death—rolling his eyes, and flinging his arms wildly about him—crying out, "O, I am lost! Hell is before me! In a few minutes I shall be among the damned." He ceased speaking, and I feared his spirit had taken its flight for the region of woe. He soon revived again. Seizing the opportunity, I repented slowly the words, "believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved."—"The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth us from all sin." Seeing that I had his attention, I spoke of the free, unmerited mercy of Christ, able to save the chiefest of sinners, saying, "There is hope for the repenting sinner, even at the eleventh hour." He replied, "No, there is no hope. Once I might have been saved, but now it is too late—too late." Then, with a groan of the deepest despair, he exclaimed, "O, that I had heard then!" In vain I urged him to cast himself unreservedly on the sovereign mercy of Christ, as "able to save unto the uttermost all that come unto God through him." He only replied, "I have resisted the Holy Ghost, there is no hope." I proposed prayer. He replied, "Pray for others, not for me." I knelt. Perfect silence reigned, save as a low, deep moan came from the dying bed. I tried to commit him to the mercy of Christ. I spoke to him again, but he hopelessly replied, "It is of no use; I am hastening to eternity." No tears fell. He manifested no contrition for sin, no ray of hope. A wild, piercing cry wrung our hearts with anguish, and he sunk upon his pillow.

Reviving yet again, he said thoughtfully, "Once I was brought to see myself a sinner. For days and weeks I was anxious about my soul. Something said, now is the accepted time.—My heart said, not now; to-morrow.—But when to-morrow came, I still put it off. My gay companions laughed at my seriousness and tried to allure me back to the follies of sin. I said to myself, I will go with you to-day, but to-morrow I will not."

Ploased with present victory, they led him on from pleasure to vice, the card table and the social bar. He took wine, he laughed and was the gayest of the gay. Conscience raised her warning voice and bade him pause, but he rushed heedlessly on.

He stated that one pleasant Sabbath morning a young man met him on his way to join his companions, and taking him cordially by the hand, said, "Friend, you seem to be enjoying yourself; come with me and we will have better enjoyment still." He joined him in a walk, which ended at the house of God. Startled, he drew back and would have fled from the sanctuary had not his friend urged affectionately, "Do come in a little while." He yielded to the entreaty, resolving it should be a "little while." He took his seat among the worshippers. Here conscience, as if roused to final conflict, reminded him of broken resolutions, and bade him seek Christ to-day. "No, not to-day," was his response to the gentle whispers of the Spirit. He remained through the morning services. His friend, encouraged by his stay, drew him into a "Bible class," where the teacher faithfully enforced the duty of immediate preparation for eternity. The young man was impressed, and sat thoughtfully revolving the question, "Shall I or not? I will decide now, or else put it forever out of mind." The class was dismissed. The words, "To-day, prepare to meet thy God," rang in his ears as he walked down the aisle. The decision was made: "Not to-day but to-morrow I will." From that moment all was darkness, terror and dismay. Ere the night had passed over him he was seized with a malignant fever, which in two days left him in the state I found him in, "And now," he added, "I have cursed my Maker, and I am dying without hope—without hope." I still urged him to flee to Christ, but in vain. Despair only was his; one deep groan and shriek of terror and he expired with these fearful words on his lips," "Lost, lost, lost!"

Quench not the Spirit of God. Heed his gentle admonitions. Once grieved away, he may never return, till in another world memory pierce your soul with anguish past hope. "You might, but you would not. I entreated, but you refused to hear. I stood long waiting, again and again urging your acceptance of offered mercy. Now it is too late. The door of mercy is shut, forever shut."

The Episcopal Recorder, having inserted the foregoing from the Messenger, says:

We are glad to avail ourselves of the above, to give additional currency to the following hymn, which we believe to be one of the finest as well as truest, in the English language. The author, we understand, is the Rev. Dr. J. A. Alexander:

The Spirit Quenched.

"Ephraim is joined to idols; let him alone."—Hosea.

There is a time, we know not when,
A point, we know not where,
That marks the destiny of men
To glory or despair.

There is a line, by us unseen,
That crosses every path;
The hidden boundary between
God's patience and his wrath.

To pass that limit is to die—
To die as if by stealth;
It does not quench the beaming eye,
Or pale the glow of health.

The conscience may be still at ease;
The spirits light and gay;
That which is pleasing still may please,
And care be thrust away.

But on that forehead God has set
Indelibly a mark,
Unseen by man—for man as yet
Is blind and in the dark.

And yet the doomed man's path below
May bloom as Edee bloomed;
He did not, does not, will not know,
Or feel that he is doomed.

He knows, he feels that all is well,
And every fear is calmed;
He lives, he dies, he wakes in hell,
Not only doomed, but damned.

O, where is this mysterious bourn,
By which our path is crossed?
Beyond which, God himself hath sworn,
That he who goes is lost.

How far may we go on in sin?
How long will God forbear?
Where does hope end, and where begin
The confines of despair?

An answer from the skies is sent;
"Ye that from God depart,
While it is called to-day, repent,
And harden not your heart."

Praise, Rest, Love.

Wilberforce, when dying, was asked what he thought to be the employment of the redeemed in heaven? He, in conformity with the tenor of his works and words through life, replied, "Praising the Creator."

Robert Hall, who having long lived with painful infirmity of body, was weary of life, was asked a like question, and replied, "Rest, rest, rest."

Another says it must be in the exercises of love, and he judges from the perfect love which filled his heart when first he became a regenerate soul, and before renewed contact with the world and the attacks of the arch enemy had again brought upon him the damaging influence of sin and sinful thoughts.

All are right. Doubtless the redeemed in heaven are constantly employed in praising the Being who saved and gave eternal joy to otherwise lost and wretched souls. So, too, when they put off this toilsome mortal existence must they enter upon a state of rest, a blessed rest in the regions of Peace.—And if a soul is saved from doom of sin, and that leads to praise, and if we are at rest, after a weary and painful pilgrimage on earth, will we not love, and, too, love continually and with the whole soul?

All these forms are but different expressions of one sentiment which lies in the soul of every regenerate creature; and when the soul reaches heaven that sentiment will have its expression in each form with a fulness and power transcending human conception. In unceasing praise, and rest, and love, in the presence of God and the Lamb will we exist, if on earth we give our hearts to Christ and are his faithful followers.

Praise, rest, love, in unlimited, eternal measure, in Omnipotent presence!—Blessed consummation—worth living for, worth dying for.

If God hath done that good for us which he has denied to the world, we ought to do that service for him, which is denied by the world.

If we are willing, God will help us; if sincere, God will accept us.

Fall of the Charter Oak.

The Hartford Times, of the 21st inst., gives the following interesting particulars relating to the fall of this historical old tree:

The famous old Charter Oak of this city, so noted in song and history, fell with a tremendous crash during the great storm, at quarter before 1 o'clock this morning, (August 21, 1856.)

This noble old tree stood upon the beautiful grounds of Hon. Isaac W. Stuart, late the Wyllys' estate, in the southern part of the city. About three years ago, some boys built a fire in the hollow of this tree, which burnt out the punk, and though it was feared that this would kill it, such was not the fact. Fresh sprouts sprung out the next Spring, and Mr. Stuart took great pains to preserve this ruined relic of the original forests of New England, but more especially interesting as the tree in which the old British Charter of Connecticut was secreted and preserved. At this time the hollow in the trunk of the old Oak was so large, that a fire company of 27 full grown men stood up in it together.

Watchman Butler says he stood at the head of the street at the time of the crash. The wind had been blowing freshly from the Northwest for an hour or more. He first heard a loud crack, and saw the old oak swaying in the breeze; a crackling noise followed, then the crash—all within the space of half a minute—and the famous monarch of the forest, whose history is so intimately entwined in that of Connecticut, was prostrate upon the earth! One thousand years, when it was in the prime of life—when its years were half numbered, its far reaching branches had sported in fiercer storms, and more swift-winged winds. But now, since full two thousand years have smiled and waned upon its youth, its prime, and its decline, it had become grey and decrepit, but was still tenacious of life; it still clung to the lovely spot which gave it birth, by its far reaching roots, running a long way up into the beautiful hill-side, and downward to the sharp cut elbow. Firmly, aye, proudly, the Oak stood, seemingly conscious that nature had marked out for its own accommodation, one of the most enchanting retreats in the State, and that destiny had accorded to it a notable and everlasting historic page in the story of Connecticut—one of the patriotic and original thirteen States of the Union.

Before Governor Wyllys came to America, he sent his steward forward to prepare a place for his residence. As he was cutting away the trees upon the hill side of the beautiful "Wyllys Place," a deputation of Indians came to him and requested that he would spare this old hollow oak. They declared that it had been the guide of their ancestors for centuries." It was spared to fall this day, having finally yielded to the process of natural decay.

The tree measured thirty-three feet in circumference at the bottom; and it has broken off so as to leave eight feet of stump on one side and six feet on the other—the stump measuring twenty-one feet in circumference at its top.

The charter of King Charles the Second, for the colony of Connecticut arrived in Hartford in 1662, probably in the month of September, though the precise time is not now known. On the 9th of October it was publicly read to the assembled freemen of Connecticut, and was declared to "belong to them and their successors," and the people evinced their gratitude by appointing a committee to take charge of it under the solemnities of an oath, and to preserve this palladium of the rights of the people. It contained many liberal provisions, as may be seen on examining it in the Secretary of State's office, where the original copy is still preserved with care. It was the organic law of Connecticut till the present constitution took its place in 1818.

In 1686, the General Government of New England was dissolved by James the Second, and a new government instituted, with Joseph Dudley as President of the Commissioners. Connecticut refused to surrender, and when the third writ of quo warranto was sent to her, Gov. Treat, in January, 1687 called a special session of the Assembly, which refused to accede to the demands of the new King. They still held to their charter. In March, another special session was convened, but still the representatives of the people refused to "surrender." In May they met again in regular session under the Charter, and re-elected Treat as Governor.

On the 31st of October, 1687, Sir Edmund Andros, attended by members of his Council, and a body guard of sixty soldiers, General Assembly was in session. He was received with courtesy, but coldness. He entered the Assembly room, and peblicly demanded the Charter. Remonstrances were made, and the session was protracted till evening. The Governor and his associates appeared to yield. The Charter was brought in and laid upon the table. Sir Edmund thought the last moment of the Colony had come, when suddenly the lights were all put out, and total darkness followed! There was no noise, no resistance, but all was quiet. The candles were again lighted, BUT THE CHARTER WAS GONE! Sir Edmund Andros was disconcerted. He declared the Government of Connecticut to be in his own hands, and that the Colony was annexed to Massachusetts and other New England Colonies, and proceeded to appoint officers. Whilst he was doing this, Capt. Jeremiah Wardsworth, a patriot of those times, was concealing the Charter in the hollow of Wyllys' Oak, now known as THE CHARTER OAK.

In 1689, King James abdicated, and on the 9th of May of that year, Gov. Treat and his associate officers, resumed the Government of Connecticut under the Charter, which had been preserved in the Old Hollow Oak.

Big Brindle.

In Nashville, many years ago, there resided a gentleman of great hospitality, large fortune, and though uneducated, possessed of hard knot sense. Col. W. had been elected to the Legislature and had also been Judge of the county court.

His elevation, however, had made him somewhat pompous, and he became very fond of using big words. On his farm he had a large mischievous ox, called "Big Brindle," which frequently broke down his neighbors' fences, and committed other depredations, much to the Colonel's annoyance.

One morning, after breakfast, in presence of some gentlemen who had staid with him over the night, and who were now on their way to town, he called his overseer and said to him:

"Mr. Allen, I desire you to impound Big Brindle, in order that I may hear no more animadversions on his eternal depredations."

Allen bowed and walked off, sorely puzzled to know what the Colonel meant.

So after Col. W. left for town he went to his wife and asked her what Col. W. meant by telling him to "impound" the ox.

"Why," said she, "the Colonel meant to tell you to put him in a pen."

Allen left to perform the feat, for it was no inconsiderable one, as the animal was very wild and vicious, and after a great deal of trouble and vexation he succeeded.

"Well," said he, wiping the perspiration from his brow and soliloquizing, "this is impounding, is it? Now I am dead sure the old Colonel will ask me if I have impounded Big Brindle, and I'll bet I puzzle him as bad as he did me."

The next day the Colonel gave a dinner party, and as he was not aristocratic, Allen, the overseer, sat down with the company. After the second or third glass was discussed, the Colonel turned to the overseer and said—

"Eh, Mr. Allen, did you impound Big Brindle, sir?"

Allen straightened himself, and looking around at the company, said:

"Yes, I did, but old Brindle transcended the impannel of the impound and scatteriphisticated all over the equanimity of the forest."

The company burst into an immoderate fit of laughter, while the Colonel's face reddened with discomfiture.

"What do you mean by that, sir?" said he.

"Why, I mean, Colonel," said Allen, "that old Brindle being drognosticated with an idea of the cholery, ripped and tared, snorted and pawed dirt, jumped the fence, tuck to the woods, and would not be impounded no how!"

This was too much; the company roared again, in which the Colonel was forced to join, and in the midst of the laughter Allen left the table, saying to himself as he went, "I reckon the Colonel won't ask me to impound any more exen."

The following sonnet was pronounced by Sidney Smith to be one of the most beautiful in our language:

With silent awe I hail the sacred morn,
Which slowly wakes while all the fields are still;
A soothing calm on every breeze is borne;
A graver murmur gurgles from the rill,
And echoes answer softer from the hill,
And softer sings the linnet from the thorn;
The skylark warbles in tones less shrill;
Hail light serene, hail sacred Sabbath morn;
The rooks float silently by in airy troops;
The sun a placid yellow lustre throws;
The gales that lately sighed along the groves,
Have hushed their downy wings in sweet repose;
The lowering rack of clouds forget to move;
So smiled the day when the first morn arose.

THE UPPER RIVERS.—The St. Louis Intelligencer, of the 25th ult., has the following:

Since Saturday the river opposite the city has swelled about two feet, and continued to rise when we left the wharf last evening. The officers of the David Tatum, that came in from St. Joseph last evening, report a rise from Brunswick down; the rise was coming out of Grand river. Boats arrived yesterday from all the upper rivers, but no rise is reported in any except the Missouri.

The New Orleans Christian Advocate.

N. O. Christian Advocate.

Weekly, Two Dollars per annum, in advance.

NEW ORLEANS:

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 6, 1856.

To Our Agents.

Read this kindly and attentively, and with a purpose deliberated to do what is requested—unless it is against your conscience.

The accounts have been sent out. If any agent has not received them belonging to his circuit or station, it is because they have been missed; and if he will kindly so we will be obliged, and dispatch them immediately to the right address. Our list has been first for the last six month. We have lost fewer patrons than in any previous half year, and several have been gained. This speaks well for the satisfaction of our subscribers. We hope to retain them all, and add to their number through your aid. Let them have an opportunity of paying for the paper they read—and let us have this money. It will be a favor to both.

ANNUAL STATEMENT.

This is the commencement of a new commercial year, which the business men of New Orleans will enter upon hopefully, and with the full confidence that the promises of the past will be realized in the future.

The year which went out with the month of August has been more than ordinarily prosperous. Hardly a drawback has impeded the upward and onward tendency of affairs. The operations of commerce have been great even beyond the anticipation of the most sanguine. All the departments of business have thriven. The prosperity has been general, all pervading, the results of which we see on every hand, giving token that the coming season will be still more fruitful of benefits than the past.

Our Annual Statement has been prepared with great care and research. We believe it to be as correct as it is comprehensive; and, therefore, confidently recommend it to our commercial friends and readers generally.

It has been prepared, with his usual skill and care, by the well informed commercial reporter of the Crescent. To many of our patrons it will be alone worth the subscription price of the Advocate.

New Books.—Several are on hand from Messrs. Harper and Lippincott, which will be noticed next week. Also a volume—"Headlands of faith," from our Book Agent.

Rev. L. Parker.—We are happy to welcome home, in improved health but not appearance, the pastor of Carondelet Street Church. He has had a good time, abroad and about, evidently.—Several instalments of Woodsman's letters are on the way.

Sixth Volume.—The St. Louis Christian Advocate began its sixth volume August 21st. Looking as well or better than ever. It holds a very important position in the Advocate family. Long may it live.

Tricks or Types were played, somewhat disastrously, to a few words and sentences of the Corner Stone Speech. Yet its sparkling originality survived.

Illustrious Mathematics.—What guessers printers must be! A New York editor, in demanting upon the general bull of it style of writing in which many articles are sent to be printed, gives the following amusing specimen. A piece of poetry before him, written in what, at a reasonable distance, seemed illegible, when examined a little closer, appeared to present the following:

Above earth rolls it vast by Moses,
A many Chinese we measure by day;
Two and the shooting Indian shores,
And nothing their limbs at play.

Hoping, however, that his correspondent was not a fool, he more carefully examined it; and he guesses the following version is nearer the author's intention:

I love to stroll bi early morn
Among the over stream hay;
To mark the sporting Indian corn,
And see the lambs at play.

The British Wesleyan Conference.—Opened 30th July in Bristol. Eight vacancies in the Legal Hundred were filled—six by seniority, two by election. One of the latter was the Rev. Wm. Arthur, author of "the Tongue of Fire."

The Rev. Robert Young was elected President and John Hannah, D. D., Secretary.

The Irish Wesleyan Conference, lately held, reports, at last a little increase, (about two hundred,) and the English Conference have already three thousand of an increase, which with eighteen hundred and fifteen increase in the missions, makes a total of over five thousand increase in British Wesleyanism.

Relative Cost.—The Christian Register says: It is calculated that the clergy cost the United States six millions of dollars annually, the criminals nineteen, the lawyers thirty-five, tobacco forty, and RUM one hundred millions.

Port Gibson Female Institute.—Opens 9th October. Rev. Benjamin Jones takes charge of the institution. Mr. Jones lately of Jackson, La., has a high reputation as a teacher.

Mansfield Female College.—The Advertisement has been enlarged with additional information—to which we refer. We understand the late commencement was a brilliant one. No report has as yet been forwarded us.

Commercial Merchants.—Miles Owen & Co., and A. H. May & Co., have been added to the list of our Commercial advertisements. These gentlemen, in their own words, purpose "a legitimate commission business." Our planting patrons will find it to their account in consulting that department of the paper.

A New Theory of Conversion.

Such is the rather startling head we put over a few remarks from a thoughtful friend—who writes too seldom—in the ministry. They were not designed for publication. We venture it. They are suggestive. That merit only, we claim for justification.—[Ed.

I feel that we need a revolution upon our own axis—and that the time has come to move for it. I believe in pushing Methodism on in new countries, by her usual means; but the same cultivation which suits a virgin soil will not do on old land. Here we must have a new mode of operation. In its forefront christianity attacks commun ties; but as it rolls on, it must leave its garrisons in more definite and fixed positions. The fruits of the camp-meeting are to be husbanded in neighboring churches, and these churches are to leaven the communities around them.

But where all has been done, while the church still holds out a hand to the continued impenitent, she must not look to these as the hope of her increase.—She must look to her own children, and these must be converted in childhood. We want a new theory of conversion;—the conversion of children. We have well nigh established in the world the right theory of an adult sinner's conversion. The high church Episcopalians are trying to establish a wrong one for children, to-wit: Baptismal Regeneration.—We must furnish the right one for this also.

But, back of all this is the lamentable want of piety among us, which forbids any active fruitfulness. Religion will make its own way when the current is strong enough; but when it congeals, it hangs like the icicle, in direct contrariety to all its former laws of motion. Or, to draw the figure from the different season of the year; when the current stops, it is not long till the pools are dried up also.

But where is our help? God is a very present help in trouble. We must draw on the original source. From Him must come the melting showers, "which passing over the valley of Baca make it a well, the rain also filleth the pools."

Death of A. D. Wooldridge.—This gentleman died in this city of consumption, after long illness, 29th August.—The Picayune says:

"Mr. Wooldridge was born in South Carolina, May 27, 1810, and received his education at the college in Columbia. In early life he associated himself with the Methodist Church, and studying divinity became a minister of that church. He however preached but seldom, but during his whole life acted upon the most sincere convictions of christian duty. He served as assistant postmaster of this city during the whole term of A. G. Penn as postmaster, and was appointed State Engineer by Gov. Johnson, and re-appointed by Gov. Walker. He was at one time, we believe, Professor of Ancient Languages in the college at Jackson, La."

While Professor at Jackson Mr. Wooldridge's doctrinal views underwent a change. He became a Unitarian and very promptly and properly gave up his credentials to the Mississippi Conference, of which he had been an acceptable member.

It may "concern" several who have sons in the Male Department at Summerfield to read a special notice from its worthy Principal—Rev. D. C. B. Connerly. His brethren grudge his loss from the "regular work," but Bro. C. works well anywhere.

Florida Conference.—Bishop Andrew has changed the time of holding to Dec. 24th, at Alligator.

Health.—There were on Thursday ten cases of yellow fever in the Charity Hospital and a few cases we heard of, in private practice.

Well Done.—Rev. Wm. A. Smyth of Sparta Circuit Louisiana Conference, says: "I have succeeded in circulating 100 copies of the Sunday School Visitor in the bounds of my circuit."

The priests of Lower Canada have just obtained, in the Superior Court, a judgment highly favorable to their pecuniary interests, namely that peas are grain and subject to the tithe.

The Caddo (Shreveport La.,) Gazette says: Rev. J. P. Ford has accepted the post of President of the Minden Female College, conferred with a unanimity and warmth which can but be flattering to his capacity for the responsible office.

The Natchez Courier records the election to the Presidency of the State University at Oxford, of the Rev. F. A. P. Barnard, late the Professor of Mathematics in the same institution, the duties of which position he will still perform in connection with those of the Presidency. Professor Crawford, of Georgia, was at the same time elected to the chair of Mental and Moral Sciences, etc., vacated by the resignation of President Longstreet.

There are few but are sometimes in a serious fit; but how few are in a serious frame; who have an abiding sense of God upon their hearts?

It is not talking, but walking with God, that gives a man the denomination of a christian.

Darkness may as well put on the name of light, as a wicked man the name of a christian.

It is our main business in this world to secure an interest in the next.

A serious remembrance of God is the fountain of obedience to God.

CORRESPONDENCE UP THE RIVER.

Boston Harbor—A Ship—Portland—White Mountains, their mission, perspective, ascent—Company—Wayside—Death-Forest—The Angle—Views in Cloud-Land—Tip-Top—A Gallinipper—Moss-Flower—Star Spangled Banner—Birth of a Thunder Storm—Return.

The packet which plies between Boston and Portland leaves "Long Wharf" at seven o'clock in the evening. The railway is direct and more expeditious, but by boat the traveler gets a view of Boston harbor, snuffs the salt breeze which steals over the deep, and is rocked soundly asleep by the gentle waves of the Atlantic.

If these considerations have due weight, he goes on board, and spends the long twilight on the bay whose surface is calm and unrippled. Standing out from the wharf are vessels at anchor, others moving out to sea, and spreading sail for distant shores, and others still, with press of canvass, have come from foreign lands, and are at the end of their voyages. A ship tied up and stripped of her canvass and colors always looks crest-fallen and melancholy. Her black hull crouches in sullen submission in the dock, and her naked spars are like skeleton wings divested of plumage and wasted to bone. But when under sail a ship is a beautiful and glorious thing. See yonder noble three master as the tug swings her around and conducts her seaward. At first she moves heavily, and with sluggish unwillingness the sails are gradually unfurled. From the top-gallants down, one by one, they are shaken out; cats-paw breezes play hide and seek in their idle and flapping folds, and the ponderous vessel treats them with unperturbed disdain. But now the wind awakes her slumbering power, the cordage creaks, the spars bend, the timbers groan. Dropping her steamer deliverer, she spreads her winged arms to embrace the breeze, and with wild delight courts the kisses of the free and buoyant waves. She is clothed with the grandeur of the element with which she contends. Neither depth nor expanse, nor agitation deter. She hurries onward to meet all that is terrible in danger, and all that is sublime in safety.

The steamer enters Portland harbor between day-break and sun rise; we breakfast in the city; and take the cars for Gorham, the nearest approach to the mountains by railroad. This is a mere station where a hotel is kept, and very pleasantly situated near the bank of the Androscoggin. Sometime before we come to Gorham the mountains rise up on either side to the clouds; and when there, we are at the foot of the great range of which Mount Washington is the highest. Taking stage at Gorham, an uphill road of eight miles, through wild and rugged scenery, brings the coach and its contents to the "Glen House." This is a good hotel and perhaps the most pleasant of all the resorts in the mountains. Its name is not a mis-nomer. It is in a glen, deep and secluded, around which the mountains rise, in undescribable grandeur. After dinner we survey those glorious monuments.

And here one might sit forever, unwearied with gazing, looking at nature in her loftiest mood, and feeling all the time a fulness of satisfaction that never surfeits. Nothing so completely fills the soul's craving for what is great and sublime. If all of God's works are means of education and development, the mountain is the last lesson in the school of nature. Its awful form is most God like, and most akin to eternity. This, it seems to me, is the mission of the mountain. It has the functions of an educator, whose mighty lessons have been going out "since the mountains were brought forth or ever God had formed the earth and the world." They have taught men liberty, and they have helped men to survey the heavens above, and the earth around. They have been consecrated to learning and religion; and history, romance and superatition have clothed them with the attributes of immortality. In Scripture they are symbols of the unchangeable and the everlasting. The law was given from Sinai and God manifested himself there in fire and cloud. Association leads the devout from the mountains round about Jerusalem, and from the high places of David, to mount Zion, the new Jerusalem, whose summit of light is the pilgrim's goal.

Besides the sense of sublime satisfactoriness, the view has variety and diversity. The sides of the mountains present lights and shades, different growths of wood, patches of snow and naked rock. The outlines of them are drawn against the sky in curves of beauty. Hogarth's idea of the line of beauty must have been taken from such a scene. Clouds are ever shifting position and trying to attain a comfortable adjustment about the tops, rolling up the sides and down again, hovering on the summits, and then moving away baffled in their attempts to secure a foothold.

Few visitors go away without making the ascent. Eight of the clock in the morning is the hour to start. The distance is eight miles. Horses are kept for the purpose and specially selected for their long experience and sure footedness. Twenty-five in company, ladies and gentlemen, are in saddle and off at the hour. Two guides one in front and one in the rear, and well provided with horse shoes accompany the miscellaneous squadron. A carriage road has been constructed about five miles, but will probably never reach the top. It is well cut through rocks and timber, and nicely Macadamised.—As far as it goes the ascent is pleasant. The scenery is wild and fresh, the mineral world sparkles with crystalizations at our feet, and great boulders, which look as if recently precipitated from the heights above, throw their shadows across the path. The larch, the pine, and the silver birch flourish in the meagre soil; and shrubs, flowers and birds, contribute to the general enjoyment.

As we proceed vegetable growth dwindles, all at once, and but three or four miles from our point of departure, we come to a forest literally struck with death. They are the corpses of trees, ghastly, leafless, and dead. It is the picture of all that is desolate. There is no living thing, neither quadruped, nor bird, nor even insect. Through this a half mile or more, the road is at its end, and all timber disappears.—Hence to the top several miles ahead, we proceeded in single file, along the most perilous bridle path the most of us ever ventured to pursue. It is worse than riding up a flight of stairs, sometimes at an anglo of ninety degrees, and ever exceedingly rough and abrupt. Occasionally we make a braced landing, where the weary horses are permitted to breathe, while their riders turn and survey the magnificent prospects. We are high enough to look down into the great gulf and across to other ranges which help to make it. We begin to be in cloud land. They form at the top and come down upon us in avalanches of mist; then they sweep across through the gorges and intersect our path; and anon, they creep up the acclivities and surround us, while rain-bows play in their curly locks. Onward and upward through clouds and amidst a world of granite, till at last in clear sunshine we halt upon the very top, seven thousand feet above the ocean, and the highest eminence in New England. After three weary hours of break-neck excitement, we sit upon the tower which stands upon the very tip-top.

And what scenes, and how indescribable! Better excuse ourselves from the task! All the adjectives, superlatives, and extravagances of this "up river correspondence" should have been saved for this occasion. The upper Mississippi, Niagara and the Hudson made into a chowder of sublimity would only equal it. Strange to be a matter of record, but a fact; the only form of winged life is a musqueto, a real Lake Borgno gallinipper, and at his work, sucking the life blood out of me. Sublime insect; and welcome. The only form of vegetable life is moss, and a delicate moss flower, as modest in its habits as the violet, and not very unlike the heliotrope in appearance. The area of the summit is about one acre, and composed of granite fragments, piled up and strewn about in ragged confusion. Not the least of these subordinates is the Star Spangled Banner, which waves over our heads. If the poet's conception be just, this was its birth place,

"When freedom from her mountain height
Unfurled her standard to the air,
She tore the azure robe of night,
And set the stars of glory there."

Here are two stone houses for the accommodation of visitors, high as your head, and built like the primitive altars, without hewing or mortar. One contains sleeping apartments and is called "the summit house," the other, "the tip-top house," and is consecrated to cooking and eating. The latter is tip-top in location, and in nothing else.

From this point the superiority of Mount Washington is most apparent. From the Glen House there are three mountains apparently equal in size and elevation, but the greater distance creates the mistake. We can now look down upon them and over their tops. Half a dozen times in the year good clear days favor the traveler. Then the ocean to eastward is visible, and the valley of the Connecticut to the west. Ours was better than the average, but not the best. It was enough. The scenes change constantly. Now above the clouds and with the blue sky over us, nothing is visible below but thick fog cloud, whose waves of mist wash the brow of the peak on which we are, and stretch in one unbroken gloomy expanse, around far as the eye can reach. Suddenly the great deep is broken up; a clear spot opens here and there through which we see the lower world; then the mist condenses, and reaches down into the notches and gulfs; or driven by opposing currents of wind, it boils and whirls in the vapory abyss like a mighty cauldron. Now for a space all is clear, in our immediate neighborhood and the horizon is walled in by those towering cloud structures whose snow white heads rise in awful majesty. Lightnings dart from their inky basis, and the thunder comes from them pealing across the vale and echoing amongst the heights. It is the birth hour of a thunder storm. These monsters unite, their identity is lost in one huge dark mass, and this at length is broken and separated by contact with the mountains or by rapid condensation. But these aspects of nature as we saw her here must be dismissed. Difficult as is the ascent the return is more so. It requires good horsemanship, and firm nerves. The old grey that carried Woodsman and his fortunes deserves honorable mention; how he made not one false step in all the trip, carried his rider through storm and cloud, and paths most appalling to look at, and looked glad when his day's work was done.

REVIVALS.

Willow Springs, Miss., Aug. 23, 1856.

I have just closed a protracted meeting at Willow Springs, at which God's presence was gloriously seen and felt among the people. Our meeting continued nine days. About thirty were added to the church and a goodly number were happily converted. The membership were much revived, and some who had grown cold were renewed in their first love. Bro. D. A. J. Parker was with us, nearly all the time Bros. Owens and Booth were with us part of the time. For the encouragement of the friends of Zion you may give this notice.

G. H. CLANTON.

Ocean Springs, Alabama Conference, Aug. 29.

I tell the Lord's people something of the hallowed influence of the Spirit among the citizens of Ocean Springs.—Since we had the pleasure of hearing the gospel expounded by yourself at the beginning of this meeting and regretted that you could not stay longer with us, we have been assisted by other ministers: Revs. J. B. Walker, Stricklin, of Biloxi, Smith, of Pass Christian, and Bro. Bowen a Baptist minister residing here and Bro. Farrell, a local preacher of this place. Whereas the membership, at the Quarterly meeting consisted of only seven, now we number thirty six. There have been many conversions. The meeting continued two weeks.

J. T. M. GREGORY.

Lake Providence, La., Aug. 29, 1856.

We protracted our camp-meeting until Wednesday morning after you left, and such sweetness of religious enjoyment as pervaded the hearts of the people I never witnessed in such continuous showers. There was less of earth and more of heaven than I ever saw within the space of five days.

Thirty seven joined the church.—Thirty five professed religion, some fifteen professed the blessing of perfect love, two ministers of the gospel among the number.

Good order prevailed: to the last not a reproof was given during the meeting for disorderly conduct.

A few such camp-meetings well distributed through the State would tell powerfully and prosperously on the fortunes of our Zion.

N. A. CRAVENS.

Marianna, Florida, Aug. 26, 1856.

The Lord has blessed his vineyard planted in this place. Rev. S. P. Richardson, of the Florida Conference, and Bible Agent, came among us and labored. The Spirit came. After fifteen days labor the vineyard looks in order and thrifty. Fifteen branches were ingrafted into the living vine by saving faith. Several branches turned out on the commous for their unfruitfulness, where the bulls of Bashan twisted and pawed them, and the wild boar of the forest scarred them with his tusks, were pruned and set to rights. The streams of life, now flush by the recent showers of divine grace, are spreading over the thirsty land.

E. PHILIPS.

Eufaula District, Alabama Conference.

We have some encouraging prospects on this District. On most of the appointments the Lord's name is glorified in the church. About four hundred souls have testified. "He hath power on earth to forgive sins." May the number be largely increased.

S. F. PILLEY.

Argus Circuit, Alabama Conference.

We have been visited lately with a most gracious revival on Argus Circuit. Many have found peace in believing, and a goodly number added to the church. We have begun to roll the missionary car and hope to do something.

J. A. SPENCE.

Bliss in Dying.—"Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord." My soul, is this blessedness thine in prospect? Art thou ready, if called this night, to lie down on thy death-pillow, sweetly to fall asleep in Jesus? What is the sting of death? It is sin. Is death then, to thee, robbed of its sting, through your having listened to the gracious accents of pardoning love?—Be of good cheer; thy sins, which are many, are all forgiven thee. If thou hast made up thy peace with God, resting on the work and atoning blood of his dear Son, then is the "last enemy" divested of all his terror, and thou canst say, in sweet composure of the dying couch and dying hour, "I will both lay me down in peace and sleep, because thou, Lord, only makest me dwell in safety."

DOMESTIC MISSIONS.

Dayton Mission, Alabama Conference.

The third quarter has been one of varied success. At a majority of the appointments we have done well, at some very well; but at others but little of anything has been accomplished beyond the instructions received by the children, and our not "ceasing to pray for them," and to "teach them the good and the right way." Twenty-five have been received on probation and seven by certificate; twenty adults and fourteen children have been baptized; two have been expelled; two have died—one in triumph, the other without warning.—The spirit of grace and awakening has laid hold on some of the most wicked and influential negroes in the mission. We have had one interesting and successful two days' meeting, at Bro. Catlin's church, below Dayton. The people on his lower plantation, and those on one of Sister Cade's, and one of Sister Thompson's (now deceased,) are connected with the stated preaching at this place; but at this meeting most of the people of four or five other plantations belonging to the proprietors, were present. When the meeting was appointed the proprietors all expected to be with us; but, alas, death had taken off the good mistress and devoted christian Sister Thompson, and disease prevented others, so that we had but two whites with us at all—Bro. Catlin and Dr. Syd. Smith.

Would that we had the privilege of holding similar meetings for all our people, but with some for whom we preach it is a mere matter of permission. They do not enter heartily into the work with us, nor do they allow us to do so. We have to do as we can, and in some instances to contend with undercurrent influences from those in charge. Some of the overseers are unfriendly to our cause—one has forbid our preaching on his place any more. The Lord lay not the sin to their charge who will not enter into the kingdom of heaven themselves, and prevent those who would from entering in.

A. M'URYDE,
F. JETER.

August 15, 1856.

The gate which leads to life is a strait gate, therefore we should fear; it is an open gate, therefore we should hope.

Four things a christian should especially labor after, viz: to be humble and thankful, watchful and cheerful.

If we would not fall into things unlawful, we must sometimes deny ourselves in those that are lawful.

The ordinances of God are the means of salvation; but the God of ordinances is the author of salvation.

A conceit of knowledge is the greatest enemy to knowledge, and the greatest argument of ignorance.

Improve the wit you have bought at a dear rate, and the wisdom you have gained by sad experience.

Lukewarmness is the best natural, but the worst spiritual temper a man can be in.

They that presume most in prosperity are soonest subject to despair in adversity.

A word of kindness is a seed which, when dropped by chance, springs up a flower.

If you forget God when you are young, God may forget you when you are old.

Make your calling sure, and your election is sure.

Uneven walking, with a neglect of watching, makes a disconsolate soul.

Salvation then draws near to man when it is his main care.

Religion must be our business, then it will our delight.

It will cost something to be religious, it will cost more not to be so.

A christian's life is nothing else but a short trial of his graces.

Let the body wait upon the soul, and both wait upon God.

It is a voluntary cannot that keeps the soul from God.

Hints on Reading the Scriptures in the Pulpit.

Reading, both of hymns and the Scriptures is an important part of pulpit service; one, however, which, so far as regards the Scriptures is too frequently dispensed with. This was a principal part of the worship of the ancient Jewish Synagogue. Why should it not hold a place higher than it does in the modern Christian Church? If it be said, the people all have Bibles now, which they can read at home.—And would they not read them more at home, if they were read more to them at church? Or, if it should be said audiences generally manifest little interest in reading of the Scriptures from the pulpit, and consequently we cannot hope that they will be very much benefitted by it; then we ask further, whether their lack of interest in the listening is not owing in a great measure to the minister's seeming lack of interest in the reading? It is notorious that ordinary promiscuous audiences will manifest little interest in the best of sermons, prosily and carelessly read to them; and that when the preacher awakes, they awake with him. Why should it be otherwise with the reading even of the best portions of the Scripture? In the latter as in the former case, much, very much depends on manner. Who does not know that some persons will excite as much interest in an audience by reading a chapter of hard names in Chronicles, as some others will by reading the glowing descriptions of the judgment sceae in Matthew or the Apocalypse.

One thing is to read from the pulpit what a critic on commas and semicolons would call well; another to read impressively. Between these two, there is all the difference that exists between mechanism and spiritualism—body and soul. Apostolic reading, like preaching, is that which stirs men's hearts.

But the importance of reading effectually has hitherto been greatly overlooked—so greatly that perhaps almost any ministerial reader of this article, if he take the most familiar hymn he ever read, "Arise, my soul arise," for instance, examine it carefully and rehearse it a few times in view of the most full and forcible expression of its exact sentiment, will be astonished to find how many folds its effect may be multiplied. Hardly less surprised will he be at the fact of his having read it so powerlessly, than old father Tingley was when he awoke in the pulpit and found that he had never been converted. Nor will he then fail to study to render himself more efficient in this important department of his pulpit labors. And in proportion as he does this, will he find less and less cause to complain of the listlessness of his hearers.

It does not come within the designed limits of this article to point out the faults of pulpit reading. Suffice it to say that one of the most important of these will have been remedied when the Scriptures shall be read neither mechanically nor mouthedly, but rightly on, as though the sentiments be more generally believed and felt by, not listless, but listening auditories. Evidences will then open, full and clear, that not only the words of a sermon, but the words of Inspiration, have far more power with men when uttered sympathetically and forcibly.

To read the Scriptures thus will doubtless require no small effort on the part of many. The prosy preacher will often find it less difficult to break up his habit of prosy preaching, than the prosy reader his habit of prosy reading. So inveterate, in many cases has this become, that it is likely to break only when the body breaks down in death. Yet is the hope reasonable that every sincere incumbent of the pulpit strive earnestly for whatever can in any way increase his ministerial efficiency.—[Free Will Baptist.

A Wonderful Relic.—In cutting through Oliver Street, for the purpose of exteoding the Bowery, says the New York Express, of the 25th, a tombstooe was uncovered and a perfect skull found beneath it. The inscription was in Hebrew characters, and after being submitted to the inspection of many learned citizens of the Israelitish persuasion, it was decyphered to be the name "Greoada," while the date runs back over 300 years. This is a monumental relic of many years before the discovery of America, and should not escape the attention, not only of the city authorities, but of all interested in local antiquities.

Harper's New Catalogue.—A New Descriptive Catalogue of Harper & Brothers' Publications is now ready for distribution, and may be obtained gratuitously on application to the publishers personally, or by letter enclosing six cents in postage stamps.

The attention of gentlemen, in town or country, designing to form Libraries or enrich their literary collections, is respectfully invited to this Catalogue, which will be found to comprise a large portion of the standard and most esteemed works in English Literature—comprehending more than two thousand volumes—which are offered in most instances at less than one half the cost of similar productions in England.

Librarians and others connected with Colleges, Schools, &c., who may not have access to a reliable guide in forming a correct estimate of literary productions, it is believed the present Catalogue will prove especially valuable as a manual of reference.

To prevent disappointment, it is suggested that, whenever books can not be obtained through any bookseller or local agent, applications with remittance should be addressed direct to the Publishers, which will be promptly attended to.

For the benefit of the invalid portion of our community, we extract the following from the Almanac of Dr. C. M. Jackson, proprietor of HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS, hoping it may induce a trial of them:

J. C. RILES says:

SHEFFIELD, Ill., March 19, 1855.

I expect to sell great quantities of your Bitters this year. Many of my customers speak very highly of its good qualities, having proved itself most an excellent Fever and Ague preventative, a great purifier of the blood, and the very best thing known to aid digestion and create a good natural appetite. In short, I am sure it is one of the very best medicines known to my family use, being safe and pleasant for any one to take.

C. L. D. CROCKWELL says:

ARANDSA, Iowa, May 1, 1854.

The Bitters give unbounded satisfaction to all that have used them, and I do not can always recommend them to all that are afflicted. They have cured many cases of Dyspepsia, some of the worst where hundreds of dollars have been spent for remedies which afforded no relief, and were considered incurable until they used the Bitters. See advertisement. au16 1mdW&A Few are aware how frequently publishers are compelled to insert among their advertisements testimonials which they can neither sanction or believe.

A pleasant exception to this disagreeable necessity are the advertisements of DR. J. C. AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL and PILLS, which will be found in our columns. We have published for him before, and always with the feeling that in so doing we in no wise lend ourselves to deceive or mislead the public, for we have had indisputable proof that his words are strictly true, with abundant reasons to believe that his medicines will do all they promise, and all that can be reasonably expected from any medicine. His Cherry Pectoral is too well known to need any commendation from us, and the Pills, we are credibly informed, are not inferior to his Pectoral.—Intelligencer (R. I.) Mirror.

They are for sale by J. WRIGHT & CO., and all our city druggists.

Great Cure of Piles.—Camden, N. J., Oct. 12th, 1855.—Dear Sir: It is with much pleasure I take the opportunity of informing you of the great benefit I have received from the use of a few bottles of "Hoofland's German Bitters." For a number of years I have been sorely and severely afflicted with pain in the stomach, attended by severe attacks of the Piles, for which I tried a great many remedies, but without affording me any relief. Being advised to use the GERMAN BITTERS, I did so, owing in connection for the Piles, my KEPSHERARD OINTMENT, and I now inform you that my pains entirely cured me and restored me to health, and I would advise all the afflicted to use your valuable medicines.

Respectfully yours, MARGARET REPSHER,

COMMERCIAL.

ANNUAL COMMERCIAL STATEMENT,

For the Year Ending September 1, 1856.

CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE OFFICE,
New Orleans, Sept. 1, 1856.

The Commercial Year which has just closed has been a period of unusual activity in our general market, and remarkable, too, for the high prices generally obtained for our leading articles of trade. The crops of nearly all kinds of produce have been very abundant (the principal exceptions being Sugar and Molasses) and a fair proportion of them has found a market, this port, the navigation of both the upper and lower rivers has been interrupted much less than usual. A reference to the following tables, which follow under appropriate heads, will show an increase in the receipts of several of our leading articles of Southern Cotton, Flour and all descriptions of Grain, while a few articles are less, the receipts have fallen off greatly, and, Notwithstanding the Western Produce a small decrease is shown. The staple here ranged large supplies of Cotton, prices for that article during most descriptions of the year than last year, but the market for the increased arrivals, and Produce here have been influenced, though the depression has not been as great as might have been expected. A large advance in the rates generally have been lower. Sugar and Molasses during the season of the year, though Sugar and Molasses during the latter part of the year, though from Cuba. Our tables give full information with regard to the range of prices of the leading articles of trade during the year, by increased importations and by increased exportations with regard to the former, compiling them with those of last year.

COTTON.—The Cotton crop brought to market during the last year has been the largest ever produced, and the receipts at this port show a corresponding increase compared with previous years. We estimate the total crop at 3,500,000 bales, of which 1,764,613 have been received at New Orleans, inclusive of 55,228 bales from Mobile and the seaports of Texas and Florida. The exports of the year embrace 1,793,815 bales, of which 994,777 to Great Britain; 245,873 to France; 138,146 to the North of Europe; 201,776 to other foreign ports; and 212,244 to domestic ports North. The stock remaining on hand this day, including all in presses and pickeries, and on shipboard not cleared is 9312 bales. The total crop last year was 2,847,330, and the receipts at this port were 1,287,888 bales, including 37,18 from Mobile, Texas and Florida. The exports last year embraced 1,274,629 bales, including 718,809 to Great Britain; 178,16 to France; 64,091 in the North of Europe; 109,125 to other foreign ports; and 203,868 to domestic ports North. The stock on hand on the 1st of September, 1855, was 40,337 bales. An increase is shown in the total receipts of fully 650,000 bales in the receipts of this port of 477,000, and in the exports of 255,968 bales to Great Britain; 67,727 to France; 74,165 to the North of Europe; 92,09[illegible] to other foreign ports; and 518,543 to domestic ports, making a total increase in Exports of 510,187 bales.

The Old Church Road.

BY WM. D. BRANWAR.

Winding through the evergladeS,
Where my school-boy sorrows were laid—
Near the meadow where the bees
In all their thrift to every breeze—
Where the woodland flowers bloom—
Wafting all their sweet perfume—
Guarded by a cottage door,
Oh, how I my home no more—
Leading to the house of God,
In the Ancient Old Church Road.

Nestled in a bower of green,
Under eaves to study seen,
Like a sentry from on high,
Pointing upward to the sky.
In that quiet sanctuaude,
Cherished with the sun and shade,
Stands the church where first I trod
In the way that leads to God;
Now I drop life's weary load
Up the Old Church Road.

I have come to see once more
The dear haunts I loved of yore.
Companions of my early years,
Where are now your smiles and tears—
Sunday of welcome, tears of joy,
Greeting hence the long lost boy?
Silence pallid the listening ear,
No familiar voice is here.
On the grave-stone gray and cold,
The sad tale is briefly told:
They have spent their latest breath
In the holiday of death;
Tired with life they fell asleep,
Leaving me alone to weep.
Who would fain lay down life's load
With them, near the Old Church Road.

Cruel death try let me down
This is but an idle dream!
There was one—oh! heart be still!
Went to wander near the rill,
Murmuring yet along the glade,
Where our plighted vows were made;
There was one, the maiden queen,
Robed in white as the spleen ocean,
Who had strayed from Paradise,
With the sparkling of its skies
Beaming in her dewy eyes.
Never more must I rejoice
In the music of her voice,
Meet the pilgrim's lonely tread
When her echoes o'er the dead.
As he many his last abode
On the blessed Old Church Road.

Where the modest violets bloom
In the shadow of her tomb,
Hail the way-worn wanderer rest,
Deeming death a welcome guest!
Life's last sleep were passing sweet,
When the dust with thine shall meet.
There beneath the self-same sod,
Lay him near the Old Church Road.

FOUR DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

ARRIVAL OF STEAMSHIP NORTH AMERICAN.

The Royal mail steamship North American, from Liverpool on Wednesday the 13th ult., arrived at Quebec on the morning of the 24th.

The Cunard steamship Niagara arrived out at Liverpool on the morning of the 11th ult.

From Great Britain there is no political news of the least importance.

The Emperor of France had returned to Paris, but was to leave again immediately for the Baths of Biarritz.

The London papers notice certain extraordinary movements that circulate in Paris respecting affairs at the Tuileries, and call on the Emperor to stop the rumors.

The French have gained another victory over the Kabyles in Algeria.

The telegraph from Madrid simply mentions that there is nothing new, and that quiet is reported throughout Spain.

Reporters had taken suitable leave of the Queen.

Gen. Serrano is appointed Spanish Minister to Paris.

O'Donnell had not published the programme of his Ministry.

The Russians have noticed that they are ready to give up Kars to the Turks.

Russia still maintains that the Island of Serpents belongs to her, and it is rumored that Napoleon has sent a supplementary note to be inserted in the treaty to confer the point.

France has officially notified her adherence to the doctrine propounded by the Congress of Paris respecting the rights of neutrals and arbitration.

Distressing accounts had been received from Madrid in regard to the prevalence of the cholera in that city.

E. Walewski and the Duke Pellesier are to distribute the Turkish medals to the French army. Only the wounded and invalids are to be permitted to receive the medals. Walewski had resumed his functions as Minister of Foreign Affairs. Pellesier had a long audience of the Emperor on his arrival in Paris.

The Algerian correspondent describes a recent successful attack by a column of 8,000 men on a strongly posted force of Rebera Kabyles.

"There are many interesting extracts from the editorial columns of the London Star:

"There are now in Paris 29 large prisons floating all over Paris almost the size of those established at the Tuileries, which it is very much to be hoped are constantly without foundation. Moreover, the disturbances seem to increase from day to day. It is doubt the Legitimist and Republican parties by which it is said that the stories do not lose excitement, and that the agitation will not cease.

"We are sorry to add that the character of the Emperor herself continues to be cruelly exposed. Now that the Emperor returns to Paris, it ought to be his and the duty to bring the authors of these calumnies to justice.

The Lancet.

The weather is the best in the south of France, and was proceeding in the center and north. It prevailed the largest in the Garonne and along the Loire; but magnificent in every part of the country north of the last river. The new wheat promises to market was of a superior quality. There were large arrivals of wheat at Marseilles.

The Paris papers announce that the Northern Government of railway lines to connecting upward of three thousand miles.

Another of the Russian Nord, the Czar's coronation will take place on September 7, (new style.)

London, Tuesday Evening, 13th.—The great pianoforte factory of Broadwood & Sons is now on fire at Westminster. The building, and a large portion of the valuable stock, is destroyed.

Portsmouth, Tuesday, 12th.—The Royal squadron arrived at 11 o'clock this morning, and the yacht with her Majesty and the Royal family on board entered the Solent and dropped anchor near Mount Edgecombe.

Liverpool, Tuesday Evening, 13th.—There was no change in the money in the Stock Exchange on Monday, but in the discount market the demand was still active. In Paris on Monday the Three Per Cents were done at 70 to 90.

India and China.—Telegraph advices anticipatory of the mail for the mail had been received. The dates are to July 10 from Bombay, where exchange was quoted at 2 1-16. Money was easier and Freights had a Trade was quiet.

At Calcutta exchange was steady and produce dull. Freights low. American shipmasters accepted 48 per ton to the United States.

Madeira.—The West India mail conveyed disastrous accounts from Madeira. In Funchal alone there had been 5,000 cases of cholera and 1,500 deaths, out of a population of 30,000. There was a deficiency of medicines and doctors, and the dead remained unburied. Fires were kept burning to mitigate the pestilence arising from the putrifying bodies.

John A. Merlin, for many years United States Consul at Lisbon, died on the 3d instant, after an illness of only eight hours duration.

THREE DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

ARRIVAL OF THE NIAGARA AT HALIFAX.

The Royal mail steamship Niagara, Capt. Leitch, from Liverpool on the 14th ult., arrived at Halifax on the evening of the 25th.

The screw steamer Canadian, from Quebec, arrived at Liverpool on the 14th. A lamentable accident occurred on board the Canadian, on the homeward passage. The Rev. W. Marsh drank in mistake a quantity of disinfecting fluid, and, notwithstanding every care, it proved fatal. His body was taken to Liverpool, and an inquest was held upon it.

The Cunard steamship Persia, from New York on the 6th of August, arrived off the bar at the entrance to the river Mersey at 5:15 P. M., on Friday the 12th, the passage being called 8 days 23½ hours, meantime.

Great Britain.

From every part of the United Kingdom, the harvest reports are of a favorable character, and but little doubt is now entertained that the grain crops will be at least a fair average in quantity and quality. In Scotland the crops are very heavy. With respect to potatoes, there is a general consciousness of evidence that the crop, though not entirely free from disease in some parts of England, Ireland and Scotland, promises to be abundant and excellent. The late rains have been very beneficial to green crops. Harvest operations are now general and so much labor is wanted that farmers have enabled railway contractors, who find themselves compelled to suspend, for the present, all but their pressing contracts on the public works, Sir Morton Peto, in a letter, suggests that the Government would act most wisely if it would permit the engineers stationed in the rural districts to imitate the example of the French soldiers, and earn wages by helping to get in corn.

In the political world, there is nothing worth reporting.

Miss Nightingale has returned to her home in Derbyshire, avoiding all public demonstrations of welcome.

France.

Friday, the 15th ult., the Emperor's fete took place. Salutes were fired at 6 o'clock in the morning and at 6 o'clock in the evening. At midday Mass was celebrated in the Notre Dame in the presence of the dignitaries of the State. The Te Deum was sung in all the churches of France. The afternoon, from 2 o'clock to 6, was devoted to dramatic representations of military events, balloon ascents, and various kinds of games. There was an evening concert in the garden of the Tuileries, and other gardens, and the place Concorde were illuminated with colored lanterns. At 9 o'clock there was a display of fireworks at the Barriere de l'Etoile and the Barrier du Trone.

The Moniteur published a decree opening a credit of five hundred and twenty-two thousand francs for the payment of the interest and sinking fund of the share guaranteed by France on the Greek Loan of 1833.

Marshal Pellesier's title is Duke of the Malakoff, with a pension of one hundred thousand francs per annum.

M. Rouland has been appointed Minister of Public Instruction.

Spain.

The news from Spain is wholly uninteresting. We have a report in the Gazette de France, but which requires confirmation, that disturbances had arisen at Cadiz in disarming the National Guard, but with this exception, the general disarming is everywhere being carried out without resistance. The fears entertained of scarcity were diminishing.

Portugal.

Government has sent the war steamer Mindello to Madeira with a cargo of provisions and medical stories.

Cholera was increasing at Lisbon.

Italy.

A report was circulated in the Paris Bourse that there had been an attempt at insurrection in Naples; it was not, however, true, and from the precautions taken to repress any attempt at rising, is not likely. The secret liberal press has, however, just issued another proclamation to the people, calling on them to agitate firmly and quietly.

Garribaldi publishes in a Genoa paper a letter, saying that he has just discovered that the gallant Roman, Ceccruacchio, his two young sons and five other victims, who were reported to have escaped, were shot in cold blood by the Austrians in 1849, at La Contarina, and that the massacre was concealed. This statement has created great excitement throughout Italy.

It was reported that the submarine cable from Sardinia to Algiers was broken and lost in the laying. The accident, it, was subsequently stated, however, was not so serious.

A private dispatch from Hamburg states that there is some movement going on among the Orleanists. The Duchess of Orleans, the Duke of Chartres, with M. Thiers and their suites, had left that city for Ostend, in consequence of a dispatch received from England.

The Black Sea.

The English war steamer Gladiator has returned from the Isle of Serpents to Constantinople, and reports on the island fifty Turkish and eight Russian soldiers.

There was no armed seizure of the island, as was reported. The island is nothing but a bare rock of very limited size, and contains only one building, with the Turks and Russians living together, and the latter are treated by the former as their guests.

The Gladiator had left again for the Black Sea with new instructions of a more positive nature. The English press protests strongly against the indifference expressed by the French Government as to whether the Isle of Serpents belongs to Russia or Turkey. The proof that the Isle of Serpents, called also Fidonisi, is very valuable is, that all the Allied fleets made it a rendezvous before landing the army at Eupatoria.

The remains of the Allied fleet have not yet left, and France and Turkey having no disposable ships, four English ships have joined Admiral Stewart's squadron, now cruising before Baltschik.

The evacuation of Turkish territory by French troops terminated on the 15th, and the Gendarmerie would leave by the 18th. Tekeddin Pasha is appointed Governor of Kars.

The Archbishop of Kherson and Talvrida has formally consecrated the south side of Sebastopol preparatory to its being rebuilt.

The harvest in Asia is reported bad, but considerable stores remain from last year.

Latest by Mail.

Gen. La Marmora has in the name of the King of Sardinia, invited Gen. Canrobert, who is at the Sardinian watering place to visit Turin. According to Italian correspondence the Neapolitan army is greatly dissatisfied with the Government.

The concessions made by the Russian Government professedly to facilitate the imports of foreign goods, amount to very little, and relate to such matters as abridging the time allowed between the delivering in of a decision of contents and the deposit of the goods in the bonding warehouses at St. Petersburg.

The Journal of Vienna states that as soon as the Austrian Cabinet was informed of the indisposition of Russia to restore Kars and the occupation of the Island of Serpents, it addressed an energetic remonstrance to the Cabinet of St. Petersburg. The right of the Porte to Serpents' Isle was recognized.

Latest by Telegraph.

Saturday, August 16.—Her Majesty and the Royal family returned to Osborne, from Plymouth, yesterday.

The Divan has received a formal renunciation of the Russian Government's claim to the Isle of Serpents. Karks will be delivered up immediately to the Turks.

The Daily News remarks that for these two acts on the part of Russia, there is said to be little doubt that we are in a great measure indebted to Lord Palmerston. The London Times' city article, dated Friday evening, says the English funds continue to show a total absence of fluctuation. The demand for money in the Stock Exchange was rendered more active by the foreign stock, and share settlement out of doors. And at the Banks of England, there was likewise an increased enquiry into foreign exchanges, without change in rates.

Louisiana Intelligence.

The Plaquemine Sentinel of Saturday last has the following:

A few days after the gale of the 10th, Mr. C. W. Keep, of Grosse Tete, being desirous of visiting Plaquemine, got in a skiff with his family, at his plantation above Johnston's store, and came down stream the whole of the way to Plaquemine. The rarity of this occurrence will be better understood when we inform the reader that bayou Plaquemine, down which he came some ten miles, runs directly opposite, usually, on a fall of twelve feet in as many miles. The water running in an opposite direction for a week after the storm (the bayou being previously dry) was caused by the great overflow from the sea—swelling the lakes and bayous, and then pouring its waters out into the Mississippi through bayou Plaquemine, and emptying into the river with the roar of a cataract. The water was brackish, proving that it came from the Gulf, and in the bayou were found a number of crabs and other salt water inhabitants.

The Thibodaux Minerva of the same date has the following items:

The Lafourche is alarmingly low at this time. We learn that, at Lockport, the citizens are constructing an awning to cover in order to prevent it from entirely drying up.

Mr. E. T. Burnham, contractor of the Thibodaux bridge, commenced operations on Monday last. He has already constructed a shop for his workmen, and will commence the foundation of the pillars at an early day. Water permitting, the bridge will be completed by March next.

Army Worm and Caterpillar.—By the following extracts from our exchanges from the interior of this State and Mississippi, our readers will learn that the caterpillar and army worm have made their appearance in cotton fields in various vicinities.

The Natchitoches Chronicle, of the 23d says:

The picking of cotton has commenced in earnest in our parish. As we stated sometime since, the yield of cotton throughout the whole parish, will not exceed the half of a usual crop. Upon several plantations in our vicinity the caterpillar has made its appearance and is doing its work of destruction.

The Alexandria Democrat, of the 29th says:

The cotton in the upper part of this parish is literally eaten up by the caterpillar—the stalks are as free from foliage as they usually are at Christmas. The bool worm has also made its appearance, and its ravages are said to be terrible on some plantations. The weather is most intensely hot and dry.

The DeSoto Columbian, of the 23d, has the following:

The weather still continues hot and dry—the health of our parish is good. The caterpillars, which made their appearance a few days since in our neighborhood, are doing but little damage. This is, perhaps, owing to the fact that the fields are too hot for comfort. Our planters are now busily engaged picking cotton. On some farms, 150 to 200 lbs. per hand is daily gathered, and from the best information we can get, a fair crop of cotton will be made in our parish.

The Port Gibson, (Miss.) Herald, of the 29th says:

The army worm is in our county. It is, so far as we can learn, confined to a few plantations, but will undoubtedly spread. A few days of cloudy weather would increase their ravages, whilst the continuance of the present dry and hot weather will limit them in their operations.

The Reveille, published at the same place, on the 28th, says:

There seems to be no doubt of the appearance of this dreaded foe to the cotton plant in our county. We have had several stalks of cotton brought to our office, exhibiting the worm in its different forms, and showing very great destruction. We hope it may not extend its ravages, for the prospect is certainly not flattering for an abundant crop should the worm become general.

The house of Mr. Rufus Rhodes, of East Pascagoula, was destroyed by fire last Wednesday night. One of Mr. Rhodes' children, an infant, was seriously burned by a spark falling on its dress. All the furniture the house contained was consumed by the flames, which was supposed to have been caused by an incendiary. Mr. Rhodes' loss, we understand, will not be severe, as most of the property was insured.

CONGRESSIONAL.

Washington, Aug. 28.—The Committee of Conference on the Army bill being unable to agree, the House again adhered to the proviso by four majority, and tabled a motion to reconsider.

Washington, Aug. 29.—The Senate adhered to its amendment to the Army bill.

Crittenden's bill was discussed.

A memorial from the Texas Legislature asking Congress to interfere in behalf of Judge Terry, now in the custody of the Vigilance Committee of San Francisco, was referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Arrival of the Illinois.

New York, Aug. 29.—The Illinois has arrived, bringing $1,465,000 in treasure.

CENTRAL AMERICAN QUESTION.

Washington, Aug. 29.—The New York Herald contains a long letter professing to give the terms of the adjustment of the Central American Question.

The treaties signed between Clarendon and Herran, the Plenipotentiary from Honduras, are—

First—A general treaty of amity and commerce.

Second—A provision for a leonvention for the adjustment of all claims of British subjects in Honduras, and for the extinction of any Indian Mosquito titles within the territory recognized as pertaining to Honduras.

Third—A convention for the restoration of Bay Islands to the sovereignty of Honduras. The latter stipulates, on behalf of the people who have established themselves there under the British occupancy, certain rights and privileges.

The ground upon which the restoration was made, is the importance of preserving neutral the route of the proposed inter-oceanic railway through Honduras.

The same letter also states that it has been agreed between Lord Clarendon and Mr. Dallas that Greytown shall return to the sovereignty of Nicaragua, and that the limits of Belize shall extend southward to the Sarstoon river.

Fever at New York.

New York, Aug. 30.—The yellow fever is abating at Fort Hamilton.

Declines to Run.

Boston, Aug. 30.—Amos A. Lawrence, who was nominated by the Whigs and Americans for Governor, declines running.

CONGRESSIONAL.

THE ARMY BILL FINALLY PASSED.

Columbia, S. C., Sept. 3.—It is reported that the House of Representatives yielded on Saturday night and passed the Army Appropriation bill without the Kansas proviso.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

Washington, Sept. 1.—On Saturday night the House yielded and passed the Army Appropriation bill, by a majority of three, without the Kansas proviso.

Congress immediately adjourned sine die.

The Arsenal Workmen Restored.

The workmen discharged from the Arsenals by order of the War Department will be immediately restored to their places.

Kansas Affairs.

The President has promised the Kansas National Committee to protect the territory from invasion, and to guarantee fairness in the coming elections.

Advices from Kansas state that the Southerners are fortifying Wakarusa.

It is stated that the Freesoilers have captured Tecumseh, and that thirty-three pro-slavery men were killed.

Acting Gov. Woodson has declared the Territory in a state insurrection.

Lane has three parties stationed on the Iowa line to receive supplies, and to protect a retreat.

Havana Intelligence.

The steamship Louisiana having brought up the Empire City's mails on Saturday night, we have received full files of Havana papers to the 24th ultimo. They, however, contain very little of importance.

The Havana press is, as usual, when there is any disturbance in the United States, in a high state of exultation. The Dario de la Marina, in a long article on the civil war in Kansas, phrophecies that the Union will be dissolved at a very early date.

The new postmaster at Havana, Don Andres Garcia Ruiz de Villa, had arrived at his post. He came on the steamer Pelayo.

The Bishop of Havana paid a visit to Matanzas a short time since, and was received with great demonstrations of respect by the people.

There was to be a great fair at Puerto Principe sometime during the present month. Gen: Concha, Marquis de Havana, Viscount de Cuba, etc., etc., has promised to honor the affair by his presence.

Mr. James Clark, an American, has been appointed directing engineer of the railroad which is to be built between Regla and Matanzas. Mr. Clark was formerly employed on the Matanzas railroad, and is a very popular man in the island.

Intelligence was received at Havana that nearly one-third of the settlement of Belize, Honduras, had been destroyed by fire on the 17th July. It is believed to have been the work of the free negroes, who are there in great numbers from Jamaica and Nassau. Large rewards have been offered for the apprehension of the incendiaries by the authorities of the place.

The port of Hnvana was nearly deserted by shipping. One or two vessels had been quarantined for having a few cases of cholera on board.

There was still considerable vomito on the island. During the temporary absence of Vice Consul Wm. Sydney Smith, Mr. Horace Fox will attend to his duties at the British Consulate.

Crops in Mississippi.—The Vicksburg Times, of the 27th ult., has the following on this subject:

We were shown a talk of cotton from the plantation of our fellow-citizen, Mr. John Ferguson of this county, which surpasses anything of the kind we have ever witnessed. The stalk numbered more than seventy bolls, from the smallest to the largest size, only five of which came to maturity, the balance having been destroyed by the "rot," or something similar. We learn from Mr. Ferguson that it is a general thing in his neighborhood. We have also heard the same complaint from other portions of the county. The idea of an unusually large crop, to which some newspapers have given currency, we think will prove fallacious. We would take this occasion to remark that it is highly injurious to the planter's interest, (which is the true interest of the South,) for the press to send abroad statements unfounded in fact, in regard to the crops. It cannot possibly do good, but may and does do serious harm.

Wotyakian Avarice.—The Wotyaks live on both banks of the Wyatka, and belong to the Uralian family. The principal characteristic is avarice. The Watynk raises everything he needs, seldom goes into a place of trade and very rarely rises to such a pitch of generosity as to treat his wife or daughter to a neckerchief. He never invites a friend to take a glass of brandy; he brews his own Kumyshka. If he has sold a hundred pounds of meal he seldom, thinks of buying a two-copek bun for his children. When a person dies, custom demands that his bed and clothing should be thrown away; but to save both the Wotyak coolly lays his dying father on straw to nothing but his shirt. A Wotyak once brought his blind father to a physician and said:

"Uncle, I have heard that you make eyes. There's my blind father; can you make him some eyes?"

The doctor examined the invalid and said that he could easily be cured.

What'll you take for making them?" asked the Wotyak.

"Can you give me ten roubles ($6?")

"No, uncle, that's too much; take six roubles."

"Very well, I will cure him for six roubles."

"And will you make both eyes for six roubles?"

"Both, that is understood."

"Well, I'll give you three roubles, uncle, make him one eye; he is old, one eye will be enough for him."

A California paper tells the following of Lieutenant Derby, "John Phœnix," the humorist:

One evening at the theater, Phœnix observed a man sitting three seats in front whom he thought he knew; he requested the person sitting next to him "to punch the other individual with his cane." The polite stranger did so, and the disturbed person turning his head a little, he discovered his mistake—that he was not the person he took him for. Fixing his attention steadfastly on the play, and affecting unconsciousness of the whole affair, he left the man with a cane to settle with the other for the disturbance, who being wholly without an excuse, there was of course a ludicrous and embarrassing scene—during all which Phœnix was profoundly interested in the play. At last, the man with the cane asked, rather indignantly, "Didn't you tell me to punch that man with my stick?"

"Yes."

"And what did you want?"

"I wanted to see whether you would punch him or not."

WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE

CONTAINS the element of life and death. It will destroy with certainty every species of worms engendered in the stomach and bowels, and save the life of the child wasting away under the disease. Whenever the presence of worms is suspected, the medicine should be promptly given. It will have a healthful influence in all cases where the digestive and excretory organs are disordered, and if worms exist it will expel them without pain and quickly cure the sufferer.

Board, including lodging, washing, lights and fuel can be procured in the village and immediate neighborhood at ten dollars per month. Students will be received at any time during the session, and will be charged only from the time of their entrance to the end of the term. We would, however, respectfully urge all parents and guardians who design placing their daughters or wards in the institution, to do so at their earliest convenience as it will lend much to the individual benefit of the pupils and the general prosperity of the school, facilitating, as it will, a proper arrangement of the various classes in their respective branches of study.

School books, stationery, etc., may be had at any of the various stores in the village at the usual rates.

Reports will be sent to parents and guardians quarterly, in which will be stated the health, improvement, social and moral deportment of their daughters or wards, with such other information as may be deemed important.

As the design of the Faculty is to render the instruction thorough, and lay the foundation of a substantial education, no young lady will be permitted to rank higher than her attainments will justly entitle her, nor to pass another department in the course of instruction without having made sufficient proficiency in the preceding studies.

The government of the school is to be understood as that of authority—though parental and mild, yet decided and firm.—The institution, in a religious point of view will be conducted without reference to sectarian influence.

Pupils will be required to attend church at least once on the Sabbath and recite a Bible lesson on each Monday morning.

The scholastic year, embracing ten months, will be divided into two equal terms of five months, one immediately succeeding the other.

The first session commencing on the first Wednesday in October, and closing the last week in February; the second commencing on the first Wednesday in March, and closing the last week in July; at which time the annual examination will be held, and the usual rewards and honors conferred. The vacation will embrace the months of August and September.

All applications for admission of pupils, etc., to be made to the President of the College.

15,000 ACRES OF LAND FOR SALE.

THE lands are situated in Morehouse parish, Louisiana, and in what is known as the "Bastrop Grant." They are of the richest quality of alluvial, unsurpassed by any quality in any lands in the South, and fully capable of producing from one and a half to two bales, or fifty to sixty bushels of corn to the acre. They lie near the Ouachita and Bœuf rivers—good navigable streams—and likewise in convenient distance of the county of the Vicksburg, Shreveport and Texas Railroad, now in course of construction, and hastening to a rapid completion. A portion of these lands are highly improved and in a flourishing state of cultivation; the county is healthy, the water excellent, the timber is abundant, and altogether they will be found to possess greater advantages and present inducements to purchasers than any lands now offered for sale in the Southern country. They will be sold in quantities to suit purchasers, and on the most favorable terms. Titles perfect.

For further particulars inquire of the undersigned, either personally at his residence in Prairie Jefferson, Morehouse parish, or by letter addressed to Point Jefferson, Morehouse parish, Louisiana. jan12 1y JAMES H. BRIGHAM.

ANTHONY A PENISTON, M. D. Adjunct Professor of Anatomy.

The dissecting room will be opened on the 15th October, and clinical instructions will be given daily at the Charity Hospital from that time till the end of the regular course of lectures.

The proximity of the College to Charity Hospital will prevent all loss of time in going from one to the other.

It is the intention of the Faculty to demonstrate practical Medicine and Surgery at the bed side as much as possible. In addition to the facilities for this purpose afforded by the Hospital, a Dispensary will be established at the College for the examination and treatment of such patients as may not wish to enter the Hospital.

Here the students will be required in turn to put up prescriptions, apply dressings, etc., and every effort will be made to render the course of instruction in this institution as practical as possible.

The College is situated in a quiet part of the city, and will be spacious and well ventilated.

The Professors will take pleasure in aiding the students to procure cheap and comfortable board and lodging.

JOHN F. RONDUARANT, Esq. and lady.

The ensuing scholastic year will commence on Wednesday, the 1st of October.

The Institution has entered on its sixth session under the auspices of the same Principal. A sense of duty, interest and pleasure rende his future connection with the Institution permanent and perpetual.

The apparatus, Chemical, Philosophical and Astronomical, is large and well selected.

There is a numerous cabinet of minerals and fossils in connexion with the Seminary.

There is a library of more than one thousand volumes accessible to the pupils, which will shortly be increased several hundred volumes.

The number of musical instruments, pianos, harp, guitars, etc., is always sufficient to meet the wants of the department.

The institution is furnished with a large and excellent collection of maps, charts, diagrams, globes, etc.

The grounds of the Seminary have been enlarged and the entire premises tastefully enclosed.

UNIFORM.

The Trustees and Principal at a meeting lately held, adopted a uniform for the following reasons:

1st. To secure economy in dress. It is impracticable to secure it otherwise.

2d. Our young ladies are of diverse pecuniary conditions, as is but to be expected where such a number are thrown together, and this diversity is published to the world by the different styles and quality of dress on all public occasions.

3d. On public occasions we have often, as well as the young ladies, been mortified to hear this diversity remarked.

4th. Without a uniform, there being no rule in the article of dress, the region of whim and caprice is left boundless, and the trouble of satisfying these endlessly diverse fancies in every article, is burdensome and annoying in the extreme. For the above and other good reasons, we have adopted a uniform, and commend it to our patrons and the public. It must be regarded as a law of the institution.

MEDICAL DEPARTMENT.

THE Annual Course of Lectures in this department will commence on MONDAY, November 17th, 1856, and will terminate in the ensuing March.

James Jones, M. D., Professor of Practice of Medicine.

J. L. Riddle, M. D., Professor of Chemistry.

Warren Stone, M. D., Professor of Surgery.

A. E. Cross, M. D., Professor of Obstetrics.

Gustavus A. Sout, M. D., Professor of Materia Medica.

J. C. F. Wederstrandt, M. D. Professor of Anatomy.

Thomas Hunt, M. D., Professor of Physiology and Pathology.

Gilbert S. Vance, M. D., Demonstrator of Anatomy.

The rooms for Dissecting will be open on the third Monday in October.

The Faculty are Visiting Physicians and Surgeons of the Charity Hospital, and attend this institution from November to April.

The Students accompany the Professors in their visits, and, free of expense, enjoy extraordinary practical advantages.

There are during the season about eight hundred persons prescribed for daily.

Preliminary to the Course, lectures will be delivered daily in the Amphitheatre of the Hospital, from the first Monday in November, on Clinical Medicine and Surgery, Auscultation and Percussion, and other subjects of practical importance to students.

Ignorance is bliss—Early Start—Stage Road—Song of the brooks, cascades—Addison—Vale of tranquility—Home of the mountainous-fare—Approach to the Notch Land Slide—The buried family—Silver cascade—The gate—Crawford house.

Names, dates and mathematical measurements have been studiously avoided. If the mind be preoccupied with them, the fresh eye is lost, and every thing that is normal in the impressions and emotions is sacrificed.—Science has its own pleasure, and its disciples are doubtless paid as they go for the weariness and toil which precede its acquisition. But is there not a blissful ignorance? Instead of looking at the earth and mountains as a geologist; the heavens as an astronomer; and the vegetable world as a botanist, is it not a pastime luxury to look at these objects and to dwell amongst them, simply as a child of nature and of God. Is it not distinctly conceivable that one may be lead forth to gaze at the stars, and that he may in sweet communion with them, rejoice that he knows neither names nor numbers? Is it not conceivable that he may revel in the wilds of nature, amidst flowers, trees, rocks and mountains, and be glad that these have no language but that which speaks to the senses and intuitions of his nature? Although the scripture does not repudiate systematic divinity and critical exegesis, does he not often feel how refreshing it is to be invested with the pure word that is without note or comment?

While the mist is on the hills and the dew is on tree, shrub and grass, and long before the sun's rays come down from the Glen, the stage horn startles from slumber and soon all are awake (fifteen at least) and the six prancing horses hurry us away from the East toward the West side of the White mountains. The point to be reached is the Crawford house, thirty seven miles distant, and one of the most delightful days journey that has been recorded hitherto. Over the top of Mount Washington the distance is only seven miles, but to take that route involves the disagreeable task of walking half the distance, that is from the summit down the other side. The stage road which winds around through the gaps and notch is twice as far, and more than twice as pleasant. The rain which wet us to the skin on yesterday while coming down from "tip-top" has laid the dust and put the road in excellent order. Though up hill, and down hill, it is smooth and hard as pavement, and surrounded with scenery which claims unwearied attention. The atmosphere is clear as light, and the sky is of wonderful blueness and depth. The exhilerating air ferments your whole physical being, and creates a vigorous glow, not unlike the foam and friction of a sea bath.

For several miles we are on the bank of the Peabody river which flows eastward into the Androscoggin. Never are we tired of hearing of brooks, of clear cold water, and well stocked with delicious mountain trout. Then there are cascades a mile long and nearly as high as come like fairy troops in silver array, rushing, leaping and tumbling down the mountain sides. There is no music comparable to these concerts of murmuring brooks and laughing waters. There is no choir of such harmony, and no cantatrice whose power of song equals these sweet water notes. Some of the natural avenues through which we passed, shaded by tall trees arched by boughs and clambering vines, and with the songs of unseen brooks and cascades filling the solitudes, the devotional lines of Addison came in to express what all must have felt,

"Though in a bare and ragged way,
Through devious, lonely wilds I stray,
Thy bounty shall my pains beguile,
The barren wilderness shall smile,
With sudden greens and herbage crown'd,
And streams shall murmur all around."

In the valleys and glens through which the road leads are tracts of cultivated land, and comfortable farm houses. A more romantic and secluded settlement cannot be found than the homes of these mountaineers. The cattle graze upon the hills and the harvest ripens in the vale. The haymakers are at work in the meadows, "making hay while the sun shines," for the signs of the approaching autumn are already here. The mountains tower in silence and shut out the world. There is no voice save the mutterings of thunder which come from clouds concealed behind these eternal bulwarks, and the wild screams of eagles which have left their eyries among the crags, and are hovering for prey. If one were in search of quietude, of rest and perfect tranquility, or, if his desire be to find refuge from the never ceasing toil of cities, and the death rattle of a garden-like civilization, this is the place for him to seek. Nor, if an epicure, let him fear for the cuisine. Berries of the most luscious flavor grow in abundance, such as the blue, whortle, red, black rasp and black berry. The speckled trout is caught almost without bait; fowls are no where so good, and butter and milk are rich and plentiful. This is a glance at our fare by the way and others probably are treated quite as well.

In the afternoon of our day's journey the road is as much down hill as it was up in the morning. The streams run the other way, no longer eastward, but westward. Frequently we are on the banks of the Saco, a beautiful little river fringed with trees, and plowing through green mountains. At length the mountains move up nearer to us on either hand, and the celebrated White Mountain Notch is about to greet us. This is a defile extending for two miles between huge cliffs, apparently rent assunder by some vast convulsion of nature. The cliffs that hem us in are two thousand feet high, of granite and nearly bare of vegetation. From the breadth of a mile it converges to a narrow gateway not more than thirty feet in width. Nearly midway the Notch are seen the evidences of a noted disaster. The locality is known as the Willey House. Here on the 2d August 1826, Capt. Willey, his wife, five children and two men were destroyed by an avalanch or slide from the mountain. Piles of stone indicate the places where their remains are supposed to lie.

Here is the current discription of the event: "Nearly in range of the house, a slide, from the extreme point of the westerly hill, came down in a deep mass, to within five rods of the dwelling, where its course appears to have been checked by a large block of granite, which backed the rolling mass for a moment, until it separated into two streams, one of which rushed down to the North end of the house, crushing the barn and spreading itself over the meadow; the other passing down on the South side, and swallowing up the unfortunate beings who probably attempted to fly to a shelter, which it is said, had been erected a few rods distant. This shelter was completely overwhelmed. Rocks weighing from ten to fifty tons being scattered in every direction about the place, rendered escape impossible. The house remained untouched, though large stones and trunks of trees made fearful approaches to its walls, and the moving mass, which separated behind the building again united in its front! The house alone, the only spot untouched by the crumbling and consuming power of the storm, could have been their refuge from the horrible uproar around."

Just before we reach the gate the most remarkable of all the cascades, the "silver cascade," salutes us. It issues from the mountain high up on the right, passes over a series of nearly perpendicular rocks, with unbroken current, and at last falls over a stupendous precipice and hurries away to mingle its waters with those the of Saco. Through this grand natural gateway we emerge into a wide and secluded glen or basin, in the midst of which stands the Crawford house, an excellent resort and the terminus of our tour for the day.

August 1856. WOODSMAN.

BEAUTIFUL.—There is a sentiment as beautiful as just in the following lines: "He who forgets the fountain from which he drank, and the tree under whose shade he gamboled in the days of his youth, is a stranger to the sweetest and most beautiful impressions of the human heart."

Wherever the sentiment of right comes in, it takes precedence of everything else.

TRUE PHILOSOPHY.—A noble heart like the sun, shows its brightest countenance in its lowest estate. We start in life with a great stock of conceit, but it grows less the farther we go.

I have noticed that tomb-stones say "Here he lies," which no doubt is often the truth; and if men could see the epitaphs their friends sometimes write, they would believe they had got into the wrong grave.

Love is a heavenly feast, which none but the sincere and honest partake. It is as impossible for any dishonest man truly to love, as for a hypocrite to go to heaven.

Man may commend thee, but God may condemn thee.

Keep the body under, but the spirit up.

For the N. O. Christian Advocate.

Report of the Visiting Committee to Centenary College.

At the last session of the Mississippi Conference, I was appointed on a committee of three to visit Centenary College, and report its condition and prospects to the Conference. I regret that neither of my colleagues were present at commencement, and that, after being detained on the way by rainy weather, I was so troubled while there with vertigo that I could not extend my inquiries and observations as I wished to do. However, I saw and heard enough to satisfy me fully that the College is doing well in every sense of the word, with only such slight exceptions as are unavoidable, and it never had brighter prospects of a long and successful career than now.

The aggregate number of students in attendance the past collegiate year was two hundred and thirty, nineteen of whom graduated. The examination of the various classes was searching and thorough, and while the worthy and well qualified were advanced, the indolent were suitably admonished, and a few who were manifestly deficient were retained in their former studies. The Secretary of the Joint Board will doubtless furnish you with a detailed account of the commencement exercises; the ceremonies connected with laying the corner-stone of the great centre building, and the unsurpassed liberality of the friends and patrons of the college in subscribing money to complete and furnish the new building, so that I need to say but little in regard to these matters. One thing, however, I will say, I noticed in a late number of the Advocate that some one had informed you that enough had been subscribed to complete and furnish the centre building. This is evidently a mistake. From the best light I could get on the subject on the evening of commencement day, we had only got up to somewhere about three-fourths of the aggregate sum needed, and in order to make up the indispensable balance every member of the Joint Board of Trustees was requested to use his best efforts to raise the required sum. And as it is often more difficult to raise the final balances than it is the major sum, it is important that we bring this matter immediately before the friends of Southern education. And I take this opportunity of saying to all the liberal minded in my reach, that I shall be ready at all times, and wherever I may be, to receive and transmit to the Treasurer any sum they may wish to give to this great public interest. But we not only want money to complete our centre building and to endow the professorships, but we want the patronage of our friends generally in the way of additional students. If they cannot fully rely on our judgment in the matter, if they can only find time to visit our college and examine for themselves, they will not hesitate to send their sons and wards there. In my journeyings through the country I sometimes meet with false and exaggerated reports unfavorable to Centenary College, but by tracing them to their source, I generally find that they have originated either with persons opposed to the success of our denomination in everything, or persons who are anxious to build up other seminaries of learning, and seem to have no more honorable way of doing it than to misrepresent ours. To all who feel interested in Southern education I would say, visit Centenary College, and examine for yourselves, but if you cannot do this inquire of its friends who have personal knowledge of its affairs, and not of its secret and avowed enemies, and I know you will feel safe in sending your sons there.

We have an accomplished President, an able faculty, and as many moral, high-minded and honorable students as you can find in the same number anywhere. It is true, among so many we have a few bad boys, but generally speaking, they were bad before they went there, and without a great change would be bad anywhere.

Before I close these desultory remarks I wish to say a few more things. Where so many are interested as Trustees, Professors, and patrons, in building up an important College, it is not to be expected that every one should see alike on all subjects. The necessary result of this is, that in attempting to carry out some of our favorite plans we sometimes find ourselves in the minority. And when this is the case, I regret to see on the part of some, a disposition to turn the cold shoulder to our College, and throw out innuendoes against it calculated to do harm, as they come from its professed friends. This I think is manifestly wrong. If our College is not all we wish it to be, let us keep our heads and hands and hearts together until we make it so. If now and then we find our favorite schemes only with the minority, let us gracefully bow to the will and wisdom of the majority, and hope for something better next time.

I see from a communication to the Advocate of August 2d, that the brethren in North Louisiana have determined on building up a college at Homer. Now I sincerely hope that this is not an intimation that the Louisiana Conference, which stands pledged with ours to sustain Centenary College, intends, at this critical moment, to withdraw its patronage and give it to another. If we Mississippians are willing, for the sake of the general good, to send our money and our sons a little beyond the limits of our own State, to assist in building up a College in Louisiana, which will be an honor and ornament to your State in all coming time, it certainly will not look well for the Louisianians to withdraw from us, especially at this crisis, and pledge their patronage to another College. I have no objection in the world to the brethren of North Louisiana having a college at Homer if they need one, and can build and endow it, but it does seem to me that consistency and honor requires those of us who are pledged to Centenary College to give it all the aid we can until it is finished and endowed; and then, if the brethren about Homer find it necessary to do so, they may send an agent into the bounds of their maternal Conference for aid, and he shall not be sent empty away. It is humiliating to see how prone the Methodists are to get up Seminaries of learning all over the land, and after blowing abroad their fame for a few brief years, leave them in a crippled unfinished state, to eke out a miserable existence, or to languish and die. I hope this will never be the fate of our beloved Centenary. From present prospects I know it will never be.

Yours affectionately,

J. G. JONES.

Picture of Sin.

Look now at sin; pluck off that painted mask, and turn upon her face the lamp of the Bible. We start; it reveals a death's head. I stay not to quote texts descriptive of sin, it is a debt, a burden, a thief, a sickness, a leprosy, a plague, a poison, a serpent, a sting—every thing that man hates; it is a load of evils beneath whose most crushing, intolerable pressure "the whole creation groaneth." Name me the evil that springs not from this root—the crime that lies not at this door. Who is the hoary sexton that digs man his grave? Who is the painted temptress that steals his virtue? Who is the sorceress that first deceives and then damns his soul? Sin! Who, with icy breath, blights the sweet blossoms of youth? Who brings gray hairs with sorrow to the grave? Who, by a more hideous metamorphosis than Ovid ever fancied, changes sweet children into vipers, tender mothers into monsters, and their fathers into worse than Herods, the murderers of their own innocents? Sin? Who casts the apple of discord on home hearths? Who lights the torch of war and carries it over happy lands? Who, by divisions in the church, rends Christ's seamless robe? Sin! Who is this Delilah that sings the Nazarite asleep, and delivers the strength of God into the hands of the uncircumcised? Who, with smiles on her face, and honeyed flattery on her tongue, stands in the door to offer the sacred rights of hospitality, and when suspicion sleeps, pierces our temples with a nail? What Siren is this who, seated on a rock by the deadly pool, smiles to deceive, sings to lure, kisses to betray, and flings her arms around our neck, to leap with us into perdition? Sin? Who petrifies the soft and gentle heart, hurls reason from her throne, and impels sinners, mad as Gadarene swine, down the precipice into the lake of fire? Sin! Who, having brought the criminal to the gallows, persuades him to refuse a pardon, and with his own hand to bar the door against the messenger of mercy? What witch of hell is it that thus bewitches us? Sin! Who nailed the Son of God to that bloody tree? And who, as if it were not a dove descending with the olive, but a vulture swooping down to devour the dying, vexes, grieves, thwarts, repels, drives off the Spirit of God? Who is it that makes man in heart and habits baser than a beast; and him who was once but little lower than an angel, but little better than a devil? Sin? Sin! Thou art a hateful and horrible thing; that "abominable thing which God hates." And what wonder? Thou hast insulted his Holy Majesty; thou hast bereaved him of beloved children; thou hast defied his power; thou hast despised his grace; and, in the body and blood of Jesus, as if that were a common thing, thou hast trodden under foot his matchless mercy? Surely, brethren, the wonder of wonders is, that sin is not that abominable thing which we also hate.—Dr. Guthrie.

Death from the Bite of a Rattlesnake.

The Nueces Valley—a paper published at Corpus Christi, Texas, while detailing a painful circumstance, also gives in connection some valuable directions. We insert the article in full.—[ED. ADV.

At Nueces Town, on Friday last, a daughter of Rev. Mr. Orchard, while walking in her father's garden, was bitten in the hollow of the foot, by a large rattlesnake, causing death in a few hours. This is third death in Nueces county during the present year, caused by the fatal bite of this most venomous of reptiles—the rattlesnake.

In this last case no physician was near, and the parents of the child are said to have been so much frightened that it was some time before a messenger was sent to their neighbors for assistance and advice. When aid came, however, recourse was immediately had to the usual remedies—but it was too late! the poison had become diffused almost entirely through the system of the unfortunate and suffering girl, and death had marked her as its victim.—She survived but a few hours.

People living in a country where rattlesnakes abound, as in Texas, should be more careful. They should not only guard against being bitten, but should keep constantly on hand an antidote for the poison. There are many cures for the bite of the rattlesnake, most of which are very simple and cost comparatively nothing. Some of these have at different times been published in this paper; and if those of our readers who are liable to such accidents would take the trouble to preserve any little recipe of the kind, it might result even in preserving the life of a near and dear friend! Hoping that at least some will heed the warning, we append the following: Nine times out of ten whoro persons are bitten, the bite is either upon the hand or the foot, which circumstance renders the following simple but effectual cure preferable to almost any other: Immediately after the, accident, scarify the part affected to the depth of an eighth of an inch, with a knife; bind the limb some distance above the wound with a cord, so tight as to prevent the blood from circulating; then apply a poultice made of the yelk of an egg and salt—which being done, give the patient as much whisky or brandy as he or she will drink—(persons unaccustomed to drinking have been known to imbibe a gallon on such occasions without being made drunk)—and our word for it, if the cord about the limb has been drawn tight enough to entirely prevent circulation of the blood, the venom will be completely removed in an hour's time; but a due amount of caution might make it advisable to continue the application for three or four hours.

In the absence of other remedies—for instance if a person is bitten while out hunting—scarify the wound, bind the limb as above stated, and pour a charge of powder upon the wound and touch it off. This cure has often proved effectual.

Do the Lord's work in the Lord's time; pray whilst God hears; hear whilst God speaks; believe whilst God promises; obey whilst God commands.

Two duties must run through a Christian's life, like the warp through the woof, blessing and trusting.

Religion is much talked of, but little understood, till the conscience be awakened; then a man knows the worth of a soul and the want of a Saviour.

Then doth religion flourish in the soul when it knows how to naturalize spiritual things, and to spiritualize natural things.

We may judge of our eternal state by our spiritual state; and of our spiritual state by the delightful and customary actions of our lives.

If we expect to live with Christ in heaven, we must live to him on earth.

We may expect God's protection so long as we keep within God's bounds.

Our opportunities are like our souls, very precious; but if they are lost they are irrecoverably lost.

Religion begins with a knowledge of a man's self, and is perfected with the knowledge of God.

ONE WEEK LATER FROM EUROPE.

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMSHIP PERSIA.

The Cunard steamship Persia, Capt. Judkins, commander, from Liverpool on the 23d of August, arrived at New York on the morning of the 3d instant.

The Persia brings one week's later intelligence from Europe. The news is extremely meagre. We condense the main items from our exchanges, as follows:

There is a report that the King of Naples intends to abdicate in favor of the more liberal Prince of Calabria. (Report doubtful.) Spanish affairs are quiet, and free import of breadstuffs invited into Spain until June, 1857. Madrid advices do not throw any light on the political future. The Russians announce that Kars, Ismael, Beul and Kelia, will be evacuated and given up within the six months specified by the Congress of Paris.

The British Parliament is further prorogued until November. Napoleon is at the baths of Biarritz; he is reported to be urging the claims of Prince Pierre Bonaparte to the throne of the Danubian Kingdom, and to be engaged in considering what title to bestow on the American descendants of Prince Jerome. The harvest in France is considered fully an average. The Government of Holland refuses assent to the principle of arbitration before resort to arms. The citizens of Antwerp have been indulging in fetes to celebrate the King's long and peaceful reign. It is reported (but doubtfully) that France and England have sent an ultimatum to Naples, demanding concessions, and threatening, if refused, to withdraw their representatives. The King agrees to concede in part, but the ultimatum demands more. The Prussian corvette Danzig was attacked on the coast of Morocco by Riff pirates; eight of the crew were killed, and seventeen wounded, including among the latter Prince Adalbert, of Prussia. The dead were buried at Gibraltar; and Prussia invites France and England to join her in an expedition against the Lazaneers. Turkey is proposing a new draft of a general commercial treaty more favorable to the developement of her own commerce. The eight or ten Russians have been removed from the Isle of Serpents by an English ship-of-war, and landed at Odessa. The Russians have reoccupied Anapa, and the forts of the Circassian coast. The papers are full of the magnificence of the approaching coronation.

The British Parliament is further prorogued until the 14th of November. There is no political news excepting the rumor that Disraeli's leadership is becoming obnoxious to his followers.

The Queen of Oude, mother of the deposed monarch, has reached Southampton with a large suite. She comes to England to make complaint of the East India Company.

Miss Nightingale has declined a proposed public demonstration by the people of Birmingham. She is still at her home in Derbyshire, and, it is said, the first visit she will make will be to Her Majesty.

Numerous accidents having lately occurred from the use of strychnia by gate keepers and others for the purpose of destroying vermin, the Lord Advocate of Scotland has given instructions that it shall be made known as publicly as possible, that any one placing strychnia or other poison within the reach of the public, or using it without such precautions as are needful to prevent injury, will be held responsible for the consequences, and that if death or injury to health is the result, the party offending will be liable to be prosecuted criminally.

By an order in Council, dated July 28th last past, her Majesty has been pleased to direct that the British Consul at Siam shall have full power to carry into effect, and to enforce by fine or imprisonment as in the said order provided and set forth, the observance of the stipulations of any treaty, or regulations appended to any treaty now existing or to be made hereafter, between her Majesty and her successors and the King of Siam and his successors; which order is to take effect from the first day of December next.

It is said in the Correspondence Italienne, published at Turin, that the representatives of the Pope and of the Grand Duke of Tuscany are very active in their endeavors to prevail on the King of Naples to give satisfaction to the Western Powers by listening to the demands of Austria. Orders have been given to concentrate the Swiss troops in and about Naples.

The Sultan has granted a site for an hospital, to be called "The Hospital of Peace," to be attended by Sisters of Charity, and to be open to all nationalities.

There had been numerous riots in Lisbon and elsewhere throughout Portugal, on the idea of the dearness of bread.

An American is reported to have got a firman to examine the practicability of the principal rivers of Asia Minor for navigation.

Tranquility now prevails in Greece, and nothing more is said of brigands. The evacuation of the country by the French troops is considered certain.

Reliable information from Constantinople mentions that the Turkish Government, which is now turning its attention with renewed vigor to the subject of its commercial relations with foreign powers, is not disposed to renew its present commercial treaties in the same shape as heretofore, but is already occupied with the elaboration of a draft for a general treaty of commerce, to be offered to all nations. The leading feature of this draft treaty is described to consist in the principle of circumscribing for the advantage of native produce, the concessions hitherto made to foreign trade.

The Viceroy of Egypt has established a Steam Navigation Company to carry on the coasting trade of the Red Sea.

Latest advices from Persia do not bring favorable accounts. The grapes were diseased and murrain was destroying the cattle. Engineers had been sent to strengthen the defenses of Khiva.

The Russians have sent in a claim of 400,000 francs for damage done to the Russian Palace at Constantinople, from its having been converted into a French hospital.

A quantity of treasure valued at $150,000 was buried by the Russians in the Church of Sebastopol, and they have just dug it up, in safety, although the French slept in the edifice for some considerable time.

Later from Kansas.

The following items of Kansas news we find in the Leavenworth Herald, of the 30th ult:

Our latest advices from Lecompton inform us that there are some six hundred U. S. troops encamped there, subject to the order of our acting Governor, Hon. Daniel Woodson.

The most interesting item of news we have to record is the seizure of four of the enemy's wagons by Capt. Fred. Emery and his gallant company. The wagons were loaded with provisions for the enemy, and were in transitu for Lawrence.

Lane's forces are still concentrated, we learn, at Lawrence, and are prepared for an attack. They have raised fortifications around the town and ferry. They number some two thousand strong, and are all well armed and disciplined. Report says they are short of provisions.

Our forces have started on their march to Lecompton, and have probably reached there ere this. Most of them are well armed and mounted, and will give Lane and his ragged regiments, Jessie. We will probably hear something of them to-day.

Col. Titus and men who were taken prisoners by the enemy have been released, an exchange of prisoners having been effected by the intercession of Gov. Shannon and others. Col. Titus was severely wounded at the time of the attack on his company, as our readers will recollect, but he is now, we are happy to learn, in a fair way to recover.

We learn that several Abolitionists have been taken prisoners by our forces, among whom is a Rev. Mr. Bird—a Bird who is well known here for his beautiful plumage.

CONCERTINA.—A report was published last week in some of our Territorial papers stating that Major Sedgewick and his command had surrendered to a gang of Lane's armed marauders "without firing a single gun." We learn from the most unquestionable authority that the report does Major Sedgewick great injustice, and is wholly without foundation. Major Sedgewick never surrendered—in fact he was not even attacked, as reported.

Atchison, Doniphan and others have another address to the citizens of Missouri. We find it in the Kansas City Enterprise of the 28th. It is as follows:

To the Citizens of Missouri:

A report has been circulated with great assiduity through the State, that the difficulties in Kansas are settled. This report has been circulated by two classes of men, those who wish for some excuse for not assisting their friends in Kansas by their presence, and those who are too sordid to aid with their money. We state now, DISTINCTLY, that Kansas affairs are daily growing worse—that we do not intend to abandon our friends in Kansas until Lane's bandits are made to respect the laws and submit to them.

The Law and Order men now under arms in the Territory, determined that the laws shall be obeyed, amount to 1000 men, and must have 500 more within one week, or all will be lost and Kansas must be abandoned to the bandits.

EDITORIAL CHANGE.—The New York Evening Post, of the 29th ult., says:

Park Benjamin, Esq., is, we learn, to take the editorial conduct of Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper, and the New York Journal; the first published weekly, and the second monthly. Those periodicals have acquired a large circulation, which will doubtless be augmented under the experienced management of Mr. Benjamin. Mr. Benjamin, by the way, will continue to accept invitations to lecture, as heretofore, before the various literary associations, as his time will not be entirely occupied by editorial duties.

THE STORM AT APALACHICOLA

The Town Almost Completely Submerged.

SEVERAL LIVES LOST.

We have kindly been furnished by Messrs. Post & Mel, commission merchants of this city, with a copy of the Apalachicola Commercial Advertiser, Extra, of the 1st inst., from which extract the following account of the ravages of the late dreadful storm at that place:

We have barely time before the departure of our mail this morning, to give a brief statement of the gale of the 29th and 30th ults. For several days preceding the 29th we had strong easterly winds, and on the morning of that day the water had nearly reached the top of the wharves, and continued rising up to 12 noon. During this time the wind veered from east to southeast. The water when highest was about half way from the edge of the wharves to the brick stores on Water street, whilst in some places it was quite up to the side walks. Our citizens commenced early to move the most perishable merchandise into the upper stories, and there was a general stampede of all water craft. By nine o'clock at night the wind had lulled and the waters resumed their usual level.

About one o'clock on the morning of the 30th inst., the wind began to blow violently from the south east, and by three o'clock the water was up to the top of the wharves and was rising rapidly. At noon the water had reached the side walks. The wind gradually increased during the afternoon, and by dark blew with the greatest violence. At 7 P. M. the waters were rushing into the stores on Water street. The water was at its maximum height about three or four o'clock on the morning of the 31st, and from that time up to 10, were receding rapidly, with the wind from south west and west. The wharves have received comparatively but little damage, though the wooden wharves are destroyed. The water was driven back into the city nearly up to the Marshin House side walk. Commerce street was submerged to the depth of three and a half to four feet. Market street was partially covered, the water reaching about two-thirds the way across the street in front of the residences of J. G. Inman and H. W. Brooks, Esqs. The stores of S. M. Nicherson and N. Baker are unroofed. The Apalachicola Exchange, and the building occupied by McKenzie & Elton have their roofs partially off, and in a damaged condition. All the stores on Water street from J. H. Hill & Co's. down, have their roofs torn up and lying in confused mass—doors, sash, etc., on the lower floors are unhinged and scattered about the city. As regards the violence of the gale, it approximates nearer to that of 1851 than any other, the gale was more protracted than that of 1851, though the water was not quite so high. Mitchell's press building and warehouses have their roofs all torn up. Petry's iron house is a wreck. The water was between four and four and a half feet deep at the highest point in the stores on Water street.

Sinclair's warehouse on Commerce street had a depth of about four feet over the floors. Some seven or eight small houses at the extreme foot of Water street are destroyed, whilst several of them have changed their location entirely. Austin's ways are destroyed. Sloop Sarah, on the ways at the time of the gale, is now high and dry in Irish Town. Chimneys innumerable have their tops blown off. A large number of china and other trees in the upper part of the city are torn up by the roots, and so completely stripped of their leaves as to have the appearance of having been devoured by caterpillars. Prostrate fences are the most conspicuous objects in this picture of destruction. The sidewalks on Water and Commerce streets are destroyed, also the greater part of the beach walk. Mitchel's pickery platform is entirely stripped, nothing being left but the upright posts; the pickery building is still standing. In consequence of the barometers, etc., the loss of merchandise on Water street is comparatively small. The drug stores of H. F. Abell and J. L. Griffin are much injured, but the stock generally was saved by moving.

Gumpa's store had a depth of nearly two feet over the floor; the goods were saved by tearing away the ceiling and stowing the goods above.

The Pee dee warehouse has its roof slightly damaged, floors torn up and doors generally much injured. Union warehouse sustained but little injury. Buckman's press and warehouse damaged slightly. Steamer Harriet was lying at the wharf making some change in her machinery, by order of steamboat inspectors, on the afternoon of the 29th, and could not get up steam. Capt. Markhem, however, succeeded in hauling her alongside of schooner Allie Day, lying in the stream, and the steamer was towed up to the mouth of Saal's Creek where she weathered it out.

Steamer Harriet arrived this morning all safe. Schooner Allie Day is ashore in the neighborhood of Saal's Creek, about two hundred yards from the river, in the woods, and can only be got off with great labor and expense.

Schooner W. R. Pettles from New Orleans, with one-third cargo for this place, (landed safely before the gale) and the remainder for St. Marks, was driven past the city on the night of the 30th, and passed very near the wharves, dragging three anchors. She cleared the wharves in sight of the city and went up into the woods high and dry, about two hundred rods from where the schooner will float. The sails were blown to pieces after they were made fast. Pilot boats went up the river and are safe. We have no reliable information from the various lighters; rumor says several of them are in the woods. Fears are entertained for the safety of the people at the lighthouses. We learn that the gale was felt up at Ricces Bluff. The cargo on board the W. R. Pettles is uninjured, and the vessel has made no water.

We have just heard from St. Vincents Island—one family consisting of man and wife and four children are drowned. We have no particulars.

The Late Gale.

From our Baltimore exchanges we learn that the storm which did so much damage on the Southern coasts and interior, extended as far North as the Chesapeake Bay; it being felt with great fury at all the intermediate points.

The Baltimore Patriot, of Wednesday the 3d inst., says:

The Southern coast and the lower part of the Chesapeake Bay were visited by a severe storm of wind and rain during Saturday night, which continued in some localities up to Monday morning. Considerable excitement was felt in the city yesterday in consequence of the non-arrival of the Bay boats and several steamships, but all fears were happily allayed at an early hour this morning. About half past 7 o'clock we were politely handed the annexed note, written at Norfolk by a gentleman connected with the Bay line, and addressed to his wife:

"The Louisiana has been prevented from leaving Norfolk in consequence of the heavy storm which prevailed throughout Monday. The storm came from the southward, and has doubtless done great damage on the Southern coast. The train from Weldon was stopped twice for the purpose of cutting away trees that were blown across the track. So great a storm has not been known in this quarter for many years.

The Boston steamship Joseph Whitney, Captain Howes, due yesterday morning, arrived at her wharf at 6 o'clock this morning, having reached the quarantine ground at midnight. Capt. H. informs us that he met the storm on Monday at 12, noon, and at 4 P. M., being then near Cape Henry; the weather was so very heavy he was compelled to haul off; he lay off and on for ten hours, the wind the entire time blowing heavy from the N. E. Capt. Howes says the storm was more severe than any he has been in for many years. On Thursday morning, near the capes, he saw the spars of several vessels, but the sea was so rough it was impossible to tell to what description of vessels they belonged. On Monday morning at 5 o'clock, off the Capes of the Delaware, he passed the steamship William Jenkins.

At Norfolk, Va., the storm was left in all its fury

The Patriot says:

We are informed by a gentleman who was in Norfolk during the prevalence of the storm, that the trees upon most of the streets in the city were uprooted and levelled; houses unroofed, the tops of chimneys blown off, and one building on Charlotte street, unfinished, partly blown down. Considerable damage was sustained by the tide, which was very high, carrying off, during the ebb, a large quantity of lumber, etc. Our informant states that there were three vessels ashore on Buck Roe beach, one a little below Craney Island, and a brig ashore near the mouth of Nansemond river. At the Gosport Navy Yard, during the storm, the sloop house from which the U. S. steam frigate Colorado was launched, sustained considerable damage.

At Wilmington, N. C., the storm was also very severe. The Wilmington Journal of Monday, the 1st, has the following paragraph:

We hardly recollect to have listened to heavier gusts than those of last night. The amount of rain which has fallen since Saturday evening must be very great, and if anything like the same quantity fell in the interior, we may look for very high freshets. Of the amount of damage to the crops we can form no estimate, but presume that it must be considerable. Certainly rice has suffered, but we trust that the damage may be less than has been anticipated. In the course of last night, the wind veered round from North or North-East to South or South-East, blowing on to the coast, and giving every reason to fear for the safety of shipping. We look for bad news within a few days.

As there are some faults that have been termed faults on the right side, so there are some errors that might be denominated errors on the safe side.

The New Orleans Christian Advocate.

The N. O. Christian Advocate.

Terms: Two Dollars per annum, in advance.

NEW ORLEANS:

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 13, 1856.

TO OUR SUBSCRIBERS.

Last week we said, for the encouragement of our Agents, that our list was firm. We now add that for some time past, new subscribers have been coming in at the rate of twenty five a week. The accounts sent forth show a large amount due. Don't let your preacher start to Conference without paying all you owe; and while at it, it would be as well to pay up a year in advance. It may save you hereafter being charged $2 50 or $3 00. If the Agent passes you by—please call him and settle. If he will not answer and come to a settlement—then enclose a bill to us and have it credited to your account and you shall have a receipt for the same.

N. B. Unless large collections are made on the accounts now out, before the sessions of the Conferences, we shall not be able to meet the current expenses of the year.

Home Circle.—The September number promptly received. It is a good number. One excellent article from Phebe—strikes us we have seen that before. We hope the preachers will canvass the church and country for this excellent Monthly. It will be doing people a favor to get them to take it.

Conference Statistics.—The preachers are requested by our Book Editor, Dr. Summers to return as accurate, statistics as possible to their respective Conferences, specifying the number of probationers, as well as members, in their respective charges. If any preacher should be prevented attending Conference, let him not fail to forward his statistics by some one else—the presiding elders should see to it that every circuit, mission, and station be duly reported. Can we not have full and correct reports from every Conference? Complete returns of Sunday-school statistics should also be reported. These latter should be forwarded, through the Secretaries, to Dr. Huston, the Corresponding Secretary, who wishes to embody the figures in his Annual Report.

The Southern Methodist Almanac for 1857 is in press, and will be issued as soon as the latest statistics are procured—long before the Almanac for 1856 shall be obsolete.

Beautifiers.—The advertisement of Col. D. C. Lowber, 98 Magazine street, will be of service to gardeners and planters who are wise enough to lay out a penny to make a pound. We saw on the Lake Coast this summer some very fine fruit trees, Phosphated guano was at the root.

Then our conceptions of God's attributes are carnal, when our high thoughts of one gives us low thonghts of another.

His goodness makes his Majesty amiable, and his Makesty makes his goodness wonderful. His love is not abated by his greatness, nor his greatness by his love. His holiness hinders him not from dwelling with the poor in spirit.

This is a threefold mystery; a gospel published in the midst of an ungodly world; a little church preserved in the midst of devils; and a little grace kept alive in the midst of corruptions.

A man may be imperfect in his obedience and yet impartial.

God never fails them that wait for him, nor forsakes them that work for him.

It is a sign of advanced grace when opinion is swallowed up of religion.

A sight of God begins a saint on earth and perfects him in heaven.

The service of God is the soul's work; and the favor of God is its reward.

That preaching that is plain, pure, powerful and practical, men are apt to dislike.

That man hath no sense of mercy that wants a sense of duty.

What pleaseth God should please us, because it pleaseth God.

We may know what God intends for us, by what he has wrought in us.

THEY DON'T FELLOWSHIP US!

A member of the Virginia Conference, Rev. J. E. Edwards, while on a late visit to England and the Continent, in the course of an interesting correspondence with the Richmond Christian Advocate, made the following candid and independent statement:

"It may not be out of place just here to say, that the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, in the United States, is scarcely recognized by the Wesleyan Methodists of this country. Personally, I have received the most polite and courteous attentions from the ministers to whom I had letters of introduction; but I have not been invited to preach in any of their chapels. Our church is regarded, to say the least, as a pro-slavery church, and the Methodists of this country will not tolerate any such body as a part of the christian family."

It was to the taste of the press of the Northern Methodist Church and the Negrophilists generally to copy that, and to seek to make the impression that Southern Methodism is under ban—is not recognized—cast out of the synagogue! It gives them satisfaction to cut off from the body of Christ a branch of Methodism, mainly supplying the gospel to half the United States, and numbering 604,000 members and 6,500 local and traveling preachers, with all the equipments of a vigorous organization.

Dr. Olin, after living in the South, said on the floor of General Conference, 1844: "I here declare that if ever I saw the graces of the Christian ministry displayed, or its virtues developed, it has been among slaveholders. * * * I feel, sir, that if this great difficulty shall result in separation from our Southern brethren, we lose, not our right hand merely, but our very heart's blood." Wiser men and more catholic spirited have succeeded Dr. Olin and their counsels prevail.

But what of this non-fellowship, so far as it affects us? Just nothing at all.

The English Wesleyans, who are accused of toadying to the Government, do but reflect the National feeling.—There is no moral force in their position.

They have had no overtures from Southern Methodism; nor have they taken steps to acquaint themselves with our position in the matter prejudged.

They held communion with the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States and exchanged delegates before the Division. Southern Methodism stands now as then. Bishop Soule, who was received by them as an angel of the Church in America, is our Senior Bishop. He is competent to understand his ground, and would be the last man to sacrifice his antecedents. Dr. Capers was another angel, and a very acceptable one to our British brethren, though a slaveholder at the very time. He died a Bishop of Southern Methodism. Their delegate, Dr. Hannah, who a few months ago bore salutations to the Northern Methodist General Conference, came over as the junior of Dr. Reese, thirty years ago, and saluted a General Conference from which the Abolition ranters at Indianapolis would have been expelled.

Who has changed? Either all their past is wrong or we are right. It is for them to explain their position.

The attitude of our Northern brethren is slightly complicated. The Editor of the Christian Advocate and Journal tells us:

The capital difference between this great Southern section of Methodism and the greater Nothern one, arises from the subject of slavery; the former has obliterated from its Discipline the testimony of our fathers on this "great evil," and seems to have gone over to the extremest ultraism of Southern politicians on the subject, admitting it into the ministry, and even the episcopacy, as well as casting away every restraint upon it among the laity. If we mistake not the tones of its organs, it is beginning even to recognize the Scriptural and abstract right of slavery. On this account, as also on account of the manner in which it conducted its secession from the M. E. Church, it has been refused recognition by both Northern and transatlantic Methodism. It has, we believe, no formal relation with any other branch of the denomination throughout the world.

It is well he mentions the "secession" (?) that the public may know how much consequence to attach to the other "difference." On the border, where bona fide slaveholders are still gathered and courted withiu the pale of their Church, the plea of a principled non-fellowship is overlaid by reference to a lawsuit in which they got the worse.

If there is any honesty in fanaticism, they must, in lucid moments, blush at their practical inconsistency. Take an humble representative of Southern Methodism in New Orleans, and a high one of Northern Methodism in New York: The writer of this preaches every Sabbath afternoon to congregations of from four to twelve hundred colored people. Not a few are turned from the power of Satan to God and obtain inheritance among Saints. He does far less than many of his brethren. Hundreds of them, every Sabbath, in cities, villages and plantations, are ministering to this people the consolations of the gospel.

In New York is a little gentleman who can say big things about slavery, and draw up strong resolutions and preambles in favor of the slave, but who perhaps does not preach to a dozen negroes in a year, unless more than that number chance to hear in the gallery, one of his fine discourses. With his little finger he touches not the task of their salvation. As for him, they may all live and die heathens. And yet the Editor of the Christian Advocate and Journal says to the Editor of the New Orleans Christian Advocate—"I can't fellowship you. My conscience forbids!"

"Why, what's the matter, Brother Stevens?"

"Oh," he replies sanctimoniously, "it's all for Cuffee's sake. You are not doing your duty to him as a minister of Jesus Christ."

Can Pharisaism outstrain that?

Southern Methodism can well do without such hypocritical fellowship. She can afford it while God is with her. Doubtless He is our Father, though their Israel acknowledge us not. As for Abolitionism, it is an imported sentiment—false and foreign both in morals and policy. We have better employment than lending ourselves to its propagation.

Before division, unwarranted meddling with our relations as a Church to a civil institution, and advice intruded upon us, characterized the correspondence of the British Methodists to such extent as to lead to not an obscure hint that unless they stopped it the correspondence had better stop.

Southern Methodism is saved that annoyance, and annoyances at home similar. We are saved the responsibility of protesting in the face of Northern Methodists, as we should be bound to do, the impropriety of their ravings—becoming the tools of politicians and profaning pulpit and altar. We are saved the shame of being associated with the reputation they are making for themselves. We are saved the inheritance of infidelity, radicalism and schism they are preparing. We are saved from so much evil by having no relations with them, it would be hard to say wherein we are losers.

Those modern progressives think it strange that we run not with them into the same excess of riot, speaking evil of us. Be it so. That is no new thing. The Methodist Episcopal Church, South, stands upon a Bible Platform. To that book she appeals for her faith and practice—appeals constantly—fearlessly appeals. Her mission is to spread Scriptural holiness over these lands.—Blessed with peace and in favor with God and man, what cares such a Church for the hollow formalities of canting fellowship with those embittered by intestine feuds—divided among themselves—ever wrangling, changing?

In a time of change it is fortunate that one branch of the denomination stands upon Apostolic ground. Abraham and Paul and early Christians, Asbury and McKendree could obtain fellowship with us were they to return to earth. And in these days of spirit-rappings, who knows but the old worthies might return? It would be hard, indeed, to see them denied fellowship in the Church they planted.

Missionary Collections.

We would again, says the Nashville Advocate, urge our brethren on the various circuits and stations, to be diligent and faithful laborers in behalf of the cause of Missions. The sessions of the Annual Conferences are rapidly approaching, and the preachers should be particular in affording every member and friend of the Church an opportunity to give his means for the spread of the gospel over the world. The call for help is loud, constant and imperative. Laborers are in the field, and others are willing and waiting to join them. The Church is pledged and under bonds to send them wherever men are perishing for lack of the knowledge of the gospel. See to it, brethren in the ministry, that, with the efficient agencies at your command, every person, rich and poor, old and young, even to the little children, hears an urgent personal appeal from you for the support of this cause. Slight none—favor all with an occasion of receiving a blessing by giving a blessing. The collections should be increased. It depends chiefly upon the preachers to increase them by their efforts among the people. Let every one do his duty.—"Ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor, that ye through his poverty might be rich."

Nothing is great enough for him to admire who is infinite Majesty; nothing is mean enough for him to despise who is infinite Mercy.

God deals with his servants, not as a passionate Master, but as a compassionate Father.

God takes notice of every particular man as if there were none else; and yet takes notice of all as if there were but one man.

God repenteth that he made man, but never repenteth tha the redeemed man.

We cannot live naturally without God, how then can we live happily without him.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

The Modern Whitfield; Fifteen Sermons of Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, of London. New York: Sheldon, Blakeman & Co., 1856.

An introduction and sketch of his life is furnished by E. L. Magoon. "Rev. C. H. Spurgeon (what C. H. stands for, is nowhere told) was born at Kelvedon in Essex, on the 19th June, 1834." He did come as near being born a Rev. as could be, for besides being a popular preacher himself, his father and grandfather, (both living) are Independent preachers. He is a Baptist.

The portrait is anything but conciliating. It is full of self-conceit, and sets one, in spite of himself, against the book almost as much as the introduction.

Mr. Spurgeon's education was not regular. He showed his light first while usher in a day school at Cambridge, by addressing Sunday-School children. He is undoubtedly the most run after of any preacher in England. His Chapel in New Park street, London, is regularly crowded, and hundreds, sometimes thousands, turn away for want of standing room. He has preached three hundred and sixty-five sermons in a year. When he goes abroad the multitude flock to hear. No house, room or chapel contains his audience.—He preaches without notes. Many converts are numbered. There is certainly something to be studied in this man.

He has fancy but not imagination.—Whitfield—to whom he is fond of likening himself—often took flights, bold and sweeping. Mr. Spurgeon never gets above a lively hop. His sentences are short, pert and now and then pithy.—His sermons are a string of sayings—not of arguments. We have not yet come upon a single argument. People have not the trouble of thinking or reasoning. He uses "market language"—never halts for a word—has abundance of that "small change" so agreeable in the conversationist—and more sass than unction. There is an impudence that some mistake for independence in his personal addresses.

"My brethren," says he "there is a vast difference between a devil and a deacon. The difference lies here—resist the devil and he will flee from you, but resist a deacon and he will fly at you."

He is preaching in the crowded New Park street Chapel, on—no matter what text—p. 146:

"You come from anywhere and nowhere, some of you, I suppose. People say 'there is something doing in that Chapel; look at the crowd, but we can not get in.' This one thing I ask—never come here to gratify your curiosity. You that are members of other congregations, just consider it your duty to stay at home. There are many stray sheep about. I would rather have them than you. Keep your own place. I do not want to rob other ministers. Do not come here from charity. We are much obliged to you for your kindly intentions, but we would rather have your room than your company, if ye are members of other churches."

But he says many good things, and we close by giving a specimen. It is on the People's Christ:

"Jesus Christ was of the people in his doctrine.—His gospel never was the philosopher's gospel, for it is not abstruse enough. It will not consent to be buried in hard words and technical phrases—it is so simple that he who can spell over, 'He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved'—may have a saving knowledge of it. Hence, worldly-wise men scorn the science of truth and sneeringly say: 'Why, even a blacksmith can preach now a days, and men who are at the plough-tail may turn preachers.' While priestcraft demands—'What right have they to do any such thing, unauthorized by us?' O, sad case that gospel truth should be slighted because of its plainness, and that my Master should be despised because he will not be exclusive—will not be monopolized by men of talent and erudition. Jesus is the ignorant man's Christ as much as the learned man's Christ; for he hath chosen the base things of the world and the things that are despised. Ah! much as I love true science and real education, I mourn and grieve that our ministers are so much diluting the word of God with philosophy—desiring to be intellectual preachers, delivering model sermons, well fitted for a room full of college students and professors of theology, but of no use to the masses, being destitute of simplicity, warmth, correctness, or even solid gospel matter. It is good to be a fellow-citizen in the republic of letters, but better far to be an able minister of the kingdom of heaven. It is a sad fact that high places and the gospel seldom well agree; and moreover, be it known, that the doctrine of Christ is the doctrine of the people. It was not meant to be a gospel of a caste, a clique or any one class of the community."

The Tongue of Fire; by Wm. Arthur. Harper & Bros, 1856.

Here too, is a portrait of the author, but the features are stamped with earnestness and power. The preface tells us that it is the "fruit of meditations entered upon with a desire to lessen the distance painfully felt to exist between the author's own life and ministry and that of primitive Christians." We are much mistaken if this happy result does not follow its circulation. It is such a book as we hail with delight for its present benefit and the good it must do. The baptism of fire—what it is, and its effects from the day of Pentecost till this day—its tongue-shaped manifestation—its searching and irresistible power—these are its themes. Christian, especially Christian minister, get the book. The author of the "successful merchant" will be largely instrumental in making a successful ministry.

To be "full of the Holy Ghost" is not a mere figure of speech, any more than to be "a good man"—and how this qualification bears upon the preacher! "O for men instinct with the Spirit—the countenance glowing as a transparency with a lamp behind it—the eye shining with a purer truer light than any that genius or good nature ever shed—and a tongue of fire!"

"Never, perhaps, did earthly eyes see more frequently than we see, in our day, men with ordinary Christian excellencies—men in private life whose walk is blameless—men in the ministry who are amiable, worthy and useful. But are not men "full of the Holy Ghost" a rare and unlisted race? Who make on believers the impression of being immediate and mighty instruments of God, and on unbelievers of the impression of it being dangerous to come near them lest they should convert them—are such men often met with? Do not even the good frequently speak as if we were not to look for such burning and shining lights? As if we must be content in our educated age with a style of holiness more level and less startling? Do not many make up their minds never more to see men such as their fathers saw; men at whose prayer a wondrous power of God was ever ready to fall, whether upon two or three kneeling in a cabin and wondering how the unlearned could find such wisdom, or the great multitude wondering how the learned could find such simplicity? Never more see such men? The Lord forbid! Return, O power of the Pentecost, return to thy people. Shed down thy flame on many heads!"

Headlands of Faith: By J. Cross, D. D.—Stevenson & Evans, Nashville, Tenn., 1856.

This is a series of nineteen dissertations on the cardinal truths of Christianity. Some of them are the elaborate preparations of the author's earlier days, retouched. Two of them have been published before. We give a sample from the one that has most delighted us on the "Perpetual Advocate:"

"It has been a question whether his intercession is vocal or voiceless—whether he pleads for us with words and arguments or only by presenting his sufferings as the price of our redemption. It is a matter of no practical importance. We know that he has entered into heaven itself, now to appear in the presence of God for us. This is enough. He has ascended with all his wounds. He stands before the throne as a lamb newly slain. His presence there immortalizes Calvary in the memory of God. It is as if his crucifixion were perpetuated in heaven. It is as if he had carried his cross with him when he ascended and planted it before the throne of the Father, and still hung writhing upon the crimson wood, a perpetual appeal alike to the Divine mercy and the Divine justice in behalf of all for whom he died."

The Kingdom that Shall not be Destroyed.—By Rev. J. Oswald, A. M., J. B. Lippincott & Co., Philadelphia, 1856.

This is an exposition of prophecy, more especially of Daniel, Chapter VII. Earth renewed is to be the saint's inheritance, heaven. The city looked for by patriarch—the city that hath foundations—the New Jerusalem, is to be the Metropolis. The pre-millennial advent is near, even at the door. The expectation was never so deep and general as now. Preaching, prayer, missions, etc., will not bring on millennium. It will come upon a very wicked world and unprepared. So reasons Mr. Oswald in sophmoric style. We owe it to the publishers to say that this is one of the best jobs of book manufacture that has reached our table.

The above books we have from the publishers through H. D. McGinnis, 36 Camp street. Others on hand will be noticed next week.

Appeal for Missionary Collections.

Bishop Pierce sends forth through the Southern Christian Advocate a stirring exhortation. South Carolina, Georgia and Alabama Conferences have resolved to raise $30,000 each. That can and from present appearances will be done. Other Conferences have resolved well, and we trust this will stir them up to perform the doing of it:

But, brethren, I record this fact not to glorify, but to cheer and encourage you to yet more glorious achievements. It is not to be denied that you are behind in your contributions to Missions. But that there is abundant ability to meet all the demands of the Church there can be no doubt, and that there is willingness to respond liberally I fully believe. Not that I suppose every man is prepared to do his entire duty in this department of Christianity; but after making the proper allowance for the love of money, the want of information, and for imperfect views of responsibility among the people, I am persuaded that the real cause of failure is to be found with the ministry. Some lack zeal in the cause—some are over modest—others are defective in their plans—and yet others, without explanation, argument or appeal, satisfy their consciences with a hat collection, and escape censure at Conference by reporting a few dimes as the most they could get. In this way circuits and stations are disgraced, when the men appointed to serve them are chiefly to blame.

Now then, a word of exhortation to each.

First—the preacher without zeal. Brother, brother, how can you allow this? Are you content with the very few you gather into the Church? Do you pray "Thy kingdom come," and do no more to answer your petition? O! think of Christ—his mission—his glory—his travail. You can readily understand that the professor of religion, who neither prays nor gives for the salvation of the heathen, is either mistaken about his conversion or has fallen from grace. What think you of the preacher who never pleads their cause; or if he opens his mouth, does it with so little faith and feeling as to chill his congregation? That member who never gives any be a miser; but that man called of God to preach, who does not pray, plead, work, anxiously striving to do good every way, that by all means he may save some, is a blank—a blot—a nightmare in Zion. "Awake! thou that sleepest."

And you, my modest, timid brother, will you never be a man? Do you mean to blush and tremble through the world, and die in debt to every good cause you might have served? Try—try again. Set your face like flint. Be bold. The work is necessary. The thing is right. It is a cross to preach—you have borne it and are neither killed nor wounded.—To ask the people to show their faith by their works is no great task after all. Preach on the subject—get your mind aglow—your heart on fire, your tears will vanish, and your success in "begging," as it is called, will astonish you—and others too.

And lastly, to those who neither preach nor talk upon the subject, but just before dismission announce a collection for Missions, and send a hat around to mock the cause. Verily, brethren, (I put you in the plural, for ye are many) you are helping the people to do nothing. This plan always was a bad one, is utterly worn out in these days. Put your beaver under the bench and let it stay there when you wish to raise money. Try propositions. Get you some slips of paper, or a suitable book—take down the name of every contributor, unless he objects—then set him down "cash"—a very good name on such occasions—go to every lady—be patient, earnest and persevering. Do not ask the people to throw in their mites—that is an invitation to do little, and they will do less. Tell them that the liberal devise liberal things. Make a reasonable calculation of what the people ought, on Christian principles, to give, and then ask—press kindly—urge without scolding or abuse. Tell them what other people are doing, and what is expected of them. Acquaint yourselves with the current facts in the history of the Missionary World—communicate to the Church—spread the reasons and motives of the enterprise before the people—plead the love of Christ, and exhort to large views and cheerful gifts. On this plan you will help to enlighten and sanctify the Church, while you will nobly aid the cause of God and all mankind.

A closing word to the people. Pride and emulation are not the feelings to be addressed in raising money for gospel enterprises; and yet we ought to "provoke one another to love and good works." It is true, moreover, that individuals and communities are judged by others, and that moral influence depends, very much, upon the reputation we establish among men. In relation to our charities, the popular judgment of what we ought to do, although not the authoritative measure of our duty, is nevertheless a criterion to which we ought to refer, if we would abstain from the appearance of evil or cut off occasion for offence from those who desire occasion. Every man is the proper judge, in the fear of God, of his own ability and obligation, but great caution is necessary, lest the motives and calculations which always antagonize liberality, do not betray us into mischievous error. If there be deficiency in any great department of moral action, we are justly obnoxious to rebuke. We do harm—great harm—harm in many ways. The example is bad. We fall below the demand of our principles and our professions, and forfeit the confidence and respect of the world. Nay more, we embarrass, if we do not arrest the progress of right views and furnish a pretext to others for dereliction of duty. Let me then say to the Georgia Conference, ministry and laity, the position of the Church among you, its intelligence, members and resources, justify the expectation of great, enlarged liberality. To fail—to come short, is to lose a good name, and this is more to be deprecated than the waste of ointment." In such a case religion suffers—Christ is wounded in the house of his friends—the Church is bereaved of an example greatly needed, and the cause of God forestalled by the infidelity of its avowed disciples.

The thousands given by South Carolina and Alabama to the Missionary Society, have been worth thousands more, than they actually contributed. I rejoice in their success and trust they will do better still. Georgia ought and might do better than either. Not for "the banner"—the eclat—the glorification—but for conscience—duty—Christ. Let the thirty thousand be raised. An empty treasury calls for it. Fields white unto the harvest are without a reaper. The Missionary Board is limited in its plans, by fear of debt and embarrassment. Wipe away your own reproach. Deserve and inherit the eulogy,—"she hath done what she could."

May the Spirit of the Lord God rest upon the Churches and the fire of love divine flame every where as "a lamp that burneth."

REVIVALS.

Wesley Chapel, Holmes Circuit, Miss. Conference

Bro. McTyeire:—For the benefit of your numerous readers, I send you the result of our third quarterly meeting, held at Wesley Chapel for Holmes Circuit. We commenced on Saturday before the second Sabbath in August.—Brother Pearce, the Elder, left on Monday, on account of fatigue. The meeting was then carried on by Brothers Vickers, Woodyard and myself. The weather being unsettled and rainy the most of the week, our congregation was rather small the most of the time. We had some conversions. Brother Vickers had to leave on Friday night for his own work. Brother Woodward also left on Saturday night to fill his own appointment. On Saturday night at the close of the sermon, the Holy Ghost came down, and if it did not fill the house the shouts did, for they went up from every part of the congregation save one corner. It seemed to be the fulfillment of Joel's prophecy, for the young men and young women did become teachers of the people—going through the congregation in search of their associates, bringing them to the altar; and if the old men and old women did not dream dreams, they did see visions and shout glory. After one hour more of rejoicing we tried to pray for the mourners, but the shouts of the brethren were so loud and incessant the Brother who led in prayer could not be heard. We then rejoiced and sung for an hour more, when I called on the congregation to kneel. I could not command silence, and after midnight I got up in the pulpit and commenced talking. I supposed they would stop; they did not, and I had to dismiss them still rejoicing, and I was told it was with difficulty that some of them could be got to leave. There was five of the penitents rose rejoicing. How many more the Lord spoke to in a "still, small voice," we do not know. On Sunday morning we had a large and attentive congregation and several penitents. Sunday night we had a house full to overflowing, the most attentive and serious congregation I ever saw. Our meeting the came to a close, having several mourners at the altar; we had quite a number of conversions, including white and colored, twenty-eight accessions to the church. To God be all the glory.

THOMAS C. HAYNES.

Sparta Circuit, La. Conference, Aug. 24, 1856.

Sparta Circuit is improving. Nearly all the appointments have had some accessions during the last quarter.—Sixty-two whites and thirty-eight colored probationers have been added; twenty-six have been baptized of whites and forty-nine colored, and many are crying "What shall I do to be saved?" Indeed conviction, greatly beyond ordinary, has taken hold of the people. Oh that it may end in a pentecostal shower.

Our last quarterly meeting was held at Areadia on the 17th, and our punctual Presiding Elder was with us in good health and preached with unusual ease to himself and greatly to the edifying of a large and attentive audience. Our meeting was protracted, and well attended by respectable citizens of Acadia and adjacent parts, until I left on Friday evening at 3 o'clock, on account of my health. Then the meeting was going on with increasing interest in the hands of efficient local brethren, viz: Revs. R. E. Goodgion, Blackburn, Hamilton and Rev. Sursey, a Cumberland Presbyterian and teacher in the Academy, and several class leaders of the working and praying sort. I also obtained the promise of attendance of our Recording Steward, Brother B. W. Pearce, who is a very popular speaker. With such instruments I trust that God will do much for the pleasant village of Arcadia in advancing Christianity.

WILLIAM A. SMITH.

Union Circuit, Alabama Conference, Aug. 22.

In connection with other brethren we have just closed a very interesting meeting at Union Chapel of thirteen days. It was one of the most refreshing times I have known. There were fifty-four accessions to the Church, and about that number of conversions, and the most of them about grown. The Lord is reviving his work abundantly in this part of his moral vineyard. Brethren pray for us.

W. H. Addis.

Bayou Pierre Circuit, Miss. Conference, Aug. 26.

We have just closed a very interesting protracted meeting at Pleasant Valley, Copiah county, Miss., which continued eleven days. From the first we had favorable indications—in fact there was a work in progress among the members at and before the commencement of the meeting. They had joined in a covenant to pray for a revival of God's work in the Church and in the community in which they live.—There was a travailing spirit manifest. Would to God that it was universal.—The congregation was large for the population throughout the meeting, and continued in interest. Sinners were convicted not merely theoretically but evangelically. There was that penitential sorrow for sin which leads to repentance not to be repented of. On Tuesday the converting power of God was present. Several found peace in believing, and every day afterwards until the close, there were more or less conversions. Christians were built up in their most holy faith; many were restored whose feet were nigh slipt.—Sinners that would not yield to be saved now promised their friends that they would lead different lives hereafter. May they remember their promise and never rest satisfied until they find peace in believing. Our meeting resulted in the conversion and reclamation of between fifty and sixty; twenty accessions to the church; and five professed sanctification. Brother Ercanbrack, from Georgetown Circuit was with us and labored efficiently.—The Lord bless him and his. At the same time and place there was a good work among the colored people. The planters permitted their servants to attend church three days during the meeting, and they were preached to separately. Several conversions and accessions to the church. There is an interesting society of colored people at this place. May the Great Head of the Church continue his blessings to the Pleasant Valley people.

W. B. Johnson.

New Lexington Circuit, Ala. Conference, Aug. 21.

We have just closed our third quarterly meeting for the New Lexington Circuit. It was truly a time of power and demonstration of the Holy Spirit. It commenced on Friday night and closed on Wednesday morning. The Presiding Elder being indisposed did not get to the meeting until Monday morning, he was not able then to preach but he brought a very good substitute, Bro. Hutchinson; Bro. Geo. Shatler, Jr., was with us nearly from the commencement. We had good local help. The meeting resulted in thirty accessions to the church, and that many conversions or more. The members built them a fine arbor, we had six cloth tents on the ground and one log tent. It was truly an old fashioned camp-meeting, may we have more of them.

J. W. M'Cann.

North Warren Circuit, Miss. Conference.

The Lord has visited our circuit. We closed a meeting at Oak Ridge last evening, there were eight conversions, most of them the brightest I ever beheld. Several backsliders reclaimed; an accession of ten whites, the church revived and all activity; profound interest throughout the community, house crowded for nine days. It was delightful to behold the different denominations singing, praying, praising and communing together, while sinners tremble and are troubled, the glory of God fills the house felt and seen; may it spead all over these lands.

J. Nicholson.

Ringgold, Louisiana Conference, Sept. 1, 1856.

I have some cheering news from Red River Circuit at last. We have had a fine meeting in this place, Ringgold. Six conversions and accessions to the church, and there is a deep religious feeling pervading this community.—Our meeting continued six days, embracing the 2d Sabbath in August.—The Baptists are now holding a meeting here. They have many penitents some of whom in Baptist phrase, have hope. I am with them in feeble health, trying to do all the good I can. The Baptist Ministers here gave me efficient aid at my meeting. A good state of feeling on my work pretty generally. Our camp-meeting comes on the 2d day of October. I wish you could be with us.

By the same, on the 28th of August, at the residence of Hardin Barville, Mr. LIVINGSTON TURNER to Miss SOPHRONIA BIDWELL, of DeSoto Parish, La.

On the 6th September, by the Rev. [illegible] H. Chaney, Rev. A. E. GOODWYN, of Louisiana Conference, to Miss LUCY A. HARPER, of Iberville Parish, La.

DEATHS.

Died.—In this place, August 31st, ELLIE ELSWORTH, infant son of Rev. W. H. and Mrs. M. E. Sanders—aged sixteen months and a half.

Little Willie was beautiful in person, gentle and amiable in disposition, and playful in manners. He lived just long enough to show that nature had designed him to be no ordinary child. But the Master called him too well to leave him to the cruel buffetings of a cold world. He has transplanted the lovely flower to bloom and expand in a more genial clime. Little Willie, we doubt not, has gone up from a world of sorrow to be a bright-robed angel in heaven.

Mother was the stroke to his fond parents, and sweet circle of affection, which none but a parent can know, very strangely and suddenly severed. But our Lord Jesus says, "weep not, he is not dead but sleepeth"—what I do thou knowest not, now, but shalt know hereafter." May his own hand apply the bleeding hearts the precious consolations of sustaining grace, and make this light affliction work for them a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory.

Jackson, La., Sept. 5th 1856.

[illegible]ville Christian Advocate will please copy.

Died.—In Livingston, Ala., 7th of [illegible] 1856, Dr. ROBERT L. HUNTER, in the 42d year of his age.

It is seldom we are called upon to record the death of one so universally beloved by all. He was a skilful and successful Physician and will long, long, be in the kindest remembrances of many families in this county. Indeed, it is hardly an exageration, to say that a man of a kinder heart, never lived—and, if he did not grow rich by his practice as a Physician, it was because the kindness of his heart, would not permit him to be just to himself.

A christian he loved the church, and taking his christian life through, of near twenty years, there are few whose lives are more consistent with the heavenly calling. If he sometimes wandered from the path of duty, there was none who was more truely penitent. In his last sickness, his mind was calm and peaceful, and his trust in the Redeemer afforded him strong consolation, and he quietly closed his last, in the blessed hope of the resurrection of the just.

Notice—To all whom it may concern. I propose to take into my own house, as members of my family, eight or ten well behaved young men, provided the terms be complied with.

Parents may rely that their sons' moral character will be vigilantly cared for.

D. C. H. CONNELLY,
Principal, Male Department.

Summerfield, Ala., August, 1856.

Notice.—There will be a Camp Meeting in Pigeon Campground, in Pike county, beginning on the first Friday in October, and ending the following Tuesday or Wednesday. Also, a Camp-Meeting at Mount Camp-ground, in Amite county, beginning the third Friday in October and ending as above. The preachers, both itinerant and local, and the people generally, are affectionately invited to attend.

J. G. JONES, P. E.

Notice.—There will be a Camp-meeting at the Bethel camp ground, Wilkinson county, Miss., commencing on the 17th of September. Ministers and people generally invited to attend.

Great Cure of Piles.—Camden, N. J., [illegible]

Dear Sir: It is with much pleasure I take the opportunity of informing you of the great benefit I have derived from the use of a few bottles of Woodland's German Balm. For a number of years I have been sorely and severely afflicted with pain in the stomach, attended by severe attacks of the piles, for which I tried a great many remedies, but without affording me any relief. Being advised to use the GERMAN BITTERS, I did so, using in connection for the Piles, SPIKENARD OINTMENT, and I now inform you that it has entirely cured me and restored me to health, and I advise all the afflicted to use your valuable medicine. Respectfully yours, MARGARET REPSHER

PRODUCTION OF COTTON.

At a recent meeting of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, a very important and interesting paper on cotton, its manufacture, etc., was read by Mr. Dawson. It consisted of a series of propositions, of which the subjoined is a brief, but clear, synopsis:

1. That cotton, from the conditions of climate necessary to its culture, cannot be grown in Europe, but that with the single and not important exception of the factories in the New England States of America, it is and must long continue to be manufactured exclusively in Europe. 2. That the present supply is chiefly raised, and for the present must continue to be raised, by slave labor—seeing that while for fifty years we have sought over the whole earth for cotton, we have during that time continued to obtain from the slave States of the American Union a continually increasing proportion of our entire supply. 3. That two thirds in number at least of the slave population of the United States have been called into existence, and are now directly or indirectly maintained for the supply of cotton for exportation. 4. That of the cotton thus exported, three fourths at least in value are raised for and sent to this country alone. And, 5. That of the entire quantity we import, four fifths at least in value are thus derived from the United States.

The foregoing propositions will not be disputed by any man of intelligence; and although they do not accord a sufficient amount of importance to American factories, they may be considered as a graceful acknowledgement of the dependence of the "Mother Country" upon the snowy staple of the South. While our trans-Atlantic brethren yield us the palm so far as production is concerned, we would be exceedingly ill-natured if we disturbed their complacency in regard to their superiority in the manufacturing line.

It is a fact that cotton is "chiefly raised" and "must continue to be raised by slave labor." It is also a fact that the main supply of the material which clothes the world must come from the Southern United States. It is also a fact that Abolition Britain—the land of the Sutherlands and Thompsons, et id omne genus—the land in honor of which the poet proudly proclaimed—has made, and does make, more, money—clear profits annually—from the manufacture of Southern slave-grown cotton, than do the planters and owners of the slaves themselves! And it is furthermore a fact—very plainly admitted in the foregoing resume—that England would suffer more from a deprivation of the cotton crop for a single year than half-a-dozen Bunsinns wars could possibly inflict upon her.

"Slaves cannot breathe in England—"

But, to return to our text, from which we have been wandering somewhat disconcively. Each proposition of the foregoing synopsis was supported by tabular accounts compiled from the official records of Great Britain and the United States, and the conclusion was expressed in the following language:

That hence in the present state of the commercial relations of the two countries, the cotton planters of the United States are interested to the extent of two-thirds, at least, of their entire exportable produce in the maintenance of the cotton manufactures of the United Kingdom, and that reciprocally the cotton manufacturers of the United Kingdom, and through them the entire population of the Kingdom, are interested, to more than four-fifths of the raw material of that manufacture, in the existing arrangements for maintaining the cotton culture of the United States.

The above statement of the case is a tolerably fair one, considering the source whence it came. But it does not cover the whole ground by long odds. Neither is it correct in an extremely important essential. The "cotton manufactures of the United Kingdom" are completely dependent upon "the cotton planters of the United States" for a supply of the raw material. Without these "cotton planters" of the South, the "cotton manufacturers of the United Kingdom" would encounter immediate and immediately ruin! Not so with the "cotton planters of the United States." The "United Kingdom" might sink, and they would still have the whole earth for a market, and would go on prosperously as heretofore. The difference between the two parties may be stated thus: Our "cotton planters" have the world for a market, while the British "cotton manufacturers" are compelled to look almost exclusively to us for supplies of the material wherewith to keep their mills going. In other words, we might get along without them, when, under no circumstances, could they possibly get along without us. Here is the whole difference in a nutshell.

However, we hope the cotton planters and cotton manufacturers will long continue the mutually profitable connection that has existed for years. It would be a spite-full your nose to spite your face business to break it up. Mr. John Bull, New Orleans proffers a cordial grip to Liverpool. May our business relations ever remain unchanged.—[Crescent.

NEW ARRANGEMENTS IN OUR STEAM COMMUNICATION.—We have been informed that the Southern Steamship Company, through their agents, Messrs. Harris, Morgan & Co., have entered into an arrangement with the Opelousas Railroad Company to put on a steamer to run between Galveston and Berwicks' Bay, making weekly trips from each place, and that this steamer is now nearly ready to be put upon the route.

We also learn that these gentlemen have purchased the steamship Calhoun, with the intention of putting her in the Vera Cruz trade, in the place of the Texas, and that she is expected to be here in a couple of weeks.

It is also stated that Messrs. Harris, Morgan & Co. have purchased a steamer to take the place of the ill-fated Nautilus in the Brazos trade, and that it is their intention to build another vessel to run in connection with her. The steamer which they have purchased is expected to be here in a week or ten days.

This information gives as great pleasure, as it is an evidence of the growing importance of our trade with those ports, and also as it evinces the continued prosperity and enterprise of a company to which our city owes so much.

LOSS OF THE BARK ST. LAWRENCE.—The ship Indiana, Captain Coffin, which arrived here yesterday morning from New York, brought Capt. Stetson and crew of the bark St. Lawrence of New York, from New York for this port with a cargo of lime and assorted merchandise. Captain Stetson reports having experienced a hurricane on the 28th ult., in lat. 25 59, long. 85 48, and on the 30th ult. discovered the ship to be on fire. In a few minutes after the pitch in the decks was all melted. Capt. Stetson and crew took to the boats, having barely time to escape—saving nothing but a barrel of water and a barrel of bread. About three hours after she burnt to the water's edge and sank. They then shaped their course for New Orleans, and had proceeded about one hundred miles in the boats, on the third day after leaving the wreck, made a sail ahead—the weather being fine with a smooth sea—set a signal of distress, which was seen by the vessel, and which proved to be the ship Indiana. They were taken on board and received every attention from Captain Coffin and crew.

RUMOR.—It is understood here, says the Washington correspondent of the Baltimore Patriot, of the 2d, that the object of Mr. Soulé's visit to Nicaragua is in connection with the negotiation of a loan of $2,000,000 with the government.

Dr. Ramsey, a notorious swindler and forger, who has operated pretty extensively in Georgia, in the way of forging pension claims and land warrants, committed suicide while confined in jail at Sparta, Ala., on the 27th ult., by taking the seed of the jamestown weed.

The United States mail steamship Hermann, Commander Higgins, from Bremen, via Southampton, August 13th, arrived at New York on the 28th ult., bringing 283 passengers and a large and valuable cargo. Her news has been anticipated by the arrival of the Niagara at Boston.

The mortality in the city of Brooklyn during the week ending on the 31st ult. was 116, of whom 78 were minors.

At a Newport ball, lately, a young lady wore a head-dress composed of gold pieces about the size of a half eagle. There was at least an hundred dollars worth attached to the young lady's hair by fine gold chains, and dangling around her neck and ears. Another lady, of New York, wore in her hair imitation ears of Indian corn, as large as life. The ball-room must have looked like the drawing-room of a lunatic asylum.

The Temperance Crusader (Penfield, Ga.) of the 30th ult., says that the "army worm" has made its appearance in that vicinity, and is destroying almost every green thing in its course.

Secretary Dobbin left Washington on the morning of the 2d, on a visit to North Carolina, where he intends to remain about a month. The chief clerk, Mr. Welsh, has been commissioned as acting Secretary of the Navy.

TREATY WITH ST. DOMINGO.—St. Domingo advices to August 7th state that the Government had asked Secretary Marcy to return the late treaty concluded with the United States, with the intention to suppress it, at the instigation of the Spanish Consul.

Loss of the Ship Diadem.

Captain Webber and crew, of the ship Diadem, arrived here Monday last on the schooner W. H. Titcomb. Capt. Webber reports: "Cleared from this port, for New York, on the 22d August, and left the Southwest Pass on the 25th, with a light breeze from the northwest. Had calms for five days, then took a light breeze from northeast, which continued to increase steadily during the day, till night, when it became squally, with much lightning from the southward. On Wednesday night, very squally; reduced sail accordingly. On Thursday morning, storm having increased, hove to under close reefed main-top sail and main spanker; barometer falling fast; wind increasing; furled main-top sail at 2, P. M.; laying to under main spanker on the port tack, with the wind from the northward and eastward; blowing a tremendous hurricane, every other sail being furled with extra gaskets, a heavy sea struck the ship, carrying away the bulwarks with all the stanchions, and all from the fore rigging to within six or seven feet of the taffrail, splitting the plank shear in many places and sweeping the decks, fore and aft, of goods, water casks, etc.; bursting open the after hatch and carrying away the house on deck. The cabin was stove to pieces; the captain, mate and steward were all covered by the ruins, but were rescued, being badly bruised. The man at the wheel was swept overboard—also three others of the crew, who were drowned.

After this, we could do nothing more than lash ourselves to the mast.—Some were lashed to the pumps, from which they were swept away several times during the night. After remaining in this condition for some time, a tremendous gust of wind swept over the ship, taking with it the fore and main top-masts. Soon after this a gust still more violent broke away the fore and main masts, breaking them off below the deck, leaving huge holes in the deck. The ship, by this time, was water-logged. On Saturday the bark Yuba hove in sight; seeing our signal of distress on the mizzen, (the only mast we had standing,) the captain made for us and waved his hat in signification that he would lay by us. A boat being lowered, to the imminent danger of those that manned her, she made for us, but the crew being unable, from the roughness of the sea, to get on board either the Diadem or the Yuba, they had to remain in the boat all night. In the morning they succeeded in taking us off, and in returning to the Yuba, the boat was twice upset. Capt. Webber clung to the bottom of the boat and was rescued, but the mate of the bark Yuba, who manned her boat, was missing—also the seaman belonging to the Diadem. They were all taken on board the bark, and kindly cared for by the captain and his lady. On Wednesday morning they were taken off the bark by the schooner W. H. Titcomb, Capt. Manning, from Rockland for this port."

Disasters.

The gale of the 28th and 29th ult. appears to have been very disastrous off the coast. The following vessels have arrived here since Saturday morning, viz:

The brig Ocean Wave, Capt. Lee, from Mobile, bound to New York, reports on the 29th ult., lat. 26 deg. long. 84 deg. 20 min., having lost top gallant and royal masts, jibboom and all sails and rigging attached. She will undergo repairs, and proceed on her voyage.

The bark Merlin, Capt. Ricker, from the Caribean Sea, bound to Baltimore with a cargo of guano, Capt. Ricker reports that on the 29th ult., when in lat. 26 deg. 15 min., long. 80 deg., experienced a heavy gale; lost fore and main-topmasts; at the time she had 16 feet water in her hold. A portion of the cargo was thrown overboard to lighten the ship. She arrived at Algiers with two feet water in her hold.

Capt. Montgomery, of the brig Marseilois, arrived here yesterday morning on the ship Orphan. Capt. Montgomery reports having experienced a hurricane on the 28th ult. when about forty miles south-east of Tortugas. 9 P. M. discovered the vessel to be on fire; she was laboring heavily at the time; cut away fore mast to ease her. On the 30th, shipped a heavy sea, which stove the after house, and washed everything out of it. On the 2d inst. was taken off by the ship Orphan, Capt. Kempton. They saved nothing but a few pieces of clothing. The flames burst through the decks shortly after leaving her. Capt. M. returns thanks, that is through the medium of the press, to Capt. Kempton and crew for their kind attention while on board of his vessels.

The bark Washington Butcher, Capt. Collins, from Philadelphia, arrived, materially damaged and leaking. Capt. Collins reports that he caught the gale when sixty miles to westward of the Tortugas. He was compelled to cut away the foremast, main top-mast, jib-boom and everything attached. Had three feet water in the hold and threw overboard a portion of the cargo to lighten her. Capt. Collins informs us that when off Apalachicola he was boarded by a boat from the shore. Those on board reported that the schooner Wm. H. Pettis, Capt. Smith, had been driven high and dry ashore near Apalachicola, and would, it was supposed, be a total loss.

COTTON, BAGGING AND GUNNY CLOTH.—Of course it will be impossible for cotton to come to market unless it had suitable covering, or otherwise called in plantation phrase "baling." During the season there have been great investments, otherwise speculation—perhaps it might be called gambling—going on in India gunny cloth and gunny bags; the former adapted and used for cotton, the latter for corn, wheat and oats. Under a presumed short supply, prices advanced the last month to 23 and 24 cents per yard for gunny cloth, and about the same price for Kentucky bagging. The abundance of money and the general easy position of our money market had great influence on operations, which are based on speculation. We do not think any of our banks have encouraged this species of trading, which would tend to the disadvantage of the cotton interest.

In our issue of this morning we give the authentic contents of a circular from Calcutta, of the 3d July, (only a little over sixty days since,) which indicates that gunny cloth and gunny bags are accidentally destined to reach those elevated prices which would enhance the price or value of cotton, corn, wheat, or any article which, in the course of trade, may be involved in the use of these articles. It will be observed that we have advices of 97,284 pieces of gunny cloth, nearly equivalent to 3,000,000 of yards, being shipped at Calcutta for the month of June and the three first days of July, and 956,000 gunny bags. And from the remarks following the statement, there is every reason to believe that shipments will increase as the high prices and good demand were increasing the supplies, of which a good share will seek the United States for a market, or rather they will come hither, as dealers will anticipate a good business. The demand may be good, but whether at remunerative prices over cost in India is a question that can hardly be answered at this moment. Although the shipments from Calcutta which we have noticed may not arrive till next month, and perhaps not till November, nevertheless planters will know there is an ample supply of bagging and bags on the way for a market.

The following extract of a Circular, dated Calcutta, July 3, 1856, will give some insight as regards the quantity of gunny cloth and gunny bags in course of shipment for the United States, of which it is presumed a full share will find the way to New Orleans. Planters of cotton need not have any serious apprehension but what they will have sufficient covering for their cotton at reasonable rates.

Shipments of gunny bags and gunny cloth from Calcutta to the United States during the month ending June 30, 1856:

By ship Sobine, for Boston, cleared	11th June	Gunny Cloth Bags.	Gunny Cloth Pieces.
Flying Eagle	12th June	4,705	9,228
Montmorenci	14th June	111,450	10,230
Peter Marcey	14th June	71,500	3,500
Lord Clive, New York	17th June		952
Medallion, Boston	19th June	122,250	6,564
Mary Melville	23d June	5,500
Ammonoosuc	23d June	20,000	9,208
Belle Windgrove	25th June		24,386
		737,050	71,316

The following vessels were loading on the 30th June, and had on board 170,000 bags and 22,068 pieces gunny cloth, ships John Wills, Gockland, Georges and Rockall.

EXPORTS

As reported in the general Circular:

Gunny Cloth—The demand for this cloth has continued during the past fortnight. It will be seen that the shipments have been on a very large scale since the commencement of the company's trial year on the 1st of May. It is alleged that the practice of getting the Calcutta prices quoted for export has been discontinued, since the fraud has attracted so much attention. We hear of ships at 11, with the privilege of additional rejection, and the current rate may be quoted at 12 for cloth of full weight.

Gunny Bags—The demand still continues brisk, but arrivals have been large, and a slight decline in the quotations has followed. Good bags are still worth 12 3-16 to 14 rupees.

Exchange—The money market has shown continued dullness during the past month, and very little has been done in Exchange. We hear of several considerable sales at 2s. 1½d., but the mail closes a shade lower at 2s. 1¼d. for Bankers and Private Credits.

Freights—The arrivals from all quarters have been very numerous during the past month, and the quantity of tonnage in port, for the first time this season, exceeds shippers. However, homeward freights are pressing, and Liverpool and Rice are going forward again to England at an advance of about 5s. per ton, our quotations being £2 5s. To the United States $1166-342 have been obtained for small parcels; but we learned to-day a cash room taken at an advance of 10s. per ton. Bay Chinas (the remains per last mail) are still saleable for Rice, at 11 to the Maund.

Magnetic Telegraph.

FOUR DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

ARRIVAL OF THE CANADIAN AT QUEBEC.

QUEBEC, Sept. 3.—The Liverpool and Montreal screw steamship Canadian, from Liverpool on the afternoon of the 27th, has arrived at this port.

The Arabia arrived out at Liverpool on the 25th.

Commercial Intelligence.

The Cotton market is unchanged in every respect, the steamers news having no effect.

The sales for three days (Saturday, Monday and Tuesday,) amounted to 20,000 bales, of which speculators took 2,500, and exporters 4,000 bales.

Breadstuffs are a shade higher. Better grades of Wheat have advanced. Flour is unchanged since our last quotations. The demand is active.

CORN.—Transactions were small, but prices were firm, with an advance of 6d.

Lard firm. Bacon is unchanged. Pork is considerably lower.

Consols for money quoted at 95¼ to 95½.

The Canadian brings no news of importance.

The Fulton and City of Baltimore sailed on the 27th.

Maine Election.

PORTLAND, Sept. 8.—Returns have been received from fifty-one towns, which give Hamlin 5,800 majority over both his opponents.

J. M. Wood and —— Gilman (Republican) are elected to Congress from the First and Second Districts.

Later.

PORTLAND, Sept. 9.—We have full returns from one hundred and fifty towns. Hamlin's majority over both of his opponents foots up 11,000. The whole Republican State ticket is elected, and the Republicans will doubtless return all six Congressmen.

PORTLAND, Sept. 9.—The Legislature is largely Republican—168 towns give Hamlin 12,000 majority.

Domestic Markets.

NEW YORK, Sept. 8.—Cotton has advanced ⅛c. The market is firm.—The sales of to-day foot up 2000 bales. Orleans Middling 11¼c; Uplands Middling 11¼c. Mess Pork is 8 shilling higher; Corn firm at 67½c; Freights heavy.

NEW YORK, Sept. 9.—Flour 5s lower. State is quoted at $6 30; Ohio, $6 25 to $6 80. Wheat—Western Red, $1 50 to $1 52; Southern Red, $1 53, Mixed Corn, 62½c. Whisky, 34.

CINCINNATI, Sept. 9.—Flour is quiet and prices are unchanged. Whisky is unchanged. Coffee, 11½ to 12. Molasses firm at 35c.

STARTLING NEWS FROM KANSAS!

CHICAGO, Sept. 5.—The road known as the Iowa road, leading from Iowa into Kansas, is completely blockaded by armed Missourians.

The blockading force have prevented an emigrant party from the Free States, numbering one hundred and fifty men, entering the Territory.

This party will, as soon as it can obtain reinforcements, attempt to force a passage into Kansas.

ST. LOUIS, Sept. 4.—We have advices from Kansas to the 29th. A force of 1500 men, under the command of Atchison, were preparing to attack Lawrence on the 1st of September.

The Free State forces at Lawrence number from 1500 to 2000, and a sanguinary conflict will probably result.

ST. LOUIS, Sept. 5.—Every Free-soiler has been driven from Leavenworth at the point of the bayonet and all their property has been either destroyed or confiscated.

ST. LOUIS, Sept. 5.—On the morning of the 30th a battle took place at Ossawottomie between 300 Pro-slavery troops, under Capt. Reid, and about the same number of Free-soilers, under Brown. The battle lasted about an hour, and resulted in the total route of the Free-soilers, with a loss of twenty killed and several wounded.

The Pro-slavery loss was five killed and wounded.

Among the Free-soilers killed, it is reported here, Brown, editor Free State Herald, and his son.

The town of Ossawottomie was burned by the victors.

NEW YORK, Sept. 6.—It is supposed that the Kansas correspondent of the New York Tribune was killed in the attack on Leavenworth.

ST. LOUIS, Sept. 5.—Leavenworth was attacked on Tuesday last by a large force from Weston, Mo., and every Free State man driven from the town at the point of the bayonet.

The Missourians had called upon the people of Leavenworth to take up arms against the Free-soilers, and the attack was made in consequence of their refusal.

Four men were killed, several wounded, and two houses burned.

The pro-slavery forces are unable to march against Lawrence in consequence of a lack of men and munitions.

They call loudly for reinforcements and means of prosecuting the war.

ST. LOUIS, Sept. 5.—Governor Geary has arrived, and will proceed immediately to Kansas.

Instructions have been transmitted from Government to Gov. Geary and Gen. Smith, for a more efficient enforcement of the laws and the speedy suppression of incipent treason.

The new Governor is instructed to enroll the militia of Kansas, and furnish Gen. Smith such a force as may be required to put down the insurrection.

Gen. Smith is instructed by the President to draw on the Governor of Kansas for militia forces to put down the insurrection, and if there be not a sufficient force raised in Kansas, he is authorized to call on the States of Illinois and Kentucky; whose Governors have been furnished with requisitions from the President for two regiments of infantry in case they are needed.

Fever at Fort Hamilton.

NEW YORK, Sept. 5.—The fever is abating at Fort Hamilton and vicinity. Some new cases are reported, but they are of a mild type.

CALIFORNIA AFFAIRS.

The Government Moves in the Revolution.

WASHINGTON, Sept. 5.—Important instructions will be sent out to the Government officers in California in regard to the revolution in San Francisco by the next steamer.

The nature of these instructions has not yet transpired.

Arrival of the Ericsson.

NEW YORK, Sept. 6.—The steamship Ericsson (now of the Collins line) has arrived. Her dates have been anticipated by the Persia.

RECEIPTS OF COTTON AT SHREVEPORT.—The receipts of cotton at this port, says the South-Western, of the 27th, from the 1st of September, 1855, to date, were:

At the warehouses*, per wagons	50,152 bales.
At Mrs. Alexander's	5,000 "
Per boats from Upper Red River, and reshipped at this place	12,000 "
Total receipts	67,152 bales.
Shipped	60,143 "
Stock on hand, August 25	1,009—67,152 bales.

Fifteen bales of the new crop of cotton have been received.

* We were unable to ascertain the number of bales received by Mr. Nat Moore, previous to retiring from business, and they are of course not enumerated in the above aforesaid. He did not receive less than 12,000 bales, which would make the receipts 79,155 bales.

Shreveport is a place, and no mistake. But Shreveport is bound to be a greater place, at no distant period. The completion of the Vicksburg, Shreveport and Texas Railroad will add vastly to the commercial importance of the town, while it will confer immense benefits upon the country through which it passes.

JEALOUSY AND MURDER.—The New York Sunday Times, of the 31st ult., says it learns, upon good authority, that a terrible scene occurred on Monday, the 25th, at one of the principal hotels in that city. A merchant had kept company with a young woman for six years, but discarded her for another, with whom he took lodgings at the hotel in question, and there passed as man and wife. The first lady hearing of it, also took lodgings at the hotel, and the moment her faithless lover left the house on Monday, she entered the room where her rival lay in bed, whom she assailed with a large knife, cut off one of her breasts, and plunged the knife into her bosom. The screams of the wounded lady brought assistance, the offender was arrested, and surgical aid procured for the sufferer. Great efforts, the Times says, have been made to keep the matter secret, and to some degree with success.

There were only 264 deaths in the city of Philadelphia during the week ending on the 30th ult.

Louisiana Intelligence.

RED RIVER.—The Natchitoches Chronicle, of the 30th ult., says:

Red River has become impassable for any class of steamboats above the falls. The whole travel of our section is now carried on by stages. Neither up or down freight are dealt in.

STAGE UPSET.—The same paper has the following:

The stage coach on the line between Natchitoches and Mansfield was upset on Thursday morning, about three miles from this town. There were eight passengers in the stage, (one of them a lady,) several of whom were badly bruised and cut. From conversation with several of those who were the victims, we learn that the upsetting of the stage was deliberately done by the driver, who, before starting, had a difficulty with some of the passengers and thus villanously wreaked his revenge.

THE FEATHAT HUMBUG CAUGHT.—The Concordia Intelligencer says:

The person we mentioned in our last as having been arrested near Fayette, did not turn out to be the one whose capture was so eagerly desired, but we had the satisfaction of receiving the real "Simon pure on Sunday evening in our strong house, village of Vidalia, from the hands of Constable Hugh Coyle, of Natchez.

The Shreveport Southwestern, of the 27th ult., says:

We learn that, notwithstanding the drought, cotton looks promising on the river plantations, especially in the parish of Bossier.

The Plaquemine Gazette, of the 6th inst., says:

This parish is remarkably healthy at present; times hard; money scarce; collectors on every corner of the street, with pockets full of unpaid bills. No crops, no sugar, no money, no funds, and no credit, is the cry.

We find the following in the same paper:

At the request of Gen. C. S. Rousseau, we publish the following description of a body found by the Blue Hummock, on her last cruise to Last Island. The body appears to be that of a person about five feet nine inches in height, dressed with a black merino frock coat, a very close white merino undershirt, no vest, twilled cotton drawers, white pantaloons, a pair of shoes, short, straight brown hair, colored, mixed with red; his pocket book containing one gold lady's necklace, with some money in bank-notes; on one sleeve of the shirt was attached a gold stud or button. These relics are now in the possession of Gen. Rousseau, Recorder of the parish of Iberville, and may be seen at any time by calling at his office in Plaquemine.

CROPS IN MADISON PARISH.—The Richmond Journal, of the 5th inst., says:

The effects of the late rains upon the cotton crop are plainly discernible now. The weed has grown very large, and has thrown out its forms and squares, until there is scarcely anything left. Experienced planters are of opinion that the crop is fully one-third short of last year.

We continue to hear complaints of the worm. They are not as yet in sufficient numbers to do much in the way of stripping the plant. The boll worm, just now, seems to be doing the most mischief.

NEW POST-ROADS IN LOUISIANA AND MISSISSIPPI. The following post-roads have been recently established by Congress:

Louisiana.—From Vermillionville, via Randolph Cady's on the Bayou Queue Tortue, and Meirs' Settlement on the Bayou Blanc to Cottrell's on the Mermonton river.

From Providence, by Floyd to Bastrop.

From Peeun Grove to Floyd.

From Marion, via Brock's Store, Cherry Ridge, Spearsville, Cornie Bluffs, and Lisbon to Homer.

From Harrisonburg, in Catahoula parish, to Good Water, in Winn parish.

From Clinton, in East Feliciana, to Prospect Hill, on railroad, via Darlington, Greensburg, and Kemps Bridge.

From Bastrop to Ashton, on the Mississippi river.

From Columbia to Natchitoches, via Castor Site's.

From Louisville (Arkansas) to the Orchard Grove, in the parish of Bossier, (Louisiana) by way of F. D. Harris, and A. Byrne's.

From Franklington in Washington parish, to Davidson, via Charles Knight's and Dunn Crane's.

From Huddleston, via Amacaco, Mill Creek and Manny to Belmont.

From St. Martinsville, by way of Cote Jelle, to Vermillionville.

Mississippi.—From Hillsboro, by Shumans Hill, to Garlandsville.

From Ocean Springs to Dwlers' Ferry, in Jackson county.

From Okaloua, via Redland, to Sarepta.

From Paulding to Colemanna and Bearing Creek to Ocolua.

From Oshaloua, via Paimetto and Chesterville, to Ellistown.

From Beaverdam, by Napier and Owenon, to Erata.

From Hillsboro', via Sebastopol and Steeles, to Philadelphia.

RECEPTION AND DINNER TO GEORGE PEABODY, ESQ., BY THE BALTIMOREANS.—The Baltimore Sun, of the 3d, has the following:

It being understood that our former fellow-citizen, George Peabody, the distinguished American merchant of London, where he has resided for fifteen years past, is about to return to this country on a visit, the Maryland Institute has determined upon tendering him a generous welcome on his arrival, and has already taken the first steps toward that object. It will be remembered that Mr. Peabody, in addition to his numerous other generosities, was a substantial patron of the Institute when it needed friends for the erection of its stately hall, which is now the pride of our city. Besides, there are many other considerations, of a more public character, which render this proposed compliment by the Institute eminently fitting and proper, and we hope that it will be attended with the success which generally follows the movements of that popular society.

The Patriot, of the same date, says:

We are gratified to learn that our Board of Trade held a meeting some days ago, and passed resolutions tendering to Mr. Peabody a dinner and an appropriate welcome upon the part of the Baltimore merchants, on the occasion of his arrival in this city, at a time suiting his own convenience.

STEAMER S. S. PRENTISS SUNK.—The Mobile Tribune, of last Sunday, says:

The steamboat S. S. Prentiss, undergoing repairs during the summer at Stockton, sank on Friday last in water deep enough to come up to her cabin floor. A few days previous to this the crew was ordered to put everything aboard and bring her to the city; but when she had received a large quantity of heavy timbers, wheel-arms, etc., her hull was brought so much lower in the water than it had been for several months before, and her seams being opened from the action of the sun, that she soon filled and sank, before those left in charge of her could prevent it.

The Prentiss was considered one of the most comfortable boats that ran on the Tombigbee river, and this misfortune will delay for a time her being put in the trade.

THE ALERT.—The Mobile Tribune, of Sunday last, says:

Considerable apprehension being felt about the fate of this schooner, we are assured that she is all safe. She took shelter from the storm of Saturday night week in Navy Cove, where she remained until Monday morning following, when, the weather moderating, she hoisted sale and went out.

THE FAMINE AT THE CAPE DE VERDES.—Arrival of the American Supplies.—Letters have been received in town from A. S. Mattens, Esq., United States Vice-Consul at St. Vincent, Cape de Verdes, announcing the arrival of the first shipment of provisions sent out from New York for the relief of the starving population of the islands. Of the value of this timely aid our readers may form some idea, from the fact that the Governor-General had found it necessary to proceed in person to the neighboring coast of Africa to obtain supplies of food. The first of the New York vessels which reached the islands was the N. Hand, whose owners, Messrs. Bliss & Co., generously placed it at the disposal of the committee of subscribers. Two others followed close on her track, and no doubt arrived shortly after. Immediately on the receipt of the first cargo of provisions, Mr. Martens took steps to have it properly distributed. With this view he directed a circular to the different Administradores de Concelho, requesting them to receive and supply the provisions to all who were really in need of them, and recommending that they should call in the aid of the Vicars of the different parishes, to assist them in making a discriminating distribution. The quantity of provisions remaining at the time of this opportune arrival was so small that it became necessary to distribute them in rations quite inadequate to sustain life for any lengthened period. It must be gratifying to the benevolent individuals who contributed to the New York fund, to know that the aid which they so promptly furnished has been the means of saving large numbers of human beings from perishing.—[New York Herald, 31st ult.

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMSHIP PERSEVERANCE.

The steamship Perseverance, Henry Sheppard, commander, from Galveston and Indianola, arrived here yesterday morning, with dates from Galveston to the 6th inst., and all the interior of the State as late as due.

The Galveston Civilian, of the 6th, has the following items:

The Senate has rejected a bill to incorporate Mons. Combehart and his company of French colonists. It would have been well had the same course been pursued in regard to many other bills incorporating private companies. As a general rule, these corporations expect nothing from such acts, except the factitious reputation of being creatures of the State, and immunity from individual responsibility on the part of those who expect to be benefitted by the association.

The Supreme Court commences its next term at Austin on the third Monday in October—the Legislature having passed an act to that effect.

Galveston was visited by a thin rain last Wednesday—the first for some weeks. The cisterns are now replenished, the grass will grow again, and the prospect is good for fall and winter gardens.

To Mother in Heaven.

BY J. W. WELCH.

Thou art sleeping, sweetly sleeping,
And they say thou'lt never wake,
Though hearts are o'er thee weeping,
And with anguish almost break;
Thy lips are sealed in silence,
And for eyes to instruct their tone;
Oh! 'tis bitter, bitter sorrow,
To feel that thou art gone.

Thou art sleeping, sweetly sleeping,
In Death's icy cold embrace;
Thou will sleep no more unto me,
I shall see no more thy face;
In the old church-yard thou art resting,
And my heart is sad to-day,
For my weary feet are roaming
Far from my home away.

All the flowers have lost their sweetness,
I do not love them now;
And the rippling brook complaineth,
In murmurs soft and low.
When I sit me down, in fancy,
Beneath the dark green tree,
The brooklet ripples sadly on,
And it seems to ask for thee.

I remember when they laid thee
In the silent grave to rest,
And the green sods of the valley
Which they heaped upon thy breast.
I have missed thee, Oh! so sadly,
Since that memorable day,
And my weary soul would gladly
Wing its flight to thee away.

When my dream of life is ended,
There will come a happier day,
Then, by angel hands attended,
May I fly from earth away,
To that better world above us,
Where the tears of grief re'er fall,
Where Jehovah's love sustains us,
And his smile is over all.

COUSIN BEN;

OR, THE GOOD DEED REWARDED.

"Visitors!" exclaimed Kate Bennett impatiently, as she laid aside the book she had been reading, and in which she had been deeply interested, and took the cards which the servant presented.

"Dear me, how provoking! Just as I am in the most exciting part of the story—and that part, disagreeable Emily Archer, too," she added, reading one of the cards; "who else I wonder?"

Was there magic in that simple bit of paste-board, inscribed with only two words, "Richard Warren?" It would almost seem so, so instaneous did her countenance change. The frown that disfigured her beautiful brow disappeared, her eyes sparkled, and without another thought of the book, she hastily assured herself by a glance in the mirror, that her toilet was unexceptionable, and left the room.

As she entered the drawing room, and greeted her guest with all that grace and elegance of manner for which she was distinguished, Emily Archer surveyed her with one rapid critical glance; but drew, as well as manner, was faultless.

"It must be confessed that Kate Bennett enters a room like a queen," she thought, with a pang of envy and jealousy, as in Richard Warren's face she read undisguised admiration of the lovely girl before them.

What natural observer, who had marked the meeting of these two ladies, would have dreamed that, under all their outward friendliness, each hated the other with her whole heart? Yet so it was. Kate and Emily were rival belles, and their claims to admiration were so equally balanced that it required no little exertion on either side to gain the ascendancy, and be acknowledged the victor.

If Kate, with her classical features, queenly dignity, elegant figure, and exquisite taste, at first sight threw her rival in the shade, Emily's piquant style and sprightly conversation were by many preferred to Kate's statuesque beauty. It was impossible to decide which was the loveliest—each had her adherents and admirers—but as they were equally numerous, it seemed probable that the season would now draw to a close without the all-important decision of the question which had been, par excellence, the belle.

Just at this time Richard Warren returned from Europe. The arrival of so undeniably elegant, handsome, and wealthy a gentleman, was an event—all the fashionable world was in a flutter, and the rivals saw at once that the important epoch had arrived. She whose claims he advocated, whom he favored with his admiration, would at once stand upon the precarious pinnacle of belle-ship, though their tactics were entirely dissimilar.

Emily brought to bear upon him the batteries of her sprightly wit, while Kate adroitly laid the mine of apparently accidental fascination. As yet, though it was evident that Richard admired both, his preference was not known—perhaps he hardly knew himself which one he thought the most charming.

But during this exposition of the claims of the rivals a lively conversation had been going on. The last new novel and the opera had been discussed, as well as some of their mutual friends, and in the midst of some wicked, witty remarks of Emily upon a would-be fashionable lady, a loud voice was heard in the hall. It came nearer the door, and the words could be distinctly understood.

"You no-mannered, impudent jackanapes, I'll teach you manners; I'll make you laugh on t'other side of your mouth."

The door was flung open, and in walked a tall, athletic young man, whose really fine form was disguised in an ill-fitting suit of evidently domestic manufacture, and stood for a moment awkwardly looking round him; then hastily approaching Kate, he flung his arms around her, and gave her a loud smack on the cheek.

Kate withdrew herself, quickly and hastily from his embrace.

"Sir!" said she, with freezing dignity.

"Law! don't ye know who I be?" exclaimed the new comer, in no wise discomforted. "Wall, now, I do actually believe you've forgot me. Don't yer know yer cousin Ben? Ye see, I don't like farmin' no how you can fix it, so I quit that and come to the city. Jim Simpson was down to our place, and he's doing pooty well here. He said 'twas dreadful hard to get a start in the city, but guess I ain't a going to stop through where he goes ahead. I'll reak it any how, I've heerd different accounts as to that. Uncle Obe Verity told me he reckoned the captin cut off one of the bear's paws, when he lay stretched out asleep, one day, with his jack-knife, and sarked that for fodder, and they say there's a smart deal o' nourishment in a white bear's foot. But if I may be allowed to spend my 'pinion, I should say my old man's account is the rightest, and that's—what's as follows: You see after they'd been out three days about, they begun to grow kind o' hungry, and then they got friendly for misery loves company, you know; and the captin said the bear looked at him several times, very sorrowful, as much as to say, "Captain, what the devil shall we do?" Well, one day they was sitten, looken at each other, with the tears ready to burst out o' their eyes, when all of a hurry something come floppen up out o' the water on to the ice. The captin looked and see 'twas a seal. The bear's eyes kindled up as he looked at it, and then the captin said he give him a wink to keep still. So there they sot, still as starch, till the seal, not thinking nother o' them no more nor if they were dead, walks right up between 'em. Then slump! went down old whitey's paile into the fish's flesh, and the captin run his jack-knife into the tender loin. The sail soon got his bitters, and the captain cut a big hunk off the tail end, and put it behin him, out o' the bear's reach, and then he felt smart and comfortable, for he had stores enough for a long cruise, though the bear couldn't say so much for himself.

"Well, the bear, of course, soon ran out o' provisions, and had to put himself on to short allowance; and then he began to show his mayteral temper. He first stretched himself out as far as he could go, and tried to hook the captin's piece o' seal, but when he found he couldn't reach that, he began to blow and yell. Then he'd rare up and roar, and try to get himself clear from the ice. But mostly he reared up and roared and pounded his big paws and head upon the ice, till by and by, 'fest as the captin said he expected, the ice cracked in two agin, and split right through between the bear and the captin, and there they was on two different pieces o' ice, the captin and the bear! The old man said he really felt sorry at parten company, and when the cake split and separated, he cut off about half o' pound o' seal and chicked it to the bear. But either because 'twan't enough for him, or else on account o' his feelin bad at the captin's goen, the beast wouldn't touch it to eat it, and he laid it down, and growled and moaned over it quite pitiful. Well, off they went, one one way, and tother 'nother way, both feel'n pretty bad, I expect. After awhile the captin got smart and cold, and felt mighty lonesome; and he said he really thought he'd a gin in and died, if they hadn't pick'd him up that arternoon."

"Who picked him up, Venus?"

Who? a codfish craft off o' Newfoundland, I expect. They didn't know what to make o' him when they first see him slingen up his hat for 'em. Bit they got out all their boats, and took a small swivel and a couple o' muskets aboard and started off, expectin it was the sea serpent or an old mermaid. They wouldn't believe it was a man until he told 'em all about it, and then they didn't hardly believe it nother, and they cut him out o' the ice, and tuk him aboard o' their vessel, and rubbed his legs with the ile o' vitriol; but it was a long time afore they came to."

"Didn't they hurt him badly in cutting him out, Venus?"

"No sir, I believe not—not so bad as one might s'pose; for you see he'd been stuck in so long that the circulaten on his blood had kind o' rotted the ice that was right next to him, and when they begun to cut, it cracked off pretty smart and easy, and 'she came out whole like a hard-biled egg."

"What became of the bear?"

"Can't say as to that, what became o' him. He went off to sea somewheres, I expect. I should like to know myself how the varment got along, right well, for it was kind in him to let the captin have the biggest haaf o' the seal, anyhow. That's all, boys. How many's adeep?" A Scene in 1956.

BY BEN. SCRIBBLER.

A very pretty, delicate, fashionably dressed young gentleman is seated in a drawing-room, working desperately at some embroidery, and now and then heaving a gentle sigh. He is attired rather differently from the youths of last century, for his hair is parted in the middle and rolls in clustering curls to the throat, which is ornamented with a splendid necklace; his coat (with tails reaching almost to the floor) is made low neck and short sleeves—shoes are the softest kid, and pants of fine silk.

A ring at the door. The servant announces Miss Fast. Mr. Manly rises from the sofa, blushes deeply, and casts down his eyes; but so with the lady, who advanced with a first step—wishes the gentleman "Good evening," and softly touches his delicate digits. After a little conversation the beauty takes up his fan, saying—"I saw you, Miss Fast, this morning, walking very rapidly past our house, and I thought something dreadful had occurred; at first I thought our dwelling was in flames, and was so overcome (for my nerves are very weak,) that I gasped for breath, and nearly fainted. Now please do tell me what was the matter with you, for I have hardly yet recovered from my fright."

"Ah, my dear Mr. Manly, I fancied you looked pale when I came in—I missed those beautiful roses on your cheeks, and can I forgive myself for being the cause (though innocently) of so much suffering?"

"Oh, no ma'am—pray don't distress yourself! I am quite well now. But," he added, with a sweet smile and killing glance, "what made you walk so fast and so thoughtful?"

"Why, I was going to court," commenced the lady, pulling her cravat and looking professional, "as I had a cause to plead, and a strange one it was too. A man was such an outregeous fool as to disobey his wife, and insisted that he ought to carive and she pour out the tea, but when she informed him that no such thing would be allowed in her house, he threw over the tea-board and dashed from the room, leaving his wife and lawful protector petrified with astonishment. The lady followed him soon, however, and told the man she was grieved to see her husband act in such a manner, expressing the desire that the offence might not be repeated; but he behaved in a most inhumanly way, said he had borne tyranny long enough, and would have the same rights men possessed in the last century! (Did you ever hear anything like it?) When he could not be pacified, his wife quietly turned the key of his boudoir, and leaving orders with the servants at what hour to have dinner, went out to her business. On returning home she discovered the miscreant had tied, and in a short time he actually applied for a divorce. Of course he could not gain it, there was not a shadow of chance."

"Oh dear, oh dear!" exclaims Mr. Manly, "I fear he is deranged; I hope he will not be allowed to remain at large; I shall not sleep a wink at night till I know his is confined." Oh, Miss Fast, will you see that he does not go about unless strictly guarded! I should die, I am certain, were I to meet him in the street."

"My sweet Mr. Manly," replies the lady, with a look of inexpressible tenderness. "Ho not fear, I shall see that you are not troubled. Mrs. Rampant, the chief of the police, shall be informed of the matter.—I am sure you can trust me."

"Yes; I will rely on you, as I have al—" here he checks himself, blushing deeply.

What pleasure I receive in hearing you say so," says the lady; "and these beautiful down-cast eyes tell more, I hope, than your rose-bud mouth can utter."

"Now, Miss Fast," cries the gentleman, tapping her with his fan, "you are beginning your flatteries. What a bad, nasty, hateful creature you are; I do protest," he adds, with an enchanting lisp, "that you are the most perfect flirt. I know how you trifle with us gentlemen."

"Trifle with you, Mr. Manly!" the lady bursts forth going down on her knees. "Is not my whole life bound up in you? will you not smile on me with delight, when I confess that I adore you with all the power of a strong womanly nature, that I will protect you through life, and you shall desire no firmer arm to lean on and look for support. Oh, say, my better angel, that you will be mine."

"Really, Miss Fast—I do not—spare me—I am not calm just now—some other time—I am quite young—such preference—oh—ah—I am so startled—how my heart does palpitate—a glass of water"—and the gentleman sinks back on the sofa, nearly swooning. He recovers shortly, as the lady fans him most vigorously; and looking up in her face with swimming eyes, says, "Go ask my noble mother's consent, and then this poor worthless hand and heart you prize so much will be thine forever," and a flood of tears from those soft, sweet orbs, rains upon the devoted lover, and extracts most all the starch from her Byron collar.

It is less tiresome to walk than to stand still a given length of time, for in walking each set of muscles is resting half of the time, but when standing still all the muscles are continually exerted.

A witness in court being interrogated as to his knowledge of the defendant in the case, said he knew him intimately well. "He had supped with him, sailed with him, and horse-whipped him."

Capital punishment, which was abolished in Prussia in 1848, has been re-established. The mode of execution is to be the axe, within prison walls, and in the presence of a certain number of magistrates and officials expressly appointed for the purpose.

THE FULLNESS OF FOLLY.—"Reading makes a full man," says Bacon; and "Fashion makes a full woman," says Punch; for certainly a woman, as she is dressed according to the present fashion, could not well be made much fuller.

NOT ACCLIMATED.—A gentleman from Cuba, who was a passenger on the train from New York to Boston that recently ran off the track, after ascertaining that he had received no injury, audibly returned thanks that he did not visit this country of "hell wagons" but only in two years.

God's Bible is the book for all, just like the wind of Heaven, and God's sunlight and his pure water, free for all. Good for the prince—good for the peasant. It goes higher than human degradation descends. It is an ocean for an Edwards or a Chalmers to swim in, and to the poor ignorant cottager it is the "small rain from Heaven."

A Good Bear Story.

"Well, they was down into Baffin's Bay, or some other of them cold Norwegen bays at the North, where the rain freezes as it comes down, and stands up in the air, on winter mornens, like green mountains n' ice, all in streaks. Well, the schooner was layen at anchor, and all the hands was out into the small boats, looken for wales; all except the captin, who said he wan't very well that day. Well, he was walken up and down on deck, smoken and thinken, I expect, mostly, when all on a sudden he reckoned he see one o' them big white bears—polar bears, you know—big as thunder—with long teeth. He reckoned he see one on 'em scampen along on a great cake n' ice, they lay on the leeward side of the lay, up again on the bank. The old cap wanted to kill one o' them varmints most wonderful, but he never lucked to get a chance. Now tho', he thought, the time had come for him to walk into one on 'em at last, and fix his mutton for him right. So he run forrad and lay hold onto a small skiff, that was layen near the fore'stal, and run her out and launched her. Then he took a drink, and—here's luck—and put in a stiff load of powder, a couple of balls, and jumped in and pulled away for the ice."

"It wan't long fore he got 'cross the lay, for it was a narrer piece o' water—not more than half a mile wide—and then he got out on to the ice. It was a smart and large cake, and the bear was away down to the tother end on't by the edge o' the water. So he walked first strut along, and when he got pretty close he walked round catecorned-like, like's if he was driven for a plain plover—so that the bear wouldn't think he was comin arter him, and he dragged himself along on his hands and knees low down mostly. Well, the bear didn't seem to mind him none, and he got up within 'bout fifty yards on him, and then he looked so savage and big—the bear did—that the captain stopped, and rested on his knees, and put up his gun, and he was again to shoot. But just then the bear turned around and snuffed up the captain—just as one of Lif's hounds snuffs up an old buck, Mr. Cypress—and begun to walk towards him, slowly like. He come along, the captain said, climp, clump, very slow, and made the ice bend and crack again under him, so that the water came up and purty much kivered it all over.

"Well, there the captin was all the time squat on his knees, with his gun pinted, waiten for the varmint to come up, and his knees and legs was most mighty cold by means of the water, that the bear riz on the ice as I was mentionen. At last the bear seemed to make up his mind to see how the captin would taste, and so he left off walken slow, and started off on a smart and swift trot, right towards the old man, with his mouth wide open, roaren, and his tail sticken out stiff. The captin kept still, looken out all the time pritty sharp, I should say, till the beast got within about ten yards on him, and then he let him have it. He aimed right at the fleshy part of his heart, but the bear dodged at the flash, and rared up, and the balls went into his two hind legs, just by the fynt, one into each, and broke the thigh bones smack off, so that he went right down aft, on the ice, thump, on his hind-quarters, with nothen standen but his fore legs and his head riz up, a growlen at the captin. When the old man see him down, and tryen to slide along the ice to get his revenge, likely, thinks he to himself, thinks he, I might as well get up and go and cut that ere creter's throat. So he tuk out his knife and opened it. But when he started to get up, he found to his astonishment that he was fruz fast to the ice. Don't laugh; it's a fact; there ain't no doubt. The water, you see, had been round him, a smart and long while, whilst he was waiten for the bear, and it's wonderful cold in them regions, as I was sayen, and you'll freeze in a minit if you don't keep moven about smartly."

So the captin he strained first one leg and then he strained tother, but he couldn't move 'em none. They was both fruz fast into the ice, about an inch and a half deep, from knee to toe, tight as a Jarsey oyster perryanger on a mud flat at low water. So he laid down his gun, and looked at the bear, and doubled up his fists. "Come on, you bloody varmint," says the old man, as the bear swallowed along on his hinder end, comen at him. He kept gettin' weaker, though, and comen slower and slower all the time, so that, at last, he didn't seem to move nose, and directly, when he'd got so near that the captin could just give him a dig in the nose by reachen forrard putty smart and far, the captin see that the beast was fruz fast too, nor he couldn't move a step further forrard no ways. Then the captin burst out laughen, and clapped his hands down to his thighs, and roared. The bear seemed to be most onmighty mad at the old man's fun, and set up such a growlen that what should come to pass, but the ice cracks, and breaks all around the captin and the bear, down to the water's edge, and the wind just then a shiften, and comen off shore, away they floated on a cake of ice about ten by six, off to sea, without the darned a biscuit of a quart o' liquor to stand 'em on the cruise! There they sot, the bear and the captin, just so near that when they both reached forrards, they could just about touch noses, and neither one not able to move any part on him, only exceptin his upper part and fore paws."

"By golly! that was rather a critical predicament, Venus," cried Ned, buttoning on his coat. "I should have thought that the captain's nose and ears and hands would have been frozen too."

"That's quite naytr'l to suppose, sir, but you see the bear kept him warm in the upper parts, by bein' so close to him, and brethren hard and hot on the old man whenever he growled at him. Them polar bears is wonderful hardy animals, and has a monstrous deal o' heat in 'em, by means of their bein able to stand such cold climates, I expect. And so the captin knowed this, and whenever he felt chilly, he jest tok his ramrod and stirred up the old rascal, made him roar and squeal, and then the hot breath would come pouren out all over the captin, and made the aire quite moderit and pleasant."

"Well, go on, Venus. Take another horn first."

"Well, there aint much more on't. Off they went to sea, and sometimes the wind drav 'em nothe, and then agin it drav 'em southe, but they went southe mostly; and so it went on, until they were out about three weeks. So at last one afternoon——"

"But, Venus, stop; tell us in the name of wonder how did the captain contrive to support life all this time?"

"Why, sir, to be sure, it was a hard kind o' life to support, but a hardy man will get used to almost——"

"No, no; what did he eat? what did he feed on?"

"O—O—I clean forgot to've skipped that ere. Why, and loving children, she had led a happy life, and time had but increased the attachment of the wedded pair. But cloudless as her life had been, a storm was gathering. Her husband, always cheerful, grew moody, restless and unhappy. She tried in vain to discover the cause of his gloom, but he only made evasive replies to her inquiries, and could only guess at his troubles; that they were connected with his business she imagined. Her surmises were correct.

He entered the room one day where she was sitting, and exclaimed, flinging himself on the sofa—

"Kate, we are ruined. In vain I have struggled for weeks past; it is useless to attempt it longer. To-day I shall be known as a bankrupt—penniless, and worse than penniless. In trying to double my fortune I have lost all. You and my children are beggars."

"Why should loss of wealth trouble you, Richard?" said his wife tenderly, approaching and taking his hand. "That is after all but a trifling misfortune. While we are spared to each other, blest with health and children, why should we repine at the mere loss of fortune?"

The husband groaned.

"Ah, to be dishonest, Kate," he said; "fear to look men in the face, because I am a bankrupt—unable to pay my debts. Kate, the very idea of this drives me nearly mad. To avoid this, what have I not done? I have passed sleepless nights and anxious days, but all in vain."

With soothing words the wife tried to comfort him; but, alas, he paid little heed to her efforts.

Just then a servant entered, saying that a gentleman wished to see Mr. Warren.

"Tell him that I cannot," replied his master; "I will see nobody."

"But you will," replied a cheerful voice, and a gentleman closely followed the servant as he entered.

"How is this, my dear Dick!" he said; "you are in trouble, and did not apply to me; that was not right."

"And of what use would it have been?" returned Warren. "I am weary of borrowing of one friend to repay the other, day after day. Even that has failed me at last, and I have come to hide myself from the prying gaze of those who will soon be talking of my disgrace."

"I had heard rumors of this, Dick, and went to your office to see you; as you were not there, I followed you here. You have two hours yet before bank hours are over. Here is a blank check, fill it up yourself and it shall be duly honored. Pay at your convenience. No thanks, it is only a loan. I know your business well, and that in a little time, with perhaps a little assistance, all will be right again."

Totally overcome, Richard could only grasp his friend's hand, while his eyes filled with an unwonted moisture.

"How can we ever thank you, dearest cousin Ben?" cried Kate. "How can we ever repay you?"

"Tut, tut, Kate; I am only discharging a part of a debt I owe you, my dear girl. I owe all I possess—all I am—to you. When I first came here, a raw, ignorant, awkward country booby, you were not ashamed of me. You took me cordially by the hand, influenced your father to assist me, and more than all, by unvarying kindness, offering me a home and innocent amusements in your society, kept me out of the many temptations that beset a lonely, inexperienced lad, such as without you I should have been. I thanked you for it then, even when I didn't appreciate the sacrifice it was a—fine lady to have a bumpkin like myself about her; and when I knew more of the world and understood the rarity of such conduct, I loved you the better for it, and felt the more grateful. I had no opportunity to show it before, in any substantial form. But now you see you are under no obligations. I'm only getting rid of a little of the heavy load you placed me under long ago. Be off, with you, Dick, and hereafter rely on me in all cases like the present. Don't get discouraged too easily—business men, of all others, should have elastic temperaments. Good bye, now," he added, as Warren disappeared, kissing the tears from Kate's cheek, "and be assured that Ben Adams, the millionaire, has never forgotten, and will try to repay your kindness to your poor and awkward cousin."

"I am richly repaid," she muttered. "How little I dreamed, long ago, that twice in my life I should owe my highest happiness to the trifling acts of kindness towards my good cousin."

BASCOM FEMALE SEMINARY,
GRENADA, MISSISSIPPI.

THE scholastic year is divided into two sessions of five months each, opening on the first Monday in September and February.

Tuition per Session, from $10 to $30; Music $25; Language, any ancient or modern, $12; Vocal Music $4; Incidental fee $1; Board $30.

No deduction is made for lost time, except in cases of protracted sickness.

Special attention is paid to the elements—the ground work—of a thorough education.

The discipline is strict, but enforced by appeals to the moral sensibility and self respect.

The Music Department is particularly attractive.

Economy is earnestly recommended, and extravagance prevented as far as possible.

The Seminary building is well adapted to educational purposes. The Boarding Department is under the immediate care of the President and his lady—who spare no pains to secure the comfort of their boarders.

A full Faculty of experienced and successful Teachers—an excellent Apparatus, adapted to a complete course in Natural Science—the location in the midst of moral and refined society—have secured to the Seminary its present popularity and prosperity.

Every pupil boarding at the Seminary must furnish her own towels. All other things essential to health and comfort are furnished by the Institution.

Young ladies are received at any time; but it is better for them to enter at the first of the Session.

GREAT MORTALITY AMONG CHILDREN.

THE papers teem with speculations upon the amazing mortality among children; but they fail to indicate the true cause—the presence of Worms in the stomach and intestines. At least half the fatal diseases to which childhood is subject are synonymous to Worms. This was the opinion of Abernethy and Sir Astley Cooper. What mother, then, would risk the consequences of this terrible disorder, when a few doses of WINSLOW'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE will always sweep away the vermin and the mucous in which they are imbedded, leaving the system in a healthy condition and secure against a return of the complaint.

Be particular and remember the name "Winslow's Canadian Vermifuge." This is the only article that can be depended on. For sale in New Orleans wholesale and retail by
